Editors' Preface

Why a new English commentary on the 1983 Code of Canon Law? Because things change.

The earlier work, The Code of Canon Law: A Text and Commentary, also commissioned by the Canon Law Society of America, was published in 1985. One could fairly ask why another one is needed, since the code itself remains almost the same as when it was issued in 1983. But much has changed in the nearly twenty years since the authors of the previous commentary did their work.

The Church has changed. The Roman Catholic Church in the United States and worldwide continues to experience remarkable developments in its ministry, in its diocesan and parish life, and in its witness and outreach. Among those experiences, the Church has come to terms with the 1983 Code of Canon Law, a long-awaited revision of the first code, issued in 1917. That revision, eighteen years in the making (1965–1983), took place in the light of the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), and consciously attempted to translate the council's teachings into rules for the life of the Church. By now the Church has had considerable experience living by those new rules. It is that experience which this new commentary tries to capture and assess.

Canon law has changed. The 1983 code itself has undergone just one formal amendment (the minor additions to canons 750 and 1371 introduced by the May 1998 apostolic letter Ad tuendam fidem) since its promulgation. However, many new documents and official interpretations have enlarged and reshaped the canonical scene in the intervening years. The 1988 apostolic constitution on the Roman Curia, the 1990 ritual for the celebration of marriage, the 1993 directory on ecumenism, the 1996 apostolic constitution on papal elections, the 1998 motu proprio on episcopal conferences, and especially the 1990 Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, as well as many other documents, have influenced the meaning and practice of canon law. The Pontifical Council on the Interpretation of Legislative Texts has issued dozens of authentic interpretations of the canons. Scores of decisions made by ecclesiastical tribunals have shed light on the meaning of particular canons. Many other canonical commentaries have appeared in various languages since 1985. Several papal encyclicals and apostolic exhortations as well as the teaching and policy statements of episcopal synods and conferences have given new nuance to the canonical texts and allowed for a new understanding of them. A lot has changed in canon law.

The Canon Law Society of America has done a new English translation of the code. After nearly six years of painstaking effort, consultations, and corrections by a special committee, the society published an entirely new English translation of the 1983 code in 1999. This translation greatly improved upon the 1983 CLSA translation, especially in its accuracy and consistency of language and style. The president of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops granted a nihil obstat for the new translation in 1997. This new translation, contained herein, forms the basis for the explanations and reflections that make up this new commentary.

The authors have changed. Of the thirty-six contributors to this commentary, about three-fourths are different from the authors of the 1985 commentary. All are members of the Canon Law Society of America and all hold doctoral degrees in canon law. Seven are women, three are Europeans, and two are Canadians. They pursued their canonical studies at many different schools, North American as well as European. The commentators bring fresh vision and diverse views based on a wide range of pastoral and academic experiences.

The purpose of this commentary is different. The Canon Law Society's board of governors commissioned this new commentary in April 1996. From the outset its purpose was distinct from that of the commentary published in 1985. Both are basically expository and explanatory, that is, they tell the reader what the Church's official rules are and how they are to be understood and applied. Both view the canons as standing under and subject to the teachings of the Second Vatican Council. However, the 1985 commentary focused on the differences between the 1917 and 1983 codes, and how the canons were formed in the long process of revision after the council. This commentary focuses on the lived experience of the canons in use since 1983. It emphasizes the contemporary understanding and applications of the canons based on that experience. The commentators take account of the 1990 Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, the other relevant documents, and the views expressed by other commentators and authors. The contributors present the state of the question on controverted issues and bring their own views to these ongoing debates.

This commentary is entirely new in purpose and content. It responds to the changes and developments mentioned above. The editors are confident that it will prove to be an indispensable canonical resource for diocesan personnel, parish staffs, seminary and university teachers, indeed for anyone who wishes to understand the rules of the Catholic Church. We judge it to be a worthy complement to the 1985 CLSA Code of Canon Law: A Text and Commentary. Our desire is that it serve well the Church, both people and ministers, in their service to God's purpose in the world.

THEOLOGY AND CANON LAW

Ladislas M. Örsy, S.J.

The issue of the relationship between doctrine and law in the life of the Church has emerged with some force and urgency after Vatican Council II: the theological statements of the Fathers had to be translated into legislative enactments. As faith sought and found new intelligence at the council, the same faith demanded and searched for new norms of action after the council. Thus, while the work of the revision of the Code of Canon Law progressed, theologians and canon lawyers looked for a paradigm that could serve as a guide for the transition from doctrinal insights to juridical norms. In this process two distinct questions emerged:

(1) What is the place and role of law in the Church?

(2) What is the relationship between theology and canon law?

The first question is an issue of systematic theology; it belongs to ecclesiology. The answer ought to identify, describe, and explain the place and role of law in the living body of the Church. Once such a systematic understanding is reached and articulated, it may fulfill an apologetic scope as well: the origin, purpose, and nature of the law can reveal why and how it ought to be an integral part of the structures and operations of the community.

The second question focuses on a more specific issue: the relationship between theology and canon law; that is, on the mutual interaction between the doctrine of faith (theory) that has all to do with the community's beliefs, and the norms of action (practice) that have all to do with the community's operations.

(1) What is the place and role of law in the Church?

The place of law is in the Church of Christ where the drama of our redemption is enacted; the role of law is to assist the people in the reception of God's saving mysteries.

The Church of Christ, according the teaching of Vatican Council II, "subsists in the Catholic Church, which is governed by the successor of Peter and by the bishops in communion with him. Nevertheless, many elements of sanctification and of truth are found outside its visible confines . . . these are gifts belonging to the Church of Christ" (LG 8). It follows that the object of any theological inquiry concerning the Church must be always the whole Christian communion. This rule we should never lose sight of, not even when we are investigating the place and role of law.

At the present, however, the one Church of Christ is broken or wounded since there are divisions among the believers in proclaiming their faith and in ordering the operations of their communities. For this reason, and to avoid a diffuse and complicated inquiry into the varied life of divers denominations, our study about the place and role of law will focus on the Roman Catholic Church. It is our church; moreover, in it the presence and use of canon law can be more easily and securely discerned. Much of what we are going to say, however, with due allowance for differences, is applicable to other churches and ecclesial communities.

Our point of departure is in accepting and professing that the Church is both a truly human community, entrusted to human beings, and a divine mystery (cf. Eph 5:32), the work of the Spirit.

Right from the beginning the Church perceived itself as a human community: the very name of it, ecclesia, means "gathering." This fact is of foundational importance because it follows that the internal and natural laws of a human community are relevant for, and operating in, the Church.

Paul the Apostle declared this "gathering" a great mysterion, translated into Latin as sacramentum. The word was used in a unique sense: the Church was the possessor and dispenser of the word of God and of the grace-filled sacramental rites. The scriptures use various images comprehensible to us to convey some understanding of this mystery: the Church is the coming of God's kingdom, his temple, his sheepfold, the field where he has planted his vineyard, and so forth. Interestingly, all such images point toward some visible and structured reality.

This community, earthly and heavenly at the same time, has not reached its perfection. It is incomplete and unfinished: it must grow and expand in history. It has an absolute need to reach out for authentic values. (Values are good things that can perfect the community, support its life, and sustain its development.) Law is a specific instrument in this process; it prompts and binds the community to strive for its perfection and gives directions for its progress.

As the Church is of a composite nature, so is canon law. In it human elements blend with divine gifts. As the Church is incomplete and unfinished, so is canon law. That the Church is always in need of reform, ecclesia semper reformanda, means that canon law, too, is permanently in need of review, ius canonicum semper revidendum.

To gain an even fuller understanding of the place and role of law in the Church, let us look at the law's origin, purpose, and nature.

The origin of canon law is both in the humanity of the Church and in the divine gifts possessed by the community. Some norms are born from a human need for order and ordered operations; some norms are demanded and generated by divine revelation. In each case reason is the operating agent in bringing order into the life of community, that is, reason enlightened by, and united with, the word of God and energized by divine grace. In this sense, the definition of Aquinas holds: "Law is an ordinance of reason."

The purpose of canon law is to assist the Church in fulfilling its task which is to reveal and to communicate God's saving power to the world. Law can help by creating order in the community, an order that leads to tranquillity and peace: a good disposition for the "assembly" to become "light to the nations." The law can be also a teacher to the people, as the Torah once was: guiding them toward the kingdom.

The nature of canon law reflects the nature of the Church: it is truly human because the Church is a human community; it has an affinity with the divine because it is an integral part of the Church as sacrament. In the law itself, human prudence blends with divine wisdom in a close union but without fusion or confusion. This complex nature gives to canon law its incarnational character. Let this character unfold.

As the visible church is contingent, so is canon law. Law is meant for this passing world—while charity remains forever. Whenever the law provides for human needs (e.g., when it creates structures and processes not defined by revelation), it is bound to reflect the human qualities of the legislator, such as his horizon, his alertness in gathering information, his capacity for creative insights, his ability to form critical judgments, his prudence in matters practical, his skill in communicating a piece of legislation—and so forth. When the law is implementing divine commands (e.g., concerning the reception of the sacraments), it has a transcendental quality but it does not carry an immunity from human fragility. Even when the law gives effect to an explicit divine precept (e.g., the law that gives effect to the words of Christ to Peter: "Feed my sheep"), it remains conditioned by the historical circumstances of its enactment.

As the Church is changeable and reformable, so are its laws; some in their substance, some in their formulation. For this reason, canon law has the potential for development. In the course of history, changes in the rules often prompted and guided the Church in its own growth and expansion. A living social body demands flexible norms. To prevent the onset of rigidity, dying norms ought to be steadily pruned away and new ones created as needed. The decision by the Church to put virtually all its laws into one "code" (imitating a trend among states) has brought many advantages but also contributed significantly to an increase in rigidity. No matter how urgent the need for reform is concerning one subject, it is difficult to introduce major changes in a unified code.

Since the Church is of divine foundation, its laws have an affinity with the divine. To a significant extent their scope is to give effect to the word of God. Further, the structures that the word creates and the operations that it prompts are part of, or linked to, the visible sacramental symbol that is the Church.

The head of the Church is the risen Christ: there is a personal bond between him and his people. When the people intelligently and freely give themselves to his Church and observe its laws, they honor him. No such quality can ever exist in civil law.

Every norm in canon law must be linked to authentic values, human and/or divine: without such a bond no law can have authority. In other terms, a norm is valid as far as it promotes, supports, and protects a value; otherwise it would not serve the common good. This may happen in a specific way as when a given rule is linked to a defined value, or it can happen in a generic fashion as when a set of rules converge to uphold the value of order and unity in the community. Briefly: norms in themselves have no value; they exist for the sake of values. (The term "value" and the expression "common good" are so close to each other that they are virtually interchangeable.)

We have now come to a position where we are able to gather the elements of our reflections into a unified theory concerning the place and role of law in the Church.

It is part of the external visible sacramental structure of the Church; there it shares the composite nature of the community. In its provisions it can be human; it can display the limitations and weaknesses of our nature. It can also represent divine wisdom and thus testify that God is present among his people. It is contingent and in constant need of reform in order to be in harmony with the rhythm of life of the Church and of the surrounding world; it is constant as far as it gives effect to the word of God.

The best criterion for judging any theory concerning the place and role of law in the Church is in asking how far the theory is able to perceive, understand, affirm, and sustain this delicate balance.

We turn now to the presentation and examination of some of the current theories, but not before a caution is sounded.

The literature seeking to explain the place and role of law in the Church is abundant but it is not easy to handle. The issue itself is new; there is little tradition to guide the inquiries. The thinkers and writers, moreover, do not come from the same background; they start from differing philosophical, theological, and jurisprudential assumptions, often hidden behind their articulated positions. When this happens, the reader is compelled to conjecture the principles that inspired or determined the meaning of their direct statements. Further, as various "schools of thought" developed, they tended to remain isolated within their own boundaries—linguistic, national, or doctrinal. This isolation occasioned more repetitions of positions than mutual exchanges of opinions. In this small field there is a great need for critical dialogue.

We offer hereby a representative selection of various theories with a brief critical assessment. We introduce each one in thesis form, name its author or its supporting school, and then apply the criteria mentioned above for its evaluation.

(a) Theories that fail to perceive the true nature of the Church or the true nature of the law; they are radically deficient.

In the Church of charity there is no place for law: they are mutually exclusive.

This position was articulated and defended (and buttressed with a restricted and fragmented vision of history) by Rudolf Sohm (d. 1917). He correctly perceived the primacy of charity in the Church but failed to see the community's need for order. He had, moreover, a limited understanding of law: he saw it as a norm that by its nature demands enforcement through violent actions. For such law, he held, there is no room in the Christian community. His position gained much publicity mainly in Germany; it was frequently used in a modified form to postulate the exclusion of any law in the Christian community. History contradicts the theory: since the first apostolic council in Jerusalem, Christians have been guided by rules and regulations in their assemblies. A warning from Sohm, however, could be well taken: no law should ever overshadow charity.

The law is autonomous: there is no need to link it to any value.

This is the theory of the school of the legal positivists. Their field of vision is restricted to the observable phenomenon of law: anything beyond it they ignore. They do not see the wholesome reality and organic nature of a human community; they sever the law from its natural environment. Their interpretation of the law tends to be literal and rigid, since no "external factors" (hierarchy of values, principles of morality, etc.) must ever be taken into account. The theory of legal positivism has no place in Christian jurisprudence.

Pragmatic positivism, however, is another matter: it is a permanent temptation for religious communities; history shows it. The books of the Old and New Testaments report groups of zealots insisting on the literal observance of the law in disregard of higher values; Jesus himself had to insist that the healing of human persons was more important than the observance of the Sabbath. Pragmatic positivism is no less subversive than the theoretical one but it can camouflage itself as the semblance of the virtue of fidelity or obedience. Every time in a Christian community when the law takes precedence over faith, hope, and charity, we are dealing with a manifestation of pragmatic positivism.

(b) Theories that fail to do justice to the distinctive and intrinsically religious character of canon law.

Canon law is law in the same sense as civil law.

Scholars following this position are often designated as the Italian School; in truth they could be of any nationality.

They identify canon law with civil law; for them "law" is not an analogical concept. In consequence, they recognize one kind of jurisprudence only, applicable to all legal systems. The religious origin, scope, and nature of canon law, all that appear to give it a special character, are really irrelevant because they are "meta-legal," that is, outside the orbit of the law. For them, the rules of interpretation are the same in civil law and canon law. In this way, and in this way only, can canon law enter the respected field of legal science.

This approach is severely deficient because the theory detaches canon law from the religious soil that produced it, from the transcendental scope that it serves, and ignores its specific nature shaped by human needs and divine commands. Of course, for this school, it is illegal to give priority to faith, hope, and charity in the interpretation and application of canonical norms.

Canon law is law in the same sense as civil law but its "owner" is the Church.

This theory is often referred to as the position of the Navarra School although it can be found worldwide and not all the scholars from Navarra may hold it. Its advocates follow the Italian School in asserting an essential identity between the nature of civil law and canon law, but they affirm the power of the Church over canon law under every aspect: legislation, interpretation, and application. In other terms, for them canon law is not different from civil law but the Church retains jurisdiction over every part of it. This external dependence sets canon law apart from other systems.

The theory is inadequate on several counts. It pays little or no attention to the intrinsic connection between theological realities and canonical commands; it does not promote insightful interpretation on the basis of religious values; it fails to create a climate that favors the participation of the faithful in the preparation and the evaluation of the norms; it reduces the reception of the law into passive acceptance.

(c) Theories that virtually identify canon law with theology.

Canon law is a theological discipline with juridical method.

This "thesis" is usually referred to as the position of the Munich School since Klaus Mörsdorf

(d. 1989), professor of the university of that city, first proposed it. He created the general category of "theological discipline" and within it the "specific branches" differentiated among themselves by the method they were using. Thus, canon law for him was a theological discipline specified by its juridical method. (Presumably, church history should be differentiated by its historical method.)

The direction of Mörsdorf's intuition was correct: he saw that there must be an organic connection between theology and canon law—notwithstanding their differences. His thesis, however, is hardly more than an "axiom"; it is not an elaborate, cohesive, and critically grounded theory. He does not account with precision for the meaning of "theological discipline"; he gives no satisfactory explanation why method should be the criterion for distinguishing its branches. In fact, the difference between the two disciplines goes much deeper than their respective methods: the one seeks understanding; the other imposes action. The nature of canon law by Mörsdorf's "axiom" should be the same as that of theology; this misrepresents reality to the detriment of both disciplines. When canon law is seen as part of theo-logia, it becomes difficult to explain its human limitations.

Canon law is ordinance of faith, ordinatio fidei, not ordinance of reason, ordinatio rationis.

This statement sums up, in his own words, the theory of Eugenio Corecco (d. 1995), former professor at Fribourg, later bishop of Lugano. He was a disciple of Mörsdorf but went further than his mentor in stressing the divine elements in canon law. He saw faith as the principal agent creating it, and the law so produced as similar to dogma. He gives little attention to the human nature of the pilgrim Church. He does not, therefore, sufficiently account for earthly limitations and failures in the legal system. He perceives, correctly, that the nature of canon law is substantially different from that of civil law, but he brings canon law so close to the doctrine of faith that its humanity and specific practical character virtually disappear. In the interpretation and application of canon law, this theory can lead to an excessive rigidity.

(d) A tentative theory with a sound starting point but as yet incomplete.

The Eucharist is the source of rights and duties in the Church.

Could we conceive of a theory that presents the legal system of the Church as rooted in (or centered on) the Eucharist? The question is legitimate; Peter Huizing (d. 1995), former professor at the Gregorian University in Rome, raised it with some insistence. The question is prompted by the belief that the Church (and every particular church) comes into existence when the community celebrates the Eucharist. It should follow that rights and duties are created through the same sacred act and they are sustained and supported by it.

How can we bring further intelligence into this approach?

The expression "the Church comes into existence through the celebration of the Eucharist" means that the risen Christ takes into himself those whom he predestined, called, justified, and glorified (cf. Rom 8:30). He binds them together into one body through the mystery that re-creates his saving deed.

It makes good sense to say that ultimately all rights and duties, all rules and regulations originate in, and remain connected with, this sacred event. An ecclesiastical legislator can be no more than a trustee of the risen Christ.

Canon law, then, can be truly part of the sacramental structure of the Church itself, a sign and symbol of our humanity that is being redeemed. Because that humanity is still subject to limitations and failings, so are the legal rules. They, too, are being redeemed. The saying that our laws are in need of constant reform (as the Church is) receives a new meaning.

In this unfolding theory, we may find eventually the best explanation of the place and role of law in the Church. Admittedly, it still needs refinement and elaboration. Some practical consequences, however, are discernible. Among the Christian churches, an existing communion in the Eucharist could be seen as far more important than the separation in matters of jurisdiction. Inside the Church, the awareness of the unity of the faithful in the celebration of the Eucharist could become an incentive for the increased participation of the same faithful in decision-making processes. The immense and gratuitous mercy experienced in the Eucharist may eventually help us to see that the structures of the sacrament of penance ought to follow the simplicity of Jesus' forgiving acts and must be free of any legalism. In the long run, sound practical consequences could be the best proofs for the soundness of the theory. "You will know them by their fruits" (Mt 7:16).

This theory still needs the critical challenges of theologians and canon lawyers; it needs even more the response that can come only through the "supernatural sense of faith" that resides in the entire people of God (cf. LG 12). It represents a vision that not only is an antidote to legalism but is likely to inspire respect for the law.

In summary, the first group of theories under (a) does not represent adequately the true nature of canon law or of any law; the second group under (b) virtually identifies the nature of canon law with that of civil law and fails to account sufficiently for the religious and ecclesial character of canon law; the third group under (c) sees canon law too much as a theological enterprise and falls short of doing justice to its humanity and juridical nature. All such theories can lead to interpretations that lack internal balance and harmony. The last theory under (d) is well founded and promising but as yet not completed: it should be considered as a report on "faith seeking understanding."

(2) What is the relationship between theology and canon law?

To handle the question correctly, an initial explanation of the concepts is warranted.

What is theology?

In a broad sense, theo-logia, "God-science," is sacred knowledge received from God through his self-revelation and implanted in the spirit (memory) of the Christian community, then expanded by insightful reflections on its content. The core of it never changes: it is the "Tradition," id quod traditum est: all that was given through the mission of Christ and is protected by his Spirit. This gift, however, is like the living seed: in our intelligence it is alive and unfolding. As history progresses, "faith seeks understanding." This search for a deeper knowledge of God's mysteries is sustained by a divine energy, but it is marked also by human limits. No falsehood can corrupt the core, yet our insights are not immune to error. This complex character makes theology unique among all sciences: it is unlike any other.

We are able to express our theologia in several ways: in artistic creations, in musical compositions, and in doctrinal propositions. Our attention here focuses on theology in propositions—as we find it, for instance, in our traditional professions of faith and other authoritative doctrinal declarations. All such propositions are affirmations: they respond first to the "essential" question What is it? then to the "existential" one Does it really exist? For example, in an inquiry about the meaning of the Eucharist, the first response would keep us at an abstract level and give an account of its foundation and its significance in the assembly; the second would move us into the realm of the concrete world of existence and assert that the Eucharist is there. At the end we would know (as we can) what the Eucharist is and that it really exists.

This process of "faith seeking understanding" has been always present in the Church and will never be completed. Nor will it ever be a mere repetition of what is already known because new insights will be emerging until the end of time. The content of the mysteries can never be exhausted: theological knowledge by its very nature keeps expanding.

What is canon law?

The usual definition of modern canon law, which is mostly statutory, contains the following elements: it is a set of norms created by reason enlightened through faith, it intends to bring order into the life of the ecclesial community, it is articulated and promulgated by those who are entrusted with the community's care, and its purpose is to serve the common good. Thus, canon law imposes obligations; that is, it establishes legal bonds from which rights and duties flow.

A better understanding of canon law could be achieved by recalling that in the Christian community an overall obligation of theological origin exists prior to any law; it is a bond that binds the faithful to God and to each other; canon law can do no more than to give directions in detail as to how to fulfill this principal obligation in daily life. Canon law, in its essence and existence, depends on a pre-existing theological reality.

As faith moves the community to seek insights into the mysteries, so the same faith prompts the community to organize itself and to create norms of action for the reception of God's gifts. Faith, however, does not articulate the norms: our practical reason does, with the help of some divine wisdom revealed to us and some human ingenuity brought into play.

Every single sentence in canon law is the communication of a decision in view of action; every norm is in an imperative mood. These norms are addressed to persons, they specify obligations, they answer the question What ought to be done? The task of every ordinance is to name an action. (Note: for our purposes, a law that prohibits an action falls under the same consideration as the law that prescribes an action; in each case an act of compliance is commanded.)

This process of "faith seeking action" has operated in the Church ever since the communities started to assemble: they had to create ordered structures and converging operations if they wanted to exist at all.

How do theology and canon law relate to each other?

For a response we must turn to the living Church: the Church generates theology and canon law; the Church receives them.

Whenever a human community, the Church not excepted, operates collectively, it does so in a fashion that follows the pattern of the activity of individual persons. Intelligent persons have a natural longing for knowledge and understanding—so do communities. Free persons have a natural desire for all that can perfect them, they decide to reach out for values that can enrich them—so do communities. The energy that the Spirit infuses into Christians only increases such natural impulses.

The community's search for knowledge revolves principally around God and his saving deeds but it does not end there: the members want to know about values that they—as a community—need in order to sustain and nourish their life. The discovery and definition of "values for life" are part and parcel of the theological enterprise. Once the values are identified, they can become objects of desire: the community must decide to reach out for them if it wants to live and grow in the concrete order.

Canon law comes into play when those to whom the care of the social body is entrusted formulate norms, that is, specify and impose actions for the acquisition of values that are indispensable or highly necessary or useful for the life of the group. Of course, not all the values suitable for the community need to be objects of legislation; it will always be a matter of prudence to select the ones that ought to be promoted by legislative acts. Good guidance can come from our long-standing legal experience.

As in the spirit of a human person there is a vital process that begins with the affirmation of values and moves into decision and action for their appropriation, so in the collective spirit of the Church there is a similar process that identifies values and then directs and binds the community to reach out for them.

The connection between theology and canon law is best seen at the depth where they are born: in the spirit of the Church. Both are generated by the operation of one and the same subject, the Church. They come into existence as diverse fruits of an organic process in which there is a sequence of events. First there is a value judgment in the abstract world of theological knowledge, then a decision follows aiming for an action that impacts on the concrete world. There is one organic process moving from the one stage to another, each stage with its specific production.

We find an analogous play of events if we observe the reception of theological knowledge and of legal commands. There is one subject receiving, the Church. There are two distinct gifts received: one is knowledge that (when assimilated) leads the people into a deeper understanding of the mysteries; the other consists of commands that (when obeyed) dispose the people to accept God's gifts. This organic process of reception can be successful only if the natural sequence of events is respected: the people should become aware first of the values that sustain and nourish the life of the community, and then they should be given the command of the law for the acquisition of the same values.

The relationship explained.

To our second question we can now give an answer organized in a systematic fashion. Each of the following paragraphs represents a thought unit: they converge toward a full picture.

• The Church is the active agent that generates both theology and canon law. As the Church receives divine mysteries, the faith of the Church seeks understanding, and the resulting knowledge is theology. The faith of the Church seeks also balanced structures and ordered actions in the community for the ongoing reception of God's gifts, and the resulting ordinances form the body of canon law. There is one process of generation with two distinct products.

• The Church is the passive agent in receiving both theology and canon law. When theology is received, the people are nourished with knowledge and understanding. When canon law is received, the people are in possession of authoritative guidance toward actions for the appropriation of values. There is one subject to receive the two distinct products.

• In the spirit of the Church there is an organic and ordered sequence from "doing theology" to "making law." First, values must be known and defined, and then action for their acquisition can be imposed. A similar pattern ought to exist in the reception of the laws: the community should come first to an appreciation of the values, and then move to the observance of the norms.

• The Spirit of God, ever present in Christ's Church, guarantees that the memory of God's saving deeds will never be lost, and that the light that the Logos brought into the world will not be overcome by darkness. Hence, at the core of theology there is a participation in God's infallible knowledge. The same Spirit of God protects the Church in its practical decisions so that it can never lose its way toward the fullness of the kingdom, but we have no revelation to tell us that human laws in the Church will always and unfailingly represent the highest degree of prudence. For this reason, canon law has an inner fragility that can be balanced only by its strong attachment to theological values.

• Different dynamics are at work in the interpretation of dogmas and in the interpretation of canonical norms. In our intelligence the meaning of dogmas expands with every new insight into the mysteries—a never-ending process. When we inquire about meaning of a canonical norm, we are searching for a singular action that the norm intends to impose—a process with a precise goal. The two methods are mutually exclusive.

• For a system of laws to be authentic and attractive, it must represent a system of values. In other terms, the structure of the laws must be intimately bonded to a structure of values. Some laws can be directly linked to a specific value; for instance, the prohibition to kill speaks of the value of life. Some other laws must be linked in a general way to the value of good balance and public order in the community; for example, the norms for administrative procedures safeguard justice and protect rights. When a law is not supported by a value, it becomes a destructive force in the community.

• While sound theological and philosophical principles postulate balanced structures and coordinated actions in the Christian community, they do not demand the exclusive use of any particular legal system. The fact that the Roman Catholic Church is using the concepts and institutions of classical Roman law is due to historical circumstances. In an ecumenical age, the catholicity of the Church may eventually require a broader approach to the creation of order in the community.

• The relationship between theology and canon law can be best summarized by saying that in theology the Church contemplative is speaking to the people, and in canon law the Church active is guiding the faithful. There are not, however, two churches; one and the same Church is contemplative and active. There is a season for reflection and there is a season for action. The two operations blend into one but without losing their distinctive characters: they mutually support each other. They together reveal something of the internal life of God's covenanted community.

THE ECCLESIAL VOCATION OF CANON LAWYERS

The ecclesial vocation of canon lawyers is determined by the tasks that they are called to perform in the Church. Such tasks alternate on the level of theory and practice but they are organically connected.

• They have the task to identify the values the community needs in order to prosper: for this they have to enter the field of theology. They must be thoroughly conversant with the theoretical judgments of value, and they must have the capacity to discern the ones that need promotion and support by legislation.

• They must be able to assess the existing capacity of the community to appropriate a given value and to live by it; if this capacity is not there, the legislation will be a failure. This is a prudential judgment concerning a concrete situation. Of course, we are not talking about universal Christian values that the community must accept, but about particular values that allow choices.

• They must have the literary skill for the drafting and interpretation of legal texts.

• They must be observers and prudent judges of the encounter of the abstract, general, and impersonal legal norms with the concrete, particular, and personal situations; it is there that the suitability of the law for promoting life in the community reveals itself. They must be able to be of assistance for the application of the correctives of law, such as epiky (epikeia, epieikeia), equity, and economy (oikonomia).

• Finally, a task of creativity: canon lawyers should be in position to suggest changes in our laws and, as the spirit of the times demands it, propose provisions for new needs in the community.

• To sum up: the ecclesial vocation of canon lawyers is to be trustees for much of the practical operation of the Church; for this they need good theological knowledge of the mysteries, a realistic perception of the practical strength of the people, a creative talent to articulate the needed norms, and a capacity to form prudential judgments to interpret and implement the laws. Thus, and only thus, will canon lawyers implement "the supreme law in the Church" which is "the salvation of souls" (c. 1752).

Frederick R. McManus

A canonical commentary must of necessity deal with a succession of individual norms, laws, and statutes. This is especially true of a codified style of law like the Code of Canon Law of the Latin church. Such law is properly considered in text and context, considering that context in the broadest sense possible.

Nonetheless, it is equally sound to survey the universal canon law as a whole, in particular as it develops and changes even in short periods of time, such as during the decade and a half since the 1983 promulgation of the Latin or Western church's code. The survey or overview should be done selectively and broadly, if only not to encroach on the other two introductory essays in this volume or on the commentary regarding the canons themselves.

The broad principles which guided the revision of the 1917 code, as agreed upon in 1967 and as asserted in the papal constitution of 1983, Sacrae disciplinae leges, place this body of law, this code, in perspective. It is a perspective that changes in the course of time, a course of time now shortened by the instant, worldwide communication of the churches in the 1990s.

As one prenote, the Christian and Catholic canon law comprises much more than a simple collection of canons common to the Latin church. After all, even the concept of canonical codification is still a novelty, dating only from the beginning of the twentieth century. Codification has its strengths, but is wrongly misconceived as if the code were the only church law. Even more is this problematical because—aside from the liturgical law and the church-state or concordat law outside the code—the Catholic canon law embraces all manner of particular law of the churches at every level: diocesan, provincial, national, regional. In the future, we may, and indeed must, pray that in the providence of God it will embrace as well the law of the churches with which we are not now in full Catholic communion.

Second Vatican Council

This brings us to the critical themes of the Second Vatican Council by which our code and later developments must be judged, whether at the time of promulgation in 1983 or today, almost two decades later. This is a point admirably made and repeated in the mid-eighties by the Latin code's lawmaker, Pope John Paul II, Bishop of Rome.

There was much to be learned from Vatican II, whether as the partial source text of the present Latin code or of subsequent enactments. Certainly the new definition of the Church itself in terms of communion and collegiality, mystery and people, was the chief lesson, coupled with an innovative summons to church dialogue with today's human society. Another insight, in article six of the very significant decree on ecumenism Unitatis redintegratio, had been almost alien to modern orthodoxy and orthopraxis, namely, that the Church always stands in need of reform and reformation. Rather pragmatically, this openness to change can be viewed in the canonical developments, good and bad, strong and weak, in the period since 1983.

There are different ways to judge the success or failure of the 1983 code as it stands, always in the light of the most general of the modern general councils. Sometimes the multifold themes of Vatican II were expressed negatively, perhaps most famously when the German Frings denounced a curial dicastery as a scandal to the Church and the Belgian DeSmedt decried the Church's triumphalism, juridicism, and clericalism.

The critique of the Roman Curia was partially answered in the papal reform of 1967, only slightly reflected in the 1983 code, and again partially answered in a second papal reform of 1988. The ongoing problems of juridicism and triumphalism were answered in some measure by the greater canonical concerns, now called pastoral, for charity and service to the people of God, by mitiga-tions or omissions of some more rigid norms, and by attribution of the threefold office of Christ—priest, prophet, shepherd—to all believers. Clericalism, developed over nearly two millennia, has also been happily weakened through the concepts of the basic equality of the baptized, the common priestly ministry of all Christians, and the universal call to holiness.

The council, moreover, was characterized by the absence of condemnations. From the first words uttered by John XXIII on October 11, 1962, it was a positive expression of what the Church is and how its mission of evangelization can be achieved only by the most open and free dialogue with the totality of human culture and society.

The work of reforming and recodifying the 1917 code which governs the Latin church was announced in 1959, along with the council, but had to await action until the council was completed in 1965. The first broad determination of the code's style and content—in a way, how to deal with a changed postconciliar Church—was agreed upon in 1967, with general principles approved by both Paul VI and the Roman synod of bishops assembled that year as "representative of the whole Catholic episcopate."

At that time a series of important principles for the revised code was derived from conciliar teaching: pastoral tone and purpose; charity as well as justice; fundamental equality of believers in their rights (and responsibilities), with power or authority seen as service; and the major principle of subsidiarity, whether in view of the local churches in which the ecclesia is present or in their corporate groups, especially the national conferences of bishops acting on behalf of groups of particular or local churches.

Then a series of necessary but somewhat secondary considerations was listed in those principles of 1967: the retention of the code's juridic character but with better protection of rights; better coordination of internal and external forums; the (exceptional) non-territorial personal jurisdictions; fewer and simpler penalties and fewer reservations of canonical faculties and the like; development of administrative or executive procedures and powers.

In promulgating the 1983 code in the apostolic constitution Sacrae disciplinae leges, John Paul added a new stress on key elements of the project: the concept of Church as people of God and as communio; collegiality and primacy; participation of all in the threefold office of Christ, with a definition of the rights of all Christians, especially the non-ordained; and commitment to ecumenism—although in fact this last element was barely touched on in the code itself.

Reform of the Roman Curia: Pastor bonus

Two major reforms in the departments or dicasteries of the Roman Curia took place in this century prior to the 1983 revision of the code. One was accomplished by the apostolic constitution of Pius X Sapienti consilio (1908), the second by the apostolic constitution of Paul VI Regimini Ecclesiae universae (1967). The latter of course responded to some of the severe criticisms of the Curia by the fathers of Vatican II. Unlike the 1917 code, which took more than twenty canons to define the competence of congregations, tribunals, and offices of the Curia (CIC 242–264), the 1983 code has only two canons on the curial institutes (cc. 360–361).

In part the limited number of canons is due to the fact that a further curial reform was under way in 1983; hence the reference to a forthcoming special law. Immediately prior to the 1985 extraordinary session of the Roman synod of bishops, John Paul II consulted with the college of cardinals on the subject. (He did not, however, formally consult on the point with the synod.) Similarly, the conferences of bishops were invited to offer recommendations. The result is the apostolic constitution Pastor bonus of June 1988, which is now printed as an appended document in the codes of both East and West.

The pattern of Pastor bonus is familiar and traditional: a substantial and valuable introduction followed by almost two hundred articles of norms, general and particular. The introduction is a historical and theoretical exposition, especially important for its treatment of the meaning of service or diaconia in the Church, along with the conciliar restoration of the concept of communion; the Church as both collegial and primatial; and the pastoral office of the bishop as shepherd of the particular church with a relation to another bishop, the Bishop of Rome, who fulfills the Petrine or primatial ministry of service. After a summary of the history of the Roman Curia, including the creation of the body or college of cardinals as papal electors, the constitution deals with the present situation of that Curia.

The Second Vatican Council had defined the pope's Curia in positive ways, partially picked up in the canons:

> In exercising the supreme, full, and immediate power over the universal Church, the Roman Pontiff uses the dicasteries of the Roman Curia which then carry out their function—in his name and by his authority—for the good of the churches and in service to the sacred pastors [bishops].

This primary text was from article nine of the conciliar decree on the office of bishops in the Church Christus Dominus. There it was immediately followed by a listing of the several reforms desired, new patterns adapted to contemporary needs in names, competence, procedures, and coordination, with membership of cardinals and bishops from diverse lands. This was the reform undertaken by Paul VI in 1967 and developed further two decades later in Pastor bonus.

The concluding paragraphs of the constitution's introduction are an admirable statement of the curial role and responsibility. They touch on its ministerial and vicarious character; the importance of collegiality, especially with respect to the episcopal college's solicitude for the whole Church; the value of particular usages and practices which by divine law pertain to the pastors of local or particular churches; curial support of the unity of the Church, of faith, and of discipline; and more.

There are, perhaps inevitably, certain contrasts between theory or doctrine and the detailed, concrete norms which constitute the bulk of Pastor bonus. These deal with the many departments called dicasteries (congregations, tribunals, councils, with a few secondary institutes). In principle, at least, all the dicasteries enjoy equal juridic status. Only a very few of the general norms need be pointed out here.

For ordinary or regular sessions of the dicasteries, it is enough that members (that is, the cardinals and bishops) resident in Rome be present; for plenary sessions (annual if possible), all the members must be present. Matters of major importance are reserved to general assemblies of this kind.

Aside from judicial sentences, all decisions of major importance must also be submitted for approbation by the Roman Pontiff unless special faculties have already been given to the head of a dicastery. No laws or general decrees with the force of law or derogations from law may be issued without the specific approbation of the Roman Pontiff. Nor is anything "grave and extraordinary" to be undertaken without prior notification of the pope. Regular relationships with particular churches and conferences of bishops should be fostered by seeking their counsel in the preparation of general documents of major importance. Questions proposed to dicasteries should be studied carefully and answered without delay, or at the very least acknowledged.

Practical regulations of this kind are positive and fruitful. They are chosen here, however, because of some indications that they are not observed all the time, in spirit or letter. In general, a measure of tension will inevitably exist between the Roman Curia and the particular churches—and often enough between that Curia and the groups of particular churches, the groups which for the past century and more have gathered in conferences of bishops. The interposition of the new synod of bishops, superior to the college of cardinals in Christus Dominus 5 and in the code, and not a part of the Curia at all, has been seen as a possible resolution of such tensions—but this has not developed as yet.

Catholic Higher Education: Ex corde Ecclesiae

In August 1990 John Paul II issued an apostolic constitution, Ex corde Ecclesiae, on Catholic universities and other postsecondary institutions of higher learning; it was complementary to canons 807–814. Published after several years of consultation with conferences of bishops and responsible college and university officials, the constitution had been prepared prior to the death of Paul VI and had been somewhat enlarged by Pope John Paul II. In its final version it spoke more strongly of Catholic higher education as an instrument of evangelization. This fits in well with the council's brief treatment in its declaration on Christian education. There, in Gravissimum educationis 10, a goal was expressed:

> Thus [through Catholic colleges and universities] there is accomplished a public, stable, and universal presence of the Christian mind in total commitment to the furtherance of higher culture. The students of these institutions are formed as men and women truly outstanding in learning, ready to undertake weighty responsibilities in society, and witnesses to the faith in the world.

The papal constitution of 1990 was well received in the academic community of the Church for its doctrinal exposition in the introduction and first part, on the identity and mission of service of Catholic higher education. But the second, canonical or dispositive part, the general norms, raised questions that are not yet resolved.

Background

Before the constitution is examined a little more carefully, two prenotes are needed.

First, in the 1917 code all of Catholic higher education (except seminaries) was governed by a single title of canons about "schools" at every level—elementary, middle, and higher (CIC 1372–1383). There was only a first step toward clarifying distinctions among these "schools," in particular by reserving to the Apostolic See the establishment of institutions which grant degrees with so-called canonical effects.

By the time of Vatican II, the nomenclature was clearer, helped by an apostolic constitution of Pius XI in 1931, Deus scientiarum Dominus. That document raised the standards of faculties and universities in the "sacred" sciences and set such institutions apart. In article ten of the conciliar declaration Gravissimum educationis, it was taken for granted that Catholic colleges and universities belonged to a broad, general category corresponding to the same institutions in the general academic world. "Faculties of sacred sciences" or "ecclesiastical faculties" (or even universities) were distinct: they were in the religious field and related areas; they were approved by the Roman See; and, perhaps most important, their degrees were granted by authority of that same Apostolic See. In the 1983 code it became even clearer: distinct chapters of canons were devoted to "Catholic" (and, in a sense, "non-ecclesiastical") higher education (cc. 807–814) and to ecclesiastical universities and faculties, often, but less properly, called pontifical (cc. 815–821).

Second, this excursus on nomenclature was necessary because the constitution Ex corde Ecclesiae was preceded by a parallel papal document, Sapientia christiana of 1979, released just prior to the promulgation of the code. Sapientia christiana was to be complementary to the new canons on ecclesiastical universities and faculties. The constitution had both the usual theoretical and expository sections and then more than ninety normative articles, as well as related articles, more than sixty in number, from the Congregation for Catholic Education.

Again, in the pattern to be followed by the code, the ecclesiastical faculties and universities were distinct from the much more numerous Catholic institutions of higher education. Nevertheless, the traditions of the former were maintained, with Roman control understood to have special meaning in the papal responsibility for degrees with canonical effects.

The New Law for Catholic Colleges and Universities

In turn, Ex corde Ecclesiae of 1990 followed a similar pattern, especially in the elaborate consultation that took several years and included a congress in Rome, with representatives from episcopal conferences and representative college and university heads. The latter came, for example, from the International Federation of Catholic Universities and, for the United States, from the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities. Various proposals affected the final shape of the constitution: a lengthy exposition of the nature and purpose of Catholic higher education—received favorably in the church and academic community, as already mentioned—and a relatively small body of normative articles, only seven in all, with another four transitional norms.

In passing, a few of the expository matters may be mentioned as particularly welcome to the academic community. One is the assertion of both academic freedom and institutional autonomy. Another is the inclusion of the essential characteristics of Catholic postsecondary institutions in terms formulated by the international federation as early as 1972: Christian inspiration of individuals and of the educational community as such; reflection and research on human knowledge in the light of Catholic faith; fidelity to the Christian message as it comes through the Church; institutional commitment to service of the people of God and the human family.

The document was welcome because of the expression of priorities—over and above specific missions, such as evangelization, as mentioned above, cultural dialogue, and service to society through teaching and research. The priorities were expressed in terms of the institution being both a college or university and Catholic, first the noun, then the adjective, as it has often been put. This was meant to define Catholic higher education as truly satisfying the expectations of academe in human society but always institutionally committed to the Christian and Catholic message.

The positive reception of the bulk of Ex corde Ecclesiae did not extend to all of the attached norms by any means. The series of canonical requirements or norms asked, first, for concrete application by the conferences of bishops and, second, for some kind of inclusion of the canon law of Ex corde Ecclesiae and its national applications in the foundational documents of individual institutions. The principal questions, still unresolved, relate to the present diversity of the institutions in their foundation, reporting requirements in relation to church authorities, proportions of Catholic teachers, ecclesiastical approbation of regulations of individual institutions, and sharper definitions of ecclesiastical vigilance or control. An issue that has grown in importance, although not enjoined by Ex corde Ecclesiae itself, is the procedure for the concession or acknowledgment of the mandate of canon 812 for teachers of theological disciplines—and, more significantly, procedures for revocation of this mandate. (A parallel problem, also not enjoined by the constitution itself, relates to the application of the oath of fidelity upon undertaking an ecclesiastical office to be exercised in the name of the Church in the case of "teachers in any universities whatsoever who teach disciplines which deal with faith or morals"—as described in connection with Ad tuendam fidem below.)

Problems are associated with the mandate itself: whether or not it is a novel intrusion into educational autonomy; whether or not it means new authoritarian control by church authorities; whether or not it might lead to loss of academic integrity and repute or of civil recognition and even loss of state aid. This is why an application of the constitution Ex corde Ecclesiae in the United States has not been achieved after nearly a decade. In 1996 the National Conference of Catholic Bishops almost unanimously enacted the required national ordinances—eleven juridic norms couched in pastoral language, in three sections each preceded by a rationale. The decree of the conference, however, under the title, "Ex corde Ecclesiae: An Application to the United States," did not receive the recognitio from the Apostolic See. Now the conference is left to develop new legislative norms or applications if these can be agreed upon.

Ecumenism: Directory

The canonical treatment of matters ecumenical in the 1983 code may appear meager, at least in quantity (cc. 755 and 844), given the intrinsic significance of such developments during and after the council. The importance of ecumenism has been recognized at every level of the church community, in liturgical sharing, in dialogues, and in programs. At the level of the Roman See, this was acknowledged by John Paul II in a brief reference in the apostolic constitution Sacrae disciplinae leges and eloquently in the encyclical letter Ut unum sint of 1995. The latter, while addressing doctrinal and pastoral rather than disciplinary changes, is most notable for seeking dialogue with church leaders and theologians about the forms in which the papal or Petrine primacy can be better exercised. Such dialogue could doubtless lead to profound changes in church institutions and canonical discipline.

The chief concrete development—aside from all the universal and particular ecumenical dialogues—is found in the March 1993 "Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms of Ecumenism." This superseded the earlier directory, which had appeared in two parts (1967 and 1970) and was issued by the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, as the former Secretariat has been called since 1988. Although still reflecting the canonical weight and force of directories and general executory decrees (c. 33), the 1993 document has a final note indicating its approbation, confirmation, and promulgation by authority of John Paul II.

So far as canonical discipline is concerned, the revised directory serves as a kind of compendium of regulations applying both the conciliar decrees and the canons without introducing new legislation as such. The discipline includes institutional or structural organization of ecumenical activity of the Catholic Church; Catholic ecumenical formation (formerly the subject of part two of the directory in 1970, but now broadened); liturgical and spiritual activity (including the potentially troubling areas of sacramental sharing); and ecumenical cooperation by way of dialogue and witness.

The disciplinary and institutional elements of the directory are valuable, but more significant is the underlying exposition or rationale. This runs throughout the directory, but is also found in a new first chapter on "The Search for Christian Unity." Paragraphs 9–36 cover such matters as the Church as communion, divisions among Christians and the re-establishment of unity, the complexity and diversity of the ecumenical situation, and sects and new religious movements. This substantive chapter supports and justifies the Catholic ecumenical discipline that is set forth and explained in later chapters.

One final note. This directory may also be judged as reflecting little radical change since the 1983 code, although it was article six of the conciliar decree on ecumenism, Unitatis redintegratio, which declared once for all that the pilgrim Church of Christ always stands in need of constant reform. The pontifical council, while juridically equal to other dicasteries of the Roman Curia, must submit the agreed statements of international dialogues and even such regulations as this directory to the scrutiny and judgment of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. In effect, this congregation is thus a brake upon the ecumenical initiatives of Vatican II.

As a broad example of this potential problem, article eight of the same Unitatis redintegratio offers two principles for sharing (once communicatio in sacris), especially eucharistic sharing, first, as the sign of the Church's unity, second, as participation in the means of grace. The first principle, not yet achieved, may forbid sharing; the second may commend it. The directory, like canon 844 and the code's norms on mixed marriages, attempts to strike a balance—but of course the positive side to ecumenical progress may dictate further and perhaps radical change in this discipline.

"Collaboration of the Non-Ordained": Interdicasterial Instruction

This curial document, which was issued in August 1997, is unique in several ways. It bears the signatures of the moderators (prefect, pro-prefect, or president) and secretaries of six congregations and two pontifical councils; it is properly called interdicasterial or interdepartmental. It cites a good number of pertinent canons and liturgical norms as well. And it is approved by John Paul II, not in the usual or common form, but in the now rarer specific form (in forma specifica). This surely adds to its juridic weight, although it is still categorized as only an instruction under the precise terms of canon 34.

The breadth of the document—with a foreword and a series of theological principles leading up to thirteen practical articles and a conclusion—is evident from the full title: "Instruction on Certain Questions Regarding the Collaboration of the Non-Ordained Faithful in the Sacred Ministry of Priests." The Roman congregations which joined in preparing the document are, in the order given in the text, those for the clergy, the laity (a pontifical council), the doctrine of the faith, divine worship and the discipline of the sacraments, bishops, the evangelization of peoples, institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life, and the interpretation of legislative texts (a pontifical council).

The title of the interdicasterial instruction is susceptible of a positive and indeed an expansive meaning, namely, one of increasing and enlarging juridical norms for lay participation in the Church's ministries, including the ministries otherwise reserved to bishops and presbyters. For the most part, however, just the opposite is true in both the theological principles and the "practical provisions."

This does not mean that the 1997 instruction omits any positive exposition of the role of the non-ordained. For example, the impetus given by Vatican II and the papal magisterium to lay ecclesial involvement is acknowledged, and "a full recovery of the awareness of the secular nature of the mission of the laity" is therefore sought. The areas of the Church's mission involving the non-ordained are enumerated: culture, arts and theater, scientific research, labor, means of communication, politics, the economy, etc. Other tasks closely associated with the "more restricted area" of the "sacred ministry of the clergy" are called "the great field of complementary activity" of non-ordained persons. These include the teaching of Christian doctrine, certain liturgical actions, and the care of souls.

Undoubtedly the thrust of the instruction, again both in the sections of theoretical elaboration and in the practical norms, moves in a very different and retrogressive direction. This is apparent in the constant definition of limits to lay participation or collaboration and especially in the singling out of aberrations or abuses in almost all the thirteen articles of dispositive "provisions," most of which are divided into subsidiary paragraphs.

The reception of the instruction by the church community in 1997 was largely negative, less because of prescriptions derived from canon law than because of the tone and direction of the document. This negative reaction was expressed by several conferences of bishops, with the assertion that the aberrations alleged had not been experienced in their territories.

The Roman response to this negative reaction or failure in ecclesial reception was twofold. First, it was pointed out that the abuses and aberrations were actually absent in some and possibly in most places, although this fact would hardly explain the general or universal character of the instruction or the specific papal approbation. Second, it was explained that the prescriptions in the practical section were simply gathered from prohibitions in the current church law. This assertion was only partly supported by the abundant citations of canons and other sources in the text of the document. Whether the selectivity or almost uniformly prohibitory nature of the selected norms can be explained in this way is something else, to be taken up below.

Theological Principles

The theological principles of the instruction fall under four headings:

(1) "The Common Priesthood of the Faithful and the Ministerial Priesthood." The emphasis here is on the different modes of the faithful's participation in Christ's priesthood, without denying the universality or dignity of the whole community's participation; the ministerial priesthood is rooted in the apostolic priesthood, and the ordained are entrusted with "the authoritative proclamation of the word of God, the administration of the sacraments, and the pastoral direction of the [non-ordained] faithful."

(2) "Unity and Diversity of Ministerial Functions." The functions of the ordained are next affirmed to be "a single indivisible unity in virtue of their singular foundation in Christ." The exercise of the threefold munera is therefore "the essence of pastoral ministry," and the exercise of some such functions, in a limited degree, by the non-ordained "does not make pastors of the lay faithful."

(3) "The Indispensability of the Ordained Ministry." Here the opening principle is that "a canonical or juridical determination made by hierarchical authority is necessary for the exercise of the munus of teaching or governing." Thus the ministerial priesthood is needed for a community to exist as "Church," else a community would lack the essential "exercise and sacramental action of Christ." Two pastoral demands are a consequence: the promotion of vocations and proper seminary training.

(4) "The Collaboration of the Non-Ordained Faithful in Pastoral Ministry." Finally, the instruction recognizes the collaboration in question as "mutual enrichment of the common Christian vocation." It distinguishes rights and duties of the non-ordained as, first, "those which are theirs in virtue of their secular condition" and, second, those which are "along the lines of collaboration with the sacred ministry of clerics" and to which they therefore have no right. These latter ministries may be entrusted to them, within limits and by deputation, when the ordained ministers are not available—with the hope that the abuse of multiplying such "exceptional" cases will be avoided.

Practical Provisions

As already mentioned, the larger part of the interdicasterial instruction is a recital of abuses or improper practices. This section is often but not always documented from the present law, with frequent comments and interpretations. Nowhere is the role of the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts, one of the participating dicasteries, spelled out, and there is no suggestion of authoritative or "authentic" interpretation of the sources for the practical provisions. Yet the council's role lends greater credence to the provisions so long as the law itself—disciplinary, liturgical, or other—rather than some simple recommendation or exhortation is cited.

The practical provisions range from the question of appropriate terminology for ministry, offices, and functions all the way to the possible leadership role at funerals. The latter is a good example of the regular approach to specifics in the instruction: the failure of presbyters and deacons to preside at funerals is explained as related to "growing dechristianization" and "abandonment of religious practice," but the possibility of non-ordained presidency by deputation is recognized "provided that there is a true absence of sacred ministers and that they [the non-ordained] adhere to the prescribed liturgical norms." Article nineteen of the introduction to the Order of Christian Funerals is then cited.

Other examples can be selected in which the juridic source of a norm is explicitly mentioned, such as the canons on lay preaching in churches or oratories or canon 517 on the deputed exercise of pastoral care by lay persons, to be viewed as exceptional and never replacing the role of the parish priest. In almost every case, however, cautionary language is added to a norm. This is done regularly to emphasize the exceptional nature of the case of the non-ordained person who is deputed for one or other ministry proper to the ordained.

More problematic, in the series of practical provisions, are cases in which the commentary may go beyond the current law and introduce new restrictions. For example, "Any ceremony associated with the deputation of the non-ordained as collaborators in the ministry of clerics must not have... a form analogous to that of the conferral [sic] of lector or acolyte." "Homilies in non-eucharistic liturgies may be preached by the non-ordained faithful only when expressly permitted by law." "To avoid any confusion between sacramental liturgical acts presided over by a priest or deacon and other acts which the non-ordained faithful may lead, it is always necessary to use clearly distinct ceremonials, especially for the latter."

It is not that such examples are lacking in logic or reasonableness, but they are fresh injunctions or the like which may exceed the law in force. The same might be said of the proscription of titles employed for the non-ordained even when they are properly deputed: pastor, chaplain, coordinator, moderator. Or: "The non-ordained faithful or a group of them entrusted with a collaboration in the exercise of pastoral care cannot be given the title of 'community leader' or any other expression indicating the same idea."

Without further examples, it should be evident that the instruction is pervasively negative or cautionary or restrictive in direction and purpose. This may be said without asserting that abuses or improper practices do not exist in the Church universal.

A last point may be made: it would probably have been possible to achieve many of the purposes of the 1997 instruction in entirely different and indeed opposite ways. This could have been done through a positive enumeration of all the potential roles and ministries of the non-ordained, with positive encouragement of everything from preaching to presidency at non-eucharistic rites. A further step or stage would have involved more profound exploration of such matters as the exercise of the power of governance (potestas regiminis) to see whether the responsibility of the non-ordained might be objectively expanded in the light of historical precedent and the openness of Vatican II. Legal options in many areas, ranging from judicial offices to deliberative votes in councils and conferences, could be assayed in this fashion.

Profession of Faith: Ad tuendam fidem

The decade and a half after the 1983 codification saw radical developments affecting the received profession of faith, in particular as it is obligatory for those listed in canon 833. At the time of the promulgation of the code, the profession of faith in possession was that of 1967. It consisted of the Nicene-Constantinopolitan creed—common to the Catholic Church and most other Christian churches and ecclesial communities and of course celebrated each Sunday by the eucharistic assembly in the Roman and other rites. One brief paragraph was added to this creed in 1967:

> I firmly embrace and accept > all and everything which has been either defined by the Church's solemn deliberations > or affirmed and declared by its ordinary magisterium concerning the doctrine of faith and morals, > according as they are proposed by it, > especially those things dealing with the Holy Church of Christ, > its sacraments and the sacrifice of the Mass, > and the primacy of the Roman Pontiff.

As is evident, this single added paragraph referred to the teachings of the modern ecumenical councils and was formulated in the light of Vatican II. It replaced the lengthier additions made after Trent and Vatican I; it also replaced the antimodernist oath of 1910.

The substantial changes since the code of 1983 took place in two stages over almost a decade.

First Stage

The first development was in 1989 and was itself twofold. The 1967 addition to the creed was replaced by three new paragraphs, to be affirmed by those bound by canon 833. At the same time a new discipline—an oath of fidelity for certain church office-holders—was introduced. All this occurred by decree of the Roman Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith in the fall of 1989; while the original document was undated and unsigned, without reference to any prior papal approval, this canonical deficiency was later sanated.

The text of the first and third new paragraphs added to the creed itself was closely related to the 1983 code, canons 750 and 752 respectively; the second paragraph, however, was an innovation:

> 1. With firm faith I believe as well everything contained in God's word, written or handed down in tradition and proposed by the Church—whether by way of solemn judgment or through the ordinary and universal magisterium—as divinely revealed and calling for faith.
> 2. I also firmly accept and hold each and every thing that is proposed definitively by the Church regarding teaching on faith and morals.
> 3. Moreover, I adhere with religious obsequium of will and intellect to the teachings which either the Roman Pontiff or the college of bishops enunciate when they exercise the authentic magisterium, even if they proclaim those teachings by an act that is not definitive.

The other part of the 1989 decree was a canonical innovation, in this case an oath of fidelity—derived from a variety of sources—for those persons who undertake an ecclesiastical office "to be exercised in the name of the Church." It affected and affects those church officeholders enumerated in canon 833, nn. 5–8, the canon which requires the profession of faith. But the oath was an entirely new obligation and thus a burden on certain persons in the church community. At this point, moreover, the application of the second added paragraph of the creed to members of the Church other than ecclesiastical officeholders was not at issue; such a development would have to await the next stage.

Second Stage

These details have been spelled out so that the 1998 development, the second stage, will be clear. This fresh development was a matter of a change in the code(s)—both the doctrinally based discipline affecting all the members of the Church (both Western and Eastern) and the introduction or expansion of penalties. In this case, the basic action took the form of an apostolic letter, issued motu proprio in May 1998 by John Paul II.

The letter Ad tuendam fidem offered the traditional exposition of the rationale for the papal action. In particular, it noted that the 1983 code had omitted the matter contained in the second paragraph of the text newly attached to the creed in 1989. This omission was rectified by adding a new second paragraph to canon 750 of the Latin code as well as to canon 598 of the Code of Canons of the Eastern (Catholic) Churches:

> Each and every thing which is proposed definitively by the magisterium of the Church concerning the doctrine of faith or morals, that is, each and every thing which is required to safeguard reverently and to expound faithfully the same deposit of faith, is also to be firmly embraced and retained; therefore, one who rejects those propositions which are to be held definitively is opposed to the doctrine of the Catholic Church.

The key words are "proposed definitively" and "to be held definitively." The principal change was to make the new norm—embracing and maintaining certain doctrinal propositions—binding for all the Christian faithful who are obliged to observe the canons of the codes, that is, not merely for those obliged to make the 1989 profession of faith. Determining the extent to which this is a serious enlargement of obligations of assent, distinct from but closely related to divine and Catholic faith (the first paragraph of the profession of faith and the respective c. 750 and CCEO 598), will be a task of theologians: perhaps they must develop clearer interpretations of "definitive" teachings. Equally important and difficult is the study of individual teachings to determine which ones belong to each of the three categories of the three appended paragraphs and now in the canons of the codes.

The second new law addressed in Ad tuendam fidem is likewise troublesome; it addresses the "just penalty" (ferendae sententiae) to be imposed on those persons who violate canon 750, §2, that is, the new canonical text about doctrines "definitively" to be held. With the added reference, the Latin church penal canon 1371 now reads:

> The following are to be punished with a just penalty:
> 1° in addition to the case mentioned in canon 1364, §1 [apostasy, heresy, schism], a person who teaches a doctrine condemned by the Roman Pontiff or an ecumenical council or who obstinately rejects the doctrine mentioned in [the new] canon 750, §2 or in canon 752 and who does not retract after having been admonished by the Apostolic See or the ordinary.

In effect, the just penalty of canon 1371 (and also the parallel penalty in the Eastern canon 1436, §2) has been extended to include those who obstinately reject definitive teachings. This extension, though logically flowing from the 1989 revision of the profession of faith, has been considered troublesome because the just penalty threatened by the canon can range from the slightest to the ultimate, namely, excommunication from the Christian community.

The apostolic letter Ad tuendam fidem of John Paul II thus flowed from the decision to ratify the 1989 revised profession of faith and specifically its inclusion of a different level of church teaching of truths related to Christian and Catholic faith. These teachings are at the next level down from the divine and Catholic faith of canon 750 (and the first paragraph appended to the creed), but at a level superior to teachings which are described in canon 752 (and in the third paragraph) as proclaimed without a definitive act of the authentic magisterium.

Accompanying the papal document but dated a few weeks later was a commentary from the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. The weight of the curial document, signed by the prefect and secretary of the dicastery but without any mention of papal action or approval, still remains considerable, at least because of its intrinsic argument.

The commentary is a lengthy and helpful discursus on the apostolic letter and its purpose. A single instance may be quoted from the clarifications:

> 8. With regard to the nature of the assent owed [by all the faithful] to the truths set forth by the Church as divinely revealed (those of the first paragraph) and to be held definitively (those of the second paragraph), it is important to emphasize that there is no difference with respect to the full and irrevocable character of the assent which is owed to those teachings. The difference concerns the supernatural virtue of faith: In the case of truths of the first paragraph, the assent is based directly on faith in the authority of the word of God (doctrines de fide credenda); in the case of truths of the second paragraph, the assent is based on faith in the Holy Spirit's assistance to the magisterium and on the Catholic doctrine of the infallibility of the magisterium (doctrines de fide tenenda).

Having explained the diversity of the relationships between the "definitive" doctrines and revealed truth, the commentary offers a series of examples. Those listed as belonging to the "definitively to be held" category are of greatest interest: understanding of papal infallibility before Vatican I; reservation of priestly ordination to men; illicitness of euthanasia, prostitution, and fornication. These teachings are said to fall into the category of definitive teachings because of their logical relationship to revelation itself. Others in the same category are those related to revelation by historical necessity: legitimacy of the election of the pope; legitimacy of the celebration of an ecumenical council; canonization; the declaration on the invalidity of Anglican ordinations by Leo XIII. The selection of examples, and certainly the last example, was quickly challenged in the theological community as demanding further study. Differences have long existed among theologians on this matter of the binding force of such teachings, generally under the heading of the so-called secondary objects of infallibility.

In summary, in a certain sense the major development involved here was not the 1998 papal action in itself but rather the revision of the canonically required profession of faith in 1989, only a few years after the promulgation of the Latin code—along with the disciplinary norm which introduced a novel oath of fidelity for a large proportion of those already bound by canon 833 to make the profession of faith. However, the recent apostolic letter of 1998 was indeed significant, for it introduced canons binding the whole Church, which require universal acceptance or assent to another category of proclaimed truths under pain of a just penalty for obstinate transgression. This development, however reasonable and logical, has been regarded as an additional and unnecessary burden upon the community of faith.

Conferences of Bishops: Apostolos suos

In May 1998, after more than a decade of consultation and preparation, John Paul II issued an apostolic letter motu proprio Apostolos suos, about conferences of bishops. Its full topic is "the theological and juridical nature of episcopal conferences." With the exception of what are called complementary norms at the end of the papal letter and which constitute new law, the letter is a lengthy, thorough, and doctrinal discourse.

The background is this. In 1985 an extraordinary session of the synod of bishops (that is, one chiefly made up of the elected presidents of the conferences of bishops) was held in Rome to observe the twentieth anniversary of the conclusion of Vatican II. Although not the reason for the gathering by any means, the issue of the nature of conferences of bishops was discussed. It was occasioned in part by the anniversary and in part by a challenge to the teaching office of the conferences of bishops from a minority of synod members, some of whom were members of the Roman Curia. The canonical status of such conferences had of course been revised and determined by the 1965 decree on the pastoral office of bishops Christus Dominus 37–38.

The conciliar decree had long since been implemented by means of the interim motu proprio Ecclesiae sanctae of 1966 and then with a definitive redaction in the 1983 code. The relationships of episcopacy and primacy were also threshed out in the 1969 extraordinary session of the synod of bishops. And the majority of members of the 1985 synod, "representing the whole Catholic episcopate" and in fact the heads of the conferences, strongly supported the full authority of such bodies and affirmed their pastoral success during the two decades since the council.

Although the synod's final statement was in accord with this majority judgment, it did recommend a study of the nature of such conferences. Pope John Paul entrusted the matter to the Congregation for Bishops, which deals with the conferences on behalf of the Apostolic See in such matters as the recognitio or review of their legislative decrees. The congregation's first draft of the requested study was not well received by some conferences, such as the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in the United States. The apostolic letter of 1998 represents the final step in the process begun in 1985. Many had hoped it would be a strong Roman vindication of the nature and role of the modern institute of conferences.

On the contrary, however, this apostolic letter on "the theological and juridical nature of episcopal conferences" insists very strongly upon the power of the individual bishops of particular churches and thus appears to situate the conferences in a somewhat secondary or ancillary role only—apart from their clearly pastoral, nonbinding decisions. It acknowledges but does not enlarge greatly upon the closely analogous nature of conferences and particular councils (cc. 439–446). The latter seem almost intrinsic to the communion of churches since the second century. Yet, despite what some see as a cautionary and even fearsome tone, Apostolos suos warmly confirms the pastoral worth of conferences of bishops.

Apostolos suos begins with an introductory chapter on the history and development of the communion of churches and the mission of the apostolic college. It is here that the role of particular or regional councils (both provincial and "plenary") is recognized "from the second century on," that is, considerably antedating the first ecumenical council in 325. After a chapter on "Collegial Union among Bishops," including the kinds of joint pastoral action of the local bishops, conferences of bishops are addressed in their modern (nineteenth- and twentieth-century) character, both theological and juridical. A recital of canonical norms in the third chapter is completed by reflections on the teaching office of the conferences.

On the one hand, the teaching office of conferences is limited and can never be equated with a universal magisterium, even though the members are in full communion with the Roman See. One of many concerns, for example, is that the assembled bishops should be "careful to avoid interfering with the doctrinal work of the bishops of other territories, bearing in mind the wider, even worldwide resonance which the means of social communication give to the events of a particular region." Again, problems are seen in doctrinal statements made "in dealing with new questions and in acting so that the message of Christ enlightens and guides people's consciences in resolving new problems arising from changes in society." On the other hand, canon 753 is cited to affirm the authentic magisterium which the Christian faithful of a given nation or region must see in the common pronouncements of their own bishops:

> Although the bishops who are in communion with the head and members of the college [of bishops], whether individually or joined together in conferences of bishops or in particular councils, do not possess infallibility in teaching, they are authentic teachers and instructors of the faith for the Christian faithful entrusted to their care; the Christian faithful are bound to adhere with religious submission of mind [religioso animi obsequio] to the authentic magisterium of their bishops.

To understand the new complementary norms which complete Apostolos suos, it is necessary to refer to canon 455, §4 of the code. This paragraph introduced a norm not found in the conciliar decree Christus Dominus; it constitutes a cautionary and limiting norm. The codal text has just treated general decrees or laws (and general executory decrees) which are disciplinary in nature, and the fourth paragraph adds:

> In cases in which neither universal law nor a special mandate of the Apostolic See has granted the power mentioned in §1 [the enactment of general decrees or laws] to a conference of bishops, the competence of each diocesan bishop remains intact, nor is a conference or its president able to act in the name of all the bishops unless each and every bishop has given consent.

Vatican II had limited the juridically obligatory decisions of conferences of bishops to areas attributed to their competence by law or papal mandate. Outside these areas, disciplinary action "in the name of all the bishops" requires unanimity according to the canon just quoted. Of course this was an application or major extension of the old canonical maxim, "What touches all must be treated and approved by all." In turn, the 1998 letter Apostolos suos decreed an analogous or parallel restriction on the collegial teaching office of conferences. Article 1 of the complementary norms reads:

> In order that the declarations of the conference of bishops referred to in no. 22 of the > present letter may constitute authentic magisterium and be published in the name of the conference itself, they must be unanimously approved by the bishops who are members, or receive the recognitio of the Apostolic See if approved in plenary session by at least two-thirds of the bishops belonging to the conference and having a deliberative vote.

Most exercises of the teaching office by conferences of bishops are not undertaken with any purpose of obliging the Christian faithful of their territory. Nonetheless Apostolos suos does constitute a new restriction upon them in the first article just quoted. The same holds true of the other complementary norms, which, for example, prohibit commissions or other bodies to be deputed to exercise the conference's authentic magisterium.

By way of summary, the analogy between particular councils or synods of ancient Christian times and today's conferences of bishops needs greater exploration. The contemporary institute of conferences differs substantively only in its continuity between assemblies. It also differs, but not intrinsically, in its limited areas of legislative competence. It is surely not impossible, even if unlikely, that conferences of bishops should now have attributed to them the general binding power of particular councils—limited only by requirements of common and universal law and guaranteed by the canonical institute of Roman review or recognitio (cc. 445–446).

The application to conferences of the traditional function of councils, which is not now specified in the canons, needs exploration. Christus Dominus 36, for example, speaks of particular councils very broadly indeed: "The bishops decreed for various churches [including individual churches] the manner to be observed both in teaching the truths of faith and in the ordering of church discipline." Again, the question deserves further study, even while the new norms of Apostolos suos are observed. Whether this expanded conference competency would be considered a concession from the supreme authority of the pope or college of bishops or rather the simple lifting of present reservations is almost immaterial.

A year after Apostolos suos, in May 1999, the Roman Congregation for the Clergy addressed a circular letter to the conferences of bishops. Cautionary in tone and further restrictive, it dealt chiefly with doctrinal statements which might constitute authentic or authoritative magisterial pronouncements. These should not undertake, according to the curial letter, to deal with magisterial matters already in force: "Such teachings or parts of them may be quoted in any document of the episcopal conference or commissions without, however, voting upon them." The review or recognitio of a conference's doctrinal declaration, if not unanimous, belongs to the Congregation for Bishops or the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples, depending on the conference's territory. Should joint or international actions (whether magisterial or legislative) be necessary, the approbation of the Apostolic See is required. Statutes of conferences should be redrawn in accord with the letter and distinguish magisterial declarations from general decrees.

In other matters, for example, the circular letter recommended avoiding bureaucracy in the offices of conferences and asked them "not to replicate at conference level" diocesan curias and other organs. It also asked for a reduction in the number of documents emanating from episcopal commissions. As complementing Apostolos suos, the letter will be seen by many canonists and ecclesiologists as further regression from principles of subsidiarity and of regional collegiality of the bishops.

Conclusion

This limited selection of instances of canonical development from the 1983 code to the present calls for a general, objective appraisal of that development. This appraisal should indicate whether progress or regression has taken place in relation to the teaching and discipline of the Second Vatican Council. Few would consider the ecclesial reform of Vatican II minimal, but even it should be only a starting point for the present and the future.

To begin with, neither the few examples described above nor the numerous other lesser instances that might be adduced contain any direct, explicit reversals of conciliar decisions. In fact, this posture may be a problem: even when a different direction is taken, especially in tone or thrust, there is a strong official reluctance to affirm or acknowledge any change. But it is entirely correct to study how both the canonical codification and contemporary developments truly satisfy the implementation of the will of the Church assembled in council. In fact, the venerable concept of ecclesial reception of councils and of canon law needs to be fully reappraised and restored.

In addition, one properly includes in the overall appraisal both words and deeds, especially those of the Bishop of Rome himself. The latter has offered all manner of indispensable exposition and commentary on the life and mission of the Church, often quite distinct from the specific prescriptions of canon law. In fact, these expositions may be more reasonable than the legal "ordinances of reason" themselves. The same holds true, to a lesser degree, of curial pronouncements. The encyclical letters of Paul VI and John Paul II are the principal and invaluable examples, but the expository parts of disciplinary decrees are worthwhile instances as well.

Among the encyclicals, Ut unum sint of 1995 has already been mentioned. On the one hand, it does not alter the received discipline in matters ecumenical, but—and this would be true on a somewhat lower level of the revised ecumenical directory—the doctrinal or theoretical treatment is the best support to the present discipline. On the other hand, as noted already, this particular encyclical opens the way to all kinds of disciplinary development and institutional change. The warm invitation to reconsider through Christian dialogue the very forms of exercising the Petrine ministry—if pursued in the direction of change—can have immense effects.

Insights in other papal documents, often without any direct canonical effects at all, may offer striking points not to be overlooked even in a canonical overview. An example is the apostolic letter Orientale lumen (also of 1995), which has remarkable affirmations, for example, about Eastern monasticism as a model of baptismal life. In relation to nuns within the Eastern community there is the following striking passage:

> I would also like to mention the splendid witness of nuns in the Christian East. This witness has offered an example of giving full value in the Church to what is specifically feminine, even breaking through the mentality of the time. During recent persecutions, when many male monasteries were forcibly closed, female monasticism kept the torch of the monastic life burning. The nun's charism, with its own specific characteristics, is a visible sign of that motherhood of God to which the Sacred Scripture often refers.

The point is simple: the discipline of canon law may not always demonstrate the positive direction of the Spirit evinced by the Roman Primate. And the canonical developments may sometimes reflect the continued impact of the "prophets of doom" chided by John XXIII and even a serious weakness of confidence in the Spirit-filled community of believers.

Again, genuine progress may be seen sometimes in non-canonical curial developments. Here a noteworthy example is the 1993 document of the Pontifical Biblical Commission entitled "The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church." Praised by John Paul II for its spirit of openness, balance, moderation, and understanding of the word of God as universal, it describes positively the diverse methods and approaches in biblical criticism. Then it analyzes the Catholic interpretation of the Bible within the church community.

The pontifical commission's openness is demonstrated by its favorable analysis of actualization and inculturation in interpretation: first, present-day actualization of biblical interpretation that is done in the light of the "contemporary situation of the people of God" and, second, present-day inculturation according to diversity of place.

Neither concept would have been welcome in the past; they signify true progress. This statement has major implications, not yet realized, for the liturgical hearing of God's word.

Another positive example can be found in a document from the Congregation for the Eastern Churches in 1996, "Instruction for Applying the Liturgical Prescriptions of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches." This has a somewhat more canonical tone—and of course pertains directly only to the East—but it is fully in harmony with the concerns of Vatican II, beginning with the constitution on the liturgy, Sacrosanctum Concilium (1963): the constitution's sound principles but not its Roman rite usages are maintained. A major feature is the repeated call to the Eastern Catholic churches to observe Eastern traditions faithfully and to correct latinization—including theological latinization. One paragraph makes the point: "In the Eastern tradition, the priest, in addition to assisting, must bless the marriage. To bless means to act as the true minister of the sacrament."

When all this has been said, the canonical developments explained above must still be judged—and some judged harshly. The changes in regard to the profession of faith, the regulations of the ministries of the non-ordained, and the restrictions on the teaching authority of the conferences of bishops do reflect retrogression when compared with the expectations of Vatican II. The splendid reflections of John Paul II about Catholic colleges and universities may be seriously compromised by a style of fresh and authoritarian control of academic institutions.

The Second Vatican Council was, to say the least, open-ended. It was a kind of plateau, in some sense only a beginning. It invited advance and surely not retreat.

Any number of recommendations may be made to curb or reverse change that has moved in the wrong direction. One is the strengthening of the collegiality of the episcopate in practice as well as theory, which many see as now denigrated, especially at the national or regional level. A second is to respect genuine subsidiarity, again in fact as well as principle; such respect recognizes the importance of local churches and, in the same spirit of collegiality and conciliarity, the significance of groups or groupings of churches gathered in the conferences of their bishops. Still another is a fresher development of the concept of communion of the equal baptized members of Christ and of their churches. In quasi-political terms, the retrogressive aberrations of the day call for devolution, whether in an expanded local role in the selection of shepherds of the particular churches or in the fuller participation of all the baptized in the threefold offices of prophet, priest, and shepherd.

In terms of institutional development, respect for authentic conciliarity or synodality may suggest widening the responsibility of the conferences of bishops while making certain that the diocesan shepherd guides his community collegially. It may increase the responsibility of the universal synod of bishops as truly taking the part of the total college of bishops effectively. Some of the "general principles" of codal revision now need to be revisited and embraced more fully, whether in the enhancement of the rights of Christians without needless reservations or in the further, radical reduction of penalties and of legalism itself—rather than the opposite.

To some degree these propositions appear to paint a negative or even pessimistic picture. The fact is that the radical and open developments of the Second Vatican Council—perhaps beginning with John XXIII's celebrated initial words on October 11, 1962—must still contribute to the progression of a church community always in need of reformation. A profound demand is trust in divine Providence and the working of the Spirit of God.

A Corpus Iuris Canonici

In promulgating a new common law for all the Eastern Catholic churches, Pope John Paul II drew an anatomical metaphor: "The Church itself, gathered in the one Spirit breathes as though with two lungs—of the East and of the West—and it burns with the love of Christ in one heart having two ventricles."[1] Likewise, during the presentation of that code to the twenty-eighth general congregation of the synod of bishops, the pope accentuated the parity and complementarity of the two codes by stating that the 1983 Latin code and the 1990 Eastern code, along with the 1988 apostolic constitution Pastor bonus, constitute a corpus iuris canonici. While the elements of the corpus are distinct, they are not unrelated. For that reason, Pope John Paul II called for comparative studies of the two codes.[2]

An understanding of both codes is indispensable for Latin and Eastern canonists. It is not possible to retain an inaccurate conception of the Catholic Church as a monolithic, Latin entity, governed by a single body of legislation. To do so is to ignore a significant number of Christian faithful who take pride in their bonds of full communion with the See of Rome.

On a practical level, both codes contain provisions that affect the lives of all Catholics. For example, marriages between Latin and Eastern Catholics are not uncommon. Since each party must observe the requirements of his or her own law, those involved in marriage preparation (or, unfortunately, in annulment processes) must have knowledge of both codes.

In light of Latin canon 17, the parallel passages of the Eastern code can contribute to the interpretation of ambiguous passages in the Latin code.[3] Further, the Eastern code can serve as a supplementary source of law for the Latin church; the arbitration process formulated in the Eastern code (CCEO 1168–1174) is an example.[4]

For these reasons, an overview of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches is appropriately included in this commentary on the Latin code.

Codex Iuris Canonici Orientalis

During Vatican Council I (1869–1870), the need for a common code for the Eastern churches adapted to the needs of the times was discussed, but no concrete action was taken. Only after the benefits of the 1917 Latin code were appreciated was a serious effort made to create a similar code for the Eastern Catholic churches.

During a plenary session of the Sacred Congregation for the Eastern Church in 1927, the project of a codification of Eastern canon law was formally proposed, unanimously accepted, and referred to Pope Pius XI.

After a few years of preliminary work, Pope Pius XI created the Commission of Cardinals for the Preparatory Studies of the Eastern Codification to formulate the first drafts of the future code.[5] To assist the cardinals in the preparatory work, a College of Delegates, comprised of fourteen priests elected by their respective synods, and a College of Consultors, twelve experts in the sources of Eastern canon law, were created to collect and publish the canonical sources.[6] From 1930 until 1936 this commission prepared eight drafts of the various sections of the future Eastern code.

In 1935 Pius XI established the Pontifical Commission for the Redaction of Eastern Canon Law[7] and charged it with revising the drafts in light of the comments submitted by the various consultative bodies. By 1945 this commission had formulated a draft of the entire code, the Codex Iuris Canonici Orientalis.

In March 1948, Pope Pius XII was given a complete draft of the Codex Iuris Canonici Orientalis in a nearly final form. Because some churches immediately needed parts of the new legislation, portions of the canons were promulgated:

Crebrae allatae (CA)—131 canons on marriage promulgated on February 22, 1949; acquired force of law on May 2, 1949.[8]

Sollicitudinem nostram (SN)—576 canons on procedure promulgated on January 6, 1950; acquired force of law on January 6, 1951.[9]

Postquam apostolicis (PA)—325 canons on religious and on temporal goods and the definition of terms promulgated on February 9, 1952; acquired force of law on November 21, 1952.[10]

Cleri sanctitati (CS)—558 canons on rites and persons promulgated on June 2, 1957; acquired legal force on March 25, 1958.[11]

In his 1959 convocation of an ecumenical council Pope John XXIIII indicated that one aspect of the program of aggiornamento would be an updating of canonical discipline. He referred specifically to the forthcoming promulgation of the Codex Iuris Canonici Orientalis, which was to be a forerunner of the great project.[12] However, it soon became evident that the Eastern Catholic common law would also be affected by the forthcoming conciliar reform, so the entire project was suspended.

Out of 2666 proposed canons, a total of 1574 canons were promulgated in the above-mentioned motu proprios. The unpromulgated texts remained in the archives of the preconciliar commission.

Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium

Drafting Process

On June 10, 1972, Pope Paul VI established the Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the Code of Eastern Canon Law (hereinafter referred to as the Revision Commission). The Revision Commission was mandated to revise the promulgated canons and the unpromulgated texts of the Codex Iuris Canonici Orientalis according to the genuine traditions of the Eastern churches and the principles of the Second Vatican Council.[13] For the benefit of canonists, the Revision Commission inaugurated the publication of Nuntia, its official journal that was published in thirty-one issues until 1990.[14]

The first plenary meeting of the Revision Commission took place March 18–23, 1974,[15] during which a set of guidelines was approved that was to provide direction for the codification project.

Guidelines for Revision of Eastern Canon Law

The Guidelines for the Revision of the Code of Oriental Canon Law, approved at the first plenary meeting of the Revision Commission,[16] can be summarized as follows:

1. A single code would serve as a common law for all the Eastern Catholic churches; specific matters would be treated in particular law.

2. The code would be inspired by genuine Eastern sources and be thoroughly imbued with the Eastern canonical tradition; at the same time, the code would have to accommodate itself to current circumstances and needs, especially regarding Eastern Catholics residing outside the original territory of their churches.

3. In accord with conciliar principles, the promotion of the unity of churches would be of primary concern in elaborating the code. The code would need to recognize that the Orthodox churches were called "sister churches" by the council and enjoy the right to govern themselves.

4. The Eastern code would possess a juridical character and not be a mere handbook of dogmatic, pastoral, and moral theology.

5. The code would exhibit a pastoral character with a concern not only for justice, but also for equity and charity. Bishops and pastors would be given reasonable discretion in order to adapt the canonical provisions to their particular needs.

6. The principle of subsidiarity (namely, that what a lower hierarchical institution can accomplish for itself should not be reserved to a superior authority) was to find expression in the code.

7. The notion of rite and the nature and juridical status of particular churches would be examined and juridically articulated in the code.

8. Because of the fundamental equality of all the baptized, the laity would be called to cooperate more directly in the Church's apostolate in liturgy, administration, tribunals, and preaching. Sufficient freedom of expression of opinion and initiative of action would be guaranteed.

9. All Catholics were to observe the same procedural norms. Each Eastern Catholic church would be permitted to establish its own tribunals to deal with cases in all three instances of a canonical trial up to the final sentence.

10. All automatic (latae sententiae) penalties would be eliminated in the Eastern code. Greater emphasis was to be given to the canonical admonition prior to the imposition of a penalty. Conforming to Eastern tradition, a canonical penalty would not be considered only as the deprivation of a good; the imposition of positive acts (penance) would also be considered.

Elaboration and Revision of Drafts

The elaboration of the first drafts began in March 1974 with the approval of the Guidelines and ended with a May 1980 meeting of the central committee. After the eight drafts were prepared and approved by the superior authority, they were distributed to various consultative bodies for comments. Each draft contained, besides the canons themselves, praenotanda (preliminary notes) indicating noteworthy issues and innovations in the text.

[16] The Guidelines are published in English in Nu 3 (1976) 18–24 and CLD 8, 29–39.

After each section had been revised in light of the comments, a comprehensive draft of the entire code was prepared. This draft was transmitted in 1986 to the members of the Revision Commission; their responses were then compiled and distributed to the members.[17]

The second plenary meeting of the Revision Commission, held on November 3–14, 1988, marked the final step of the preparation of a text for presentation to the pope.[18] A draft was presented to him on January 28, 1989, after which additional modifications were made.[19]

Promulgation

The Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium was promulgated by Pope John Paul II with the apostolic constitution Sacri canones[20] on October 18, 1990,[21] and acquired the force of law on October 1, 1991. While practical considerations made it impossible for a "co-promulgation" of the code by the Roman Pontiff and the heads of the Eastern Catholic churches,[22] the manner of its promulgation posed certain ecumenical difficulties since Eastern tradition requires that such a body of law be promulgated by a synod.

Proposals were made that the Eastern code be promulgated with the provision that it would serve until full unity is achieved with the Eastern non-Catholic churches.[23] However, the proposal was not accepted since by its very nature the code requires a certain permanence and stability.[24]

Contents and Structure

The Eastern code contains 1546 canons while the Latin code is made up of 1752 canons. The relative brevity of the Eastern code results from several factors. First, and most important, while the Latin code is both the common and particular law of the Latin church, the Eastern code is only the common law for the twenty-one Eastern Catholic churches; many matters are relegated to the particular law of the various churches sui iuris. Second, there are certain institutions (e.g., the synod of bishops, Roman Curia, Roman Rota, Apostolic Signatura, cardinals, and papal legates) which, though serving the universal Church, are strictly speaking Latin institutions; hence, the Latin canons 342–367 are briefly referred to in the Eastern code (CCEO 46, 48 and 1056). Finally, the drafters of the Eastern code could take advantage of the critiques made of the Latin code and provide a text with greater conciseness.[25]

The Eastern code is occasionally more expansive than the Latin code. The canonical institutions of tradition, rite, and church sui iuris are treated only indirectly in Latin canons 111–112, while the Eastern code treats in a detailed manner these institutes, enrollment in a church sui iuris, and the preservation of rites (CCEO 27–41). The ecclesial groupings of patriarchal, major archiepiscopal, metropolitan, and other churches are extensively treated in the Eastern code (CCEO 55–176), while Latin canon 438 describes the patriarchal office as a prerogative of honor only exceptionally endowed with the power of governance.

Although it might be didactically and academically convenient for the Latin and Eastern codes to be similarly organized, it was felt that theological, canonical, and ecumenical difficulties could arise if the Eastern code followed the Latin code too closely.[26] Reminiscent of the ancient Eastern canonical collections, the Eastern code is divided into thirty titles (each comprising anywhere from

An Overview of the Eastern Code

The following overview will address only those points of the Eastern code that may interest Latin canonists. Hence, those matters common to both codes are omitted, no matter how canonically important for church discipline, e.g., supreme church authority.

Many canons of the Eastern and Latin codes are substantially the same or even verbatim identical. The canons unique to the Eastern code usually result from the different Eastern traditions or the relative autonomy of Eastern Catholic hierarchical structures.

Title

The preconciliar codification project employed the working title of Codex Iuris Canonici Orientalis (Code of Eastern Canon Law), which was retained during the postconciliar revision project: it had been employed in papal documents and was even incorporated in the title of the commission entrusted with the revision.[27] Nevertheless, the aforementioned title posed certain difficulties since it appeared to be only a variation of the title for the Latin code, with the implication that the Eastern code was supplementary to the former. Accordingly, an alternate title was sought.

The title, Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium, fits because the Latin term codex is broadly used to denote a comprehensive systematic arrangement of a body of legislation. The term canon accentuates the code's spiritual character and theological foundation and conforms to the long-standing Eastern usage of the term "sacred canons." The term Ecclesiarum Orientalium (Eastern churches) is appropriate since it generically indicates the communities for whom the law is intended.

Preliminary Canons

The six preliminary canons are similar to the preliminary canons of the Latin code in delineating the legal force of the Eastern code. The first canon states that the Eastern code concerns only the twenty-one Eastern Catholic churches, an explicit exclusion of the Orthodox churches from the obligations of the code. The canon also states, "... unless, with regard to relations with the Latin church, it is expressly laid down otherwise." The Latin church is included not only in those instances wherein it is explicitly mentioned by name (i.e., cc. 37, 41, 207, 322, 432, 696, 860, 916, and 1465); express mention can also be implicit (e.g., cc. 343 and 517, §2). Perhaps the most significant area touching upon Latin-Eastern relations is title II, which addresses enrollment in a church sui iuris and the preservation of rites (CCEO 29–41).

Based on the ancient Eastern laws (CCEO 2), the Eastern code does not generally include liturgical law (CCEO 3); nor does it affect agreements entered into or approved[28] by the Holy See (CCEO 4) or acquired rights or privileges conceded by the Apostolic See (CCEO 5). All common and particular law contrary to the Eastern code or treating matters it re-orders is abrogated; likewise, all customs contrary to the Eastern code but that are neither immemorial nor centenary are revoked (CCEO 6).

Rights and Obligations of the Christian Faithful

In treating fundamental rights and obligations, title I (CCEO 7–26) is quite similar to the Latin code. However, the Eastern code additionally obliges the Christian faithful to adhere to the word of God and the authentic magisterium of the Church, profess it openly, acquire a better understanding of it, put it into practice, and make it fruitful in works of charity (CCEO 10).

[27] An analysis of the significance of the name of the code and the various possibilities and a proposal for a name are found in G. Nedungatt, "The Title of the New Canonical Legislation," in Stud Can 19 (1985) 61–80. See also Nu 28 (1989) 13 and 29 (1989) 30–34.

Churches Sui Iuris and Rites

Title II on churches sui iuris and rites (CCEO 27–41) treats the juridical status of the Eastern and Latin churches and the canonical notions of tradition and rite. Within the Catholic communion, there are twenty-two ecclesial groupings whose hierarchy enjoys a self-governing power that has either been expressly conceded or recognized by the supreme church authority; these ecclesial groupings are designated as churches sui iuris (literally, "of their own right") (CCEO 27). Each of the twenty-one Eastern Catholic churches sui iuris observes a rite, i.e., a corpus of liturgy, theology, spirituality, and discipline, derived from one of the five Eastern traditions: Alexandrian, Antiochene, Armenian, Chaldean, and Constantinopolitan (CCEO 28).

Certain norms treat enrollment in a church sui iuris, transfer from one church sui iuris to another, or the retention of one's rite upon entrance into the Catholic Church (CCEO 29–38), while others articulate the obligation of each of the Christian faithful to foster and preserve the various rites in the Church (CCEO 39–41).

Membership in the Catholic Church is never "at large"; instead, a person is enrolled in a specific church sui iuris, determined according to law. Whether it is a case of reception of baptism or entrance into full communion, membership is determined by the law as a consequence of the act whether or not the baptism or entrance actually occurs in the church sui iuris as stipulated by the law (see c. 111, §2).

Patriarchal Churches

Six of the Eastern Catholic churches are of patriarchal status: Alexandrian, Armenian, Chaldean, Maronite, Melkite, and Syrian. The patriarchal form of ecclesiastical government, recognized by the ancient ecumenical councils, is the most comprehensive expression of the self-governing authority of the Eastern Catholic churches and is structured in title IV, "The Patriarchal Churches" (CCEO 51–150). Two conciliar directives shaped the formulation of these canons: (1) the powers of the Eastern Catholic patriarchs were to be restored to the situation which was operative at the time of the union of East and West; and (2) the patriarchs, along with their synods, enjoy superior authority in their respective churches.[29] Without determining which authority is superior, the Eastern code casuistically delineates the competence of each of these authorities. In general, the patriarch enjoys executive authority; the patriarchal synod is the highest instance of legislative, judicial, and electoral power in the patriarchal church (CCEO 110).

The patriarch is elected by the synod of bishops (CCEO 63) and, if he is already an ordained bishop, is enthroned upon acceptance of the election (CCEO 75) whereby he acquires his office (CCEO 77, §1). However, he cannot validly convoke a synod or ordain a bishop without first receiving a testimonial of ecclesiastical communion from the Roman Pontiff (CCEO 77, §2).

The Eastern code envisions, in addition to the patriarchal synod, the institution of a permanent synod of bishops (CCEO 115–121), i.e., a group comprised of the patriarch and four bishops which functions as an executive committee of the patriarchal synod. It also envisions a patriarchal convocation (CCEO 140–145), a consultative body comprising all bishops, representatives of clergy, male and female religious, universities, and the laity that is convoked every five years.

Eastern Catholics outside Original Territory

Title IV, chapter 7 (CCEO 146–150) regulates the jurisdiction of the patriarch and synods outside the historical territory of the patriarchal churches. For various political, social, and economic reasons, the majorities of several Eastern [29] OE 9.

Catholic churches reside in western countries. At the impetus of Vatican Council II, hierarchies were established to care for those faithful.[30] The population imbalance and the existence of hierarchs outside the territorial boundaries made the issue of the relationship of these communities to the mother church increasingly acute during the codification process.[31]

The relationship between the hierarchs outside the historical territory and the patriarch and synod can be summarized as follows:

The patriarch can validly exercise his power only within the territorial boundaries of the patriarchal church (CCEO 78, §2). In the designation of hierarchs outside the patriarchal territory, the patriarchal synod proposes three candidates to the Roman Pontiff, who then makes the appointment (CCEO 149). Such hierarchs have the same voting power within the synod of bishops in elections, but their voting rights can be restricted by particular law in other matters (CCEO 150, §1).

Legislation enacted by the patriarchal synod of bishops is binding only within the territorial boundaries of the patriarchal church unless: (1) it is liturgical law, in which case it binds all members of the patriarchal church; or (2) it is endowed with the force of law by the eparchial bishop whereby it becomes eparchial law; or (3) it is approved by the Apostolic See in which case it has the force of law everywhere in the world (CCEO 150, §§2–3).

Major Archiepiscopal Churches

The governance of the major archiepiscopal churches (at present, the Ukrainian church and the Malabar church) is treated briefly in title V (CCEO 151–154). The brevity of this title results from the fact that the major archbishop is canonically equivalent to a patriarch except for the patriarchal title itself (CCEO 151) and the requirement that the election of the major archbishop be confirmed by the Roman Pontiff (CCEO 153).

[30] OE 4, 7 and AAS 62 (1970) 179.

[31] See Nu 29 (1989) 227.

Metropolitan and Other Churches

A third kind of church sui iuris, the metropolitan church, is treated in title VI, chapter 1 (CCEO 155–173). The Ethiopian, Malankar, Romanian, and Ruthenian churches have metropolitan structures.

The governance of these churches significantly differs from that of the patriarchal and major archiepiscopal churches. While the patriarchs and major archbishops exercise supra-metropolitan authority (see CCEO 56), the metropolitan exercises only supra-episcopal authority (see CCEO 157, §1). The metropolitan must request the pallium, a sign of metropolitan authority, from the Roman Pontiff (CCEO 156, §1); prior to its imposition, the metropolitan can neither convoke the bishops of his church to the council of hierarchs nor ordain a bishop (CCEO 156, §2).

A council of hierarchs, comprising all the bishops of the metropolitan church, cooperates with the metropolitan in the governance of the church (CCEO 164). The power of this council is more restricted than that of the patriarchal or major-archiepiscopal synod: the council cannot elect the metropolitan or a bishop, but rather proposes three names to the Roman Pontiff who makes the appointment (CCEO 168). The legislative authority of the council is also restricted; its laws cannot be promulgated until they have been received by the Apostolic See (CCEO 167, §2).

Because of the small number (or, in some cases, the total lack) of hierarchical structures, certain churches sui iuris are defined negatively (being neither patriarchal, major archiepiscopal, nor metropolitan) and are placed under the category of "Other Churches" and treated in chapter 2 of title VI (CCEO 174–176). The Albanian, Belorussian, Bulgarian, Greek, Hungarian, Italo-Albanian, Križevci, Russian, and Slovak churches fall under this category.

The hierarch governing these churches acts with authority delegated to him by the Apostolic See (CCEO 175). Further, when the common law remits a matter to the superior authority of a church sui iuris, the hierarch governing this church is the competent authority, but acts only with the consent of the Apostolic See (CCEO 176).

Eparchies, Exarchies, and Bishops

Title VII, "Eparchies and Bishops" (CCEO 177–310), and title VIII, "Exarchies and Exarchs" (CCEO 311–321), treat the fundamental ecclesial groupings of the Church and the episcopacy.

In treating these institutions, the Eastern code employs a terminology appropriate to Eastern usage while the meaning of the terms is substantially identical to that of the Latin code. For example, eparchial bishop is the equivalent of a diocesan bishop (CCEO 177 and c. 369); hierarch is the counterpart of ordinary (CCEO 984 and c. 134). Furthermore, protosyncellus is equivalent to the vicar general (CCEO 245 and c. 475); syncellus (CCEO 246) is the counterpart of episcopal vicar (c. 476). A protopresbyter (CCEO 276) is comparable to a vicar forane (c. 553).

Since they respond to similar pastoral needs and draw upon some of the same canonical precedents, especially the conciliar documents, the canons of this title of the Eastern code are quite similar to their Latin code counterparts.

An interesting addition to the Eastern code definition of eparchial bishops is the reference to the bishops as vicars and legates of Christ (CCEO 178). Bishops are categorized under two headings: eparchial bishops (a bishop to whom an eparchy has been assigned [CCEO 178]) and titular bishops (a bishop who is without an eparchy [CCEO 179], i.e., an auxiliary bishop, a coadjutor bishop, a bishop of the patriarchal curia [cf. CCEO 87], and a retired or resigned bishop [CCEO 210]).

An exarchy is comparable to an eparchy, but is not, for some reason, established as such (CCEO 311); it is entrusted to the pastoral care of an exarch, who functions either in his own name or as the delegate of another (CCEO 312). It is generally governed in a manner comparable to that of an eparchy (CCEO 313).

Assemblies of Hierarchs

The mobility of people has resulted in a plurality of hierarchies of different churches sui iuris established in the same locale. Hierarchs of different churches sui iuris are encouraged to meet to discuss common issues (CCEO 84; 202). Title IX, "Assemblies of Hierarchs of Several Churches Sui Iuris," structures such discussions (CCEO 322).[32]

Clerics

Title X, on "Clerics" (CCEO 323–398) treats those members of the Christian faithful designated as sacred ministers through ordination. Clerics are either in major orders (bishop, priest, and deacon) or in minor orders (distinguished by their function, ecclesial service, and liturgical role). Canonical provisions for minor clerics are generally relegated to particular law (CCEO 323–327).

The first chapter of the title deals with the promotion of vocations and the formation of clerics (CCEO 328–330), seminaries (CCEO 331–341), the admission of candidates (CCEO 342–343), and formation in the minor seminary (CCEO 344 and 346) and the major seminary (CCEO 345–356).

Chapter 2 treats the enrollment (adscriptio) of a cleric (CCEO 357–366) by delineating the various institutes competent to ascribe him (CCEO 357) with the eparchy as somewhat normative (CCEO 358). While ascription is conceived as a permanent arrangement (CCEO 362 and 364), there are circumstances that could necessitate a transfer (CCEO 361) and the law delineates the manner in which the transfer is to be executed (CCEO 359–360; 365–366).

Chapter 3 (CCEO 367–393) delineates clerical rights and obligations while chapter 4 (CCEO 394–398) indicates the causes and canonical consequences of the loss of the clerical state.

[32] There are seven assemblies under the title of "assembly," "reunion," or "conference." See Annuario Pontificio 1997 (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1997) 1103.

Lay Persons

Title XI on "Lay Persons" (CCEO 399–409) opens by defining lay persons negatively, stating that those within this category are Christian faithful who are neither clerics nor religious and whose proper and special state is secular (CCEO 399).

Lay persons have the right to participate actively in the liturgical celebrations of any church sui iuris according to the norms of the liturgical books (CCEO 403, §1). Lay persons are urged to study their own rites in order to foster goodwill and cooperation among the various churches sui iuris (CCEO 405; 40, §3).

Consecrated Life

Title XII, "Monks and Other Religious as Well as Members of Other Institutes of Consecrated Life," (CCEO 410–572) is dedicated to the third "order" or "state" of Christian life and provides in a historical and systematic manner the six institutional and three individual forms of consecrated life as well as societies of apostolic life that are similar but not equivalent to canonical forms of consecrated life.[33]

Chapter 1 on "Monks and Other Religious" (CCEO 410–553) deals with monasteries, orders, and congregations, all of which fall under the general classification of religious institute.

After general canons operative for religious institutes (CCEO 410–432), article 2 is dedicated to monastic life (CCEO 433–503). Since monastic life is the paradigm for religious life, the third article includes numerous references to article 2 in its treatment of orders and congregations (CCEO 504–553). Unlike the Latin code which recognizes eremetical life as separate from an institute of consecrated life (c. 603), the Eastern code defines hermits as members of monasteries sui iuris who have dedicated themselves to contemplation and have separated themselves from the world (CCEO 481).

Chapter 2, "Societies of Common Life according to the Manner of Religious" (CCEO 553–562) treats a form of consecrated life that does not fall under the category of a religious institute. Members of societies of common life imitate the religious state, but do not make religious vows (CCEO 554). The Latin code does not consider these societies within the category of consecrated life (see c. 731, §2).

Chapter 3 (CCEO 563–569) provides the essential framework for the fifth institutional form of consecrated life known as the secular institute, whose members neither make vows nor lead a common life in the manner of religious; instead, they live in communion with each other as they carry out an apostolic activity in the world (CCEO 563).

Chapter 4 (CCEO 570–572) treats three forms of individual consecrated life: (1) ascetics who, not belonging to an institute of consecrated life, imitate the eremetical life (see c. 603); (2) consecrated virgins, women who live in the world and dedicate themselves to virginity (see c. 604) are included in the Eastern code as a category of individual consecrated life; and (3) consecrated widows, an ancient institute (CCEO 570).

The sixth form of institutional consecrated life is the society of apostolic life whose members are without religious vows, but who pursue the particular apostolic life of the society and live in common (CCEO 572). Although such institutions do not, strictly speaking, fall in the category of an institute of consecrated life (see c. 731, §1), their inclusion in this title emphasizes their similarities to institutes of consecrated life.

Evangelization

In conformity with the provisions of Orientalium Ecclesiarum 3, the Eastern Catholic churches are expressly mandated to participate in the evangelization of the non-baptized.

[33] See J. Abbass, "Forms of Consecrated Life Recognized in the Eastern and Latin Codes," in Two Codes in Comparison, 23–56.

Emphasizing that the teaching mission to nonbelievers significantly differs from the ongoing nurturing of the faith of believers, the canons are found in a distinct title (title XIV, "The Evangelization of Peoples" [CCEO 584–594]).

Evangelization, to be undertaken under the guidance of the Roman Pontiff, is primarily addressed at the level of the churches sui iuris whose competent authorities are to establish a commission to coordinate missionary activity; each eparchy is to have a priest to promote the missions (CCEO 585).

Ecclesiastical Magisterium

The preliminary canons of the title "Ecclesiastical Magisterium" (CCEO 595–666) include various facets of the magisterial function not enunciated in the Latin code. Responding to the diversity of circumstances of the Eastern churches, the Eastern code asserts that the manner in which the Church teaches must be appropriate to the time and place (CCEO 601) and that doctrinal diversity should emphasize the catholicity of the Church (CCEO 604). This mission is accomplished through the sciences (CCEO 602) and literature and the arts (CCEO 603).

Theologians are included as a category of persons entrusted with magisterial obligations and rights (CCEO 606). Catechetical commissions at the level of the church sui iuris (CCEO 622) and the eparchy (CCEO 623) are also foreseen.

The various degrees of autonomy of the Eastern Catholic churches are recognized in the approval of liturgical texts (CCEO 657). Without prejudice to the protection of civil law, which may or may not be operative in the regions of the Eastern Catholic churches, canonical protection is offered to the intellectual property of authors (CCEO 666). Canon 666 also distinguishes between ecclesiastical permission and approval.

Sacraments

The most extensive title of the Eastern code, title XVI, "Divine Worship and Especially the Sacraments" (CCEO 667–895) comprises preliminary canons on divine worship (CCEO 667–674), a separate chapter on each sacrament (chapters 1–7), and a final chapter on sacramentals, sacred times and places, veneration of the saints, vows, and oaths.[34]

The section of preliminary canons opens by describing the sacraments theologically (CCEO 667) and regulates the participation of Catholics in non-Catholic liturgical worship (CCEO 670, §1), the sharing of Catholic facilities with non-Catholic Christians (CCEO 670, §1) and communicatio in sacris (CCEO 671).

A minister is to celebrate all the sacraments according to the liturgical prescriptions of his own church sui iuris, but can also receive permission from the Apostolic See (an indult of bi-ritualism) to celebrate the sacraments according to another rite (CCEO 674, §2).

Baptism

The administration of baptism is ordinarily reserved to the pastor (CCEO 290, §2), but a priest of the church sui iuris in which the person is to be enrolled has priority over a pastor and is not to be denied permission to baptize such a person (CCEO 678, §1).

An Eastern non-Catholic can be admitted as a sponsor for a baptism if the other sponsor is a Catholic (CCEO 685, §3). Likewise, a Western non-Catholic (i.e., a Protestant) can be admitted as a witness (c. 874, §2). If the parents are members of different churches sui iuris, the ecclesial membership of the child should be ascertained and recorded in the baptismal register (CCEO 37 and 689, §1).

Chrismation

In conformity with the ancient discipline of the Church, the presbyter is the ordinary minister of [34] See Congregation for the Eastern Churches, Instruction for Applying the Liturgical Prescriptions of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1996).

chrismation (CCEO 694). Eastern presbyters (Catholic and Orthodox) administer chrismation validly to all the Christian faithful, including members of the Latin church (CCEO 696, §1). Likewise, the members of Eastern churches validly receive confirmation from Latin presbyters who enjoy the faculty to administer this sacrament (CCEO 696, §2). In order for the chrismation to be licit, the Christian faithful should approach their proper minister.

Ordinarily, chrismation is administered in conjunction with baptism; if it must be delayed because of necessity, it is to be administered as soon as possible (CCEO 694).

Eucharist

The Eastern code recognizes the tradition of some churches to sanctify Sundays and feast days either through participation in the celebration of the Divine Liturgy or the divine praises as determined by particular law or custom of the churches sui iuris (CCEO 881, §1).

The Eastern Catholic churches are encouraged to restore the practice of administering the Eucharist in conjunction with baptism and chrismation, i.e., infant communion (CCEO 697 and 710).

The concelebration of priests of different Catholic churches is permitted for any suitable reason, especially for manifesting the unity of the churches. Concelebration among bishops and presbyters of different churches sui iuris requires the permission of the bishop in whose rite the liturgy is celebrated. In such a concelebration, each presbyter is to wear the vestments and insignia of his rite, but the same eucharistic rite as that of the principal celebrant is to be used (CCEO 701). Although Catholics may participate in the liturgical worship of other Christians, Catholic priests are prohibited from concelebrating the Divine Liturgy with non-Catholic priests or ministers (CCEO 702).

Penance

Presbyters who have received the faculty of hearing confessions from their proper hierarch (bishop, major religious superior) can validly and lawfully exercise it everywhere in the world and in the jurisdictions of all Catholic churches sui iuris unless forbidden to do so by the local hierarch or ordinary (CCEO 722).

Anointing of the Sick

Among the canons treating anointing of the sick (CCEO 737–742), the Eastern code encourages the preservation of the custom of anointing of the sick by several priests (CCEO 737, §2).

Sacred Ordination

Chapter 6 (CCEO 743–775) deals with the administration of sacred orders. Ordination confers the status of cleric upon certain individuals (CCEO 323, §2); they are distinguished by degrees as bishops, presbyters, and deacons (CCEO 325). While the Latin church abolished minor orders,[35] the institution may be retained in an Eastern church, either for apostolic work or for liturgical functions that are generally regulated by the particular law of the respective church sui iuris (CCEO 327).

Without the permission of the Apostolic See, an eparchial bishop cannot ordain a candidate subject to him who is enrolled in another church sui iuris (CCEO 748, §2). Such a permission is also to precede the concession of a dimissorial letter (CCEO 752).

Marriage

The sacrament of marriage is treated in chapter 7 (CCEO 776–866).

The Latin code exempts Latin Catholics who have abandoned the Catholic Church through a formal act (c. 1117) from the obligation of the canonical marriage form, the impediment of disparity of cult (c. 1086, §1), and the prohibition against mixed marriages (c. 1124). However, the [35] Paul VI, mp Ministeria quaedam, AAS 64 (1972) 534–540.

Eastern code makes no exemption for Eastern Catholics. Therefore, anyone baptized in or received into an Eastern Catholic church must observe the canonical form of marriage (CCEO 834), is subject to the impediment of disparity of cult (CCEO 803), and must obtain permission to marry a baptized non-Catholic (CCEO 813).

Out of respect for the legislation binding non-Catholics, especially Eastern non-Catholics, the Eastern code established an innovation in Catholic canon law by providing a legal framework with which to deal with non-Catholics, both the baptized and the non-baptized. While always taking into account the binding, non-dispensable authority of divine law, the Eastern code states that when a Catholic marries a non-Catholic, the law binding either is to be observed (CCEO 780).

Since by virtue of divine law Catholic doctrine does not permit divorce and successive remarriage, the prior marriage of the non-Catholic must be adjudicated by a Catholic tribunal. The law on impediments and on form to be considered in adjudicating these marriage cases is the law of the respective churches or ecclesial communities binding the parties at the time of the marriage (CCEO 781).

The Latin code refers to the matrimonial contract (see cc. 1055, §2 and 1108, §2). While canonical doctrine requires an appraisal of the marriage in the context of contractual law, it is clear that it is a unique kind of contract, i.e., one that communicates the grace of Christ. To emphasize this unique quality of the marriage, the Eastern code employs the term matrimonial covenant (CCEO 776, §1). Avoiding the use of the phrase to contract marriage, the Eastern code refers to the celebration of marriage (see CCEO 828, §1).

In the Latin church, the ordinary required canonical form is the exchange of consent of the two parties in the presence of a canonically competent local ordinary, priest, or deacon (c. 1108, §1) or, in the absence of a priest or deacon, a lay person (c. 1112) and two witnesses. In the Eastern churches, there is an additional element: the intervention of a priest who blesses the marriage (CCEO 828). This sacred rite is required by all Eastern churches because marriage entails a covenant celebrated between three interested parties: the man, the woman, and God. Within the boundaries of his jurisdiction, a local hierarch or pastor can validly bless the marriages of parties whether or not they are his subjects, provided that at least one party is a member of his church sui iuris; likewise, within the boundaries of his jurisdiction, a local hierarch or personal pastor can validly bless the marriage of parties when at least one of them is his subject (CCEO 829).

While the Latin church affords couples the freedom to choose the parish of either the bride or the groom (c. 1115), the Eastern code reflects the Eastern tradition that the bride follows the groom, and states that the marriage is generally to be celebrated in the parish of the groom unless the particular law of the Eastern church or a just cause excuses (CCEO 831, §2). Further, the local hierarch or pastor can licitly bless a marriage in which at least one party is a member of his church sui iuris in a place exclusively pertaining to another church sui iuris, provided he is within his own territorial boundaries and the hierarch who exercises jurisdiction in that place does not expressly refuse (CCEO 831, §1, 3°).

Even for mixed marriages, the required intervention of the priest cannot be dispensed from in the Eastern Catholic churches except for the most grave reasons. Such a dispensation can be granted only by the Apostolic See or the patriarchs (CCEO 834). On September 21, 1991, to accommodate the pastoral needs of the faithful, papal legates were delegated the faculty to dispense. Even though Latin diocesan bishops may dispense Latin Catholics from the observance of canonical form (c. 1127, §2), they should be sensitive to the traditions of the Eastern churches when called upon to dispense an Eastern Catholic subject from that observance.

An Eastern Catholic (CCEO 834, §2) or a Latin Catholic (c. 1127, §1) can marry an Eastern non-Catholic validly before an Eastern non-Catholic priest. While permission for a mixed marriage and a dispensation from canonical form are required, such requirements are for the sake of lawfulness; their non-observance does not affect the validity of the marriage.

A consequence of the great importance placed by the Eastern churches on the sacramental grace imparted by the celebration of the marriage rite is a difference between the Latin and Eastern codes in recognizing a marriage by proxy. Unlike the Latin code (c. 1105), the Eastern code prohibits marriage by proxy unless the particular law of the pertinent church sui iuris determines otherwise (CCEO 837).

The impediments to marriage are generally the same in both the Latin and Eastern codes with a few divergencies:

1. The diriment impediment of abduction pertains to any abducted person in the Eastern code (CCEO 806) whereas it concerns only an abducted woman in the Latin code (c. 1089).

2. The Eastern code alone maintains the impediment of affinity in the collateral line, that is, marriage with the brothers or sisters of one's former spouse (CCEO 809, §1).

3. The Eastern code alone states that a null or non-existent marriage (the establishment of common life by those who, being bound to the canonical form, have attempted marriage before a civil official or a non-Catholic minister) can also give rise to the impediment of public propriety (CCEO 810, §1, 3°).

4. The impediment of a spiritual relationship (between a baptismal sponsor and the person baptized or his or her parents) is maintained in the Eastern code alone (CCEO 811, §1).

While the Latin church holds that a marriage based on a future condition is invalid, it admits the possibility that the validity of a marriage could be affected by a present or past condition (c. 1102, §§1–2). A conditional marriage, which does not entail the total giving of one's self, logically requires placing the condition above the marriage. Such a view is not consonant with the Eastern notion of marriage; therefore, a marriage based on any kind of condition cannot validly be celebrated in the Eastern churches (CCEO 826).

Baptized Non-Catholics Coming into Full Communion

The Eastern code devotes title XVIII (CCEO 896–901) to the reception of baptized persons into the Catholic Church. While the Catholic Church has disavowed all forms of proselytism or pressured conversions (CCEO 586),[36] the respect for freedom of conscience requires that persons be allowed to embrace the Catholic faith if they desire to do so. Since an imperfect communion already exists among the baptized, the Eastern code requires only what is absolutely necessary for a baptized non-Catholic to become a Catholic (CCEO 896). After receiving suitable doctrinal formation, Eastern non-Catholics are obliged to make only a profession of Catholic faith to be received into the Catholic Church (CCEO 897).

The Eastern code determines the competent authority to receive baptized individuals into the Catholic Church (CCEO 898), articulates certain caveats regarding the reception of minors (CCEO 900), and refers to the required adaptation of these norms when receiving non-Eastern Christians into the Catholic Church (CCEO 901).

Ecumenism

While both codes contain many similarities in the area of ecumenism, the extensive reference to ecumenical concerns in Sacri canones[37] and the inclusion of a distinct title, XVIII on "Ecumenism"

[36] See the statement of the Joint Commission for the Theological Dialogue between the Roman Catholic Church and the Orthodox Church issued subsequent to the Balamand meeting (June 17–24, 1993), "Uniatism, Method of Union of the Past, and the Present Search for Communion." Published in the PCPCU, Information Service 83 (1993) 95–99.

[37] See Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches: Latin-English Edition (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1990) xii–xiii.

(CCEO 902–908) indicate that the Eastern code is much more focused in this area. All Christians are obliged to pray and work for unity (CCEO 902). Eastern Catholic churches have a special obligation to promote unity through prayer and fidelity to authentic Eastern traditions (CCEO 903); each church sui iuris is to establish a commission of ecumenical experts and each eparchy, either individually or united with others, is to have a council to promote Christian unity (CCEO 904). Directors of Catholic schools, hospitals, and other similar institutions are to be attentive to the spiritual needs of other Christians (CCEO 907). In preaching, catechesis, and various forms of social media, special attention is to be given to disseminating accurate information about the tradition of the Catholic and non-Catholic churches (CCEO 906). False irenicism, indifferentism, and excessive zeal are not to be confused with the promotion of Christian unity (CCEO 905). Finally, besides the approved arrangements for communicatio in sacris (see CCEO 671), Eastern Catholic churches should cooperate with the non-Catholic churches in works of charity, social justice, and the promotion of peace (CCEO 908).

Ecumenical issues are also addressed elsewhere in the Eastern code; these issues include Catholic participation in non-Catholic liturgical worship and the sharing of Catholic buildings, cemeteries, or churches with non-Catholics (CCEO 670). Catholic ministers may baptize children of other Christians who lack their own ministers (CCEO 681, §5). Finally, the laws governing non-Catholics who marry Eastern Catholics are operative in the celebration of marriage (CCEO 780) and the laws governing non-Catholic Christians at the time of their marriage are to be considered when adjudicating the validity of their marriages (CCEO 781).

Temporal Goods

Title XXIII, "The Temporal Goods of the Church" (CCEO 1007–1054), treats the acquisition and administration of ecclesiastical goods, contracts and alienation, and pious foundations. In general the title follows the pattern of the Latin code.

In applying the principle of subsidiarity, the Eastern code concedes significant autonomy to the various ecclesiastical authorities. For example, the eparchial bishop may set the amounts for taxes and offerings to be made in connection with the celebration of sacraments (CCEO 1013); in the Latin church, such amounts are set by the provincial bishops (c. 1264). Another case is the establishment of a maximum amount regarding the alienation of property: while the Latin code determines that the episcopal conference establishes the maximum limit beyond which the permission of the Holy See is required (c. 1292), the Eastern code allows the patriarchal synod of bishops to establish this limit (CCEO 1036).

Eastern autonomy in temporal administration is also exemplified by the several references to the particular law of the various churches sui iuris. Certain matters in the Eastern code are governed by that law, while the Latin code determines that they depend on the particular law of the conference of bishops which must be reviewed by the Apostolic See.

Procedural Law

Procedural law is treated in title XXII, "Recourse against Administrative Decrees" (CCEO 996–1006); title XXIV, "Trials in General" (CCEO 1055–1184); title XXV, "The Contentious Trial" (CCEO 1185–1356); title XXVI, "Certain Special Procedures" (CCEO 1357–1400); and title XXVIII, "The Procedure for Imposing Penalties" (CCEO 1468–1487).

At the beginning of the revision process, one guideline adopted by the Revision Commission was that all Catholics should observe the same procedural norms.[38] Hence, the canons of both codes are notably similar. The differences between them generally result from the differences in the hierarchical structures of the Latin and Eastern churches.

Canons 1062 and 1063 of the Eastern code establish tribunals that are unique to the Eastern patriarchal churches. The patriarchal synod is the superior tribunal of the patriarchal church inside the patriarchal territory (CCEO 1062, §1), with due regard for the right of appeal to the Roman Pontiff (CCEO 1059) and the reservation of certain cases to him (CCEO 1060). This tribunal is comprised of three bishops, elected for a five-year term (CCEO 1062, §2) and is competent to judge contentious cases of eparchies or bishops (CCEO 1062, §3) and cases reserved to the Roman Rota in the Latin church (CCEO 1405, §3, 1°). Among these bishops is a general moderator who exercises vigilance over the tribunals inside the patriarchal territory (CCEO 1062, §5); in the Latin church the Apostolic Signatura exercises such vigilance (CCEO 1445, §3, 1°). The patriarch is to establish not only the patriarchal synod but also a tribunal of the patriarchal church, distinct from his own eparchial tribunal, to judge certain cases in the first and succeeding instances (CCEO 1063).

In addition to first instance tribunals for several eparchies of the same church sui iuris (CCEO 1067), a common first instance tribunal may be established to adjudicate contentious and penal cases of the faithful of those churches in the territory (CCEO 1068).

Another uniquely Eastern canon treats the recruitment of judges and tribunal personnel. An Eastern Catholic bishop can appoint members of other eparchies of his church sui iuris or of another church sui iuris to serve in his tribunal (CCEO 1102).

Sanctions

The Eastern code does not include latae sententiae censures, i.e., incurred automatically with the commission of the delict. In the Eastern Catholic churches, penalties must be imposed (ferendae sententiae) judicially or administratively (CCEO 1402).

Conclusion

This brief exposition of salient points of the Eastern code has attempted to demonstrate that there is a beautiful variety of churches within the Catholic communion of churches. Awareness of disciplinary diversity not only serves the Latin and Eastern Catholic churches, but perhaps can also reassure those Eastern Orthodox churches that are wary of absorption into a Catholic monolith.

BOOK I
GENERAL NORMS
[cc. 1–203]

INTRODUCTION

John M. Huels, O.S.M.

As the title "General Norms" suggests, the canons of Book I treat fundamental principles and technical rules that have general application to other parts of the code and the science of canon law in general.[1] Knowledge of these rules is essential for canonists and church administrators, especially bishops, other superiors, and curial officials. For pastoral ministry, the more important sections are those treating dispensations (cc. 85–93), physical persons (cc. 96–112), and the power of governance (cc. 129–144), and secondarily those on laws and customs (cc. 7–28).

The 203 canons of Book I are divided into eleven titles. To understand the systematic arrangement of the topics addressed, some fundamental canonical concepts must be understood. The first of these is the power of governance. As in civil governments, the power of governance of the Church is divided into legislative, executive, and judicial powers. The power of governance is the subject of a distinct title in Book I (title VIII), but in fact the entire code and all other universal and particular norms of the Church, including the laws that regulate the offices of teaching (munus docendi) and sanctifying (munus sanctificandi), pertain to the office of governing (munus regendi). Book I is mainly concerned with rules governing legislative and executive powers, while judicial power is the subject of Book VII.

Another fundamental concept is that of "law" itself. Latin and the major European languages have two words to express what in English is conveyed by the single word "law." The Latin word lex is specific and means law as legislation, the norms enacted by a legislative authority. The word ius is generic, referring to law in a broad sense, and is used for any kind of normative rule: divine law, ecclesiastical law, customs, statutes, rules of order, norms issued by executive authorities such as the norms contained in documents of the Roman Curia and individual administrative acts. Ius also has a subjective sense, in which case it is translated as "right," as in the rights of the faithful, the rights of clergy, etc. Because English translates both lex and ius (in its objective sense) as "law," the technical precision of the Latin is lost, and mistakes in interpretation can be made. Ordinarily the Latin text of the law must be consulted whenever the word "law" appears in English to determine which meaning is intended.

With these fundamental concepts in mind, it becomes clear that the first five titles of Book I treat different sources of ius.[2] The first three titles treat norms that have a general application: title I on laws, which are acts of legislative power; title II on customs, which are norms introduced by the community itself; and title III on general decrees of legislative power and general executory decrees and instructions, which are norms of executive power. Title IV treats acts of executive power that have an individual application, given for individual juridic and physical persons. The subjects of title V are statutes, which are norms governing the internal life of juridic persons, and rules of order that regulate the meetings of groups. Title VI treats physical and juridic persons, those who are capable of acting in law. The remaining titles of Book I provide rules for various fundamental matters of the canonical system: juridic acts, the power of governance, ecclesiastical offices, prescription, and the computation of time.

A further terminological issue must be addressed with particular reference to title III, "General Decrees and Instructions." This title, new to the 1983 code, successfully establishes the principle of "legality," meaning that norms of executive power must always be within the law, and they lack all force if contrary to the law. However, from a systematic viewpoint, title III is unsatisfactory. Canons 29–30 deal with legislative decrees, which would fit more logically in title I. Canons 31–34 deal with general executory decrees and instructions, which are specific kinds of general administrative norms, but not the only ones.

[1] Cf. ComCICRec, Schema canonum libri I de normis generalibus (Typis Polyglottis Vaticanis, 1977), Praenotanda, p. 5.

[2] The term ius vigens refers to all binding norms currently in force, including customs and administrative norms.

The term "general administrative norms" is not found in the code but comes from canonical doctrine (the writings of canonists).[3] General administrative norms are the norms found in documents of the Roman Curia and other executive authorities. They are called "general" because they are directed to a general audience, as opposed to individual administrative acts which affect only individual juridic or physical persons. General administrative norms may be divided into two categories. Executory norms, namely, general executory decrees and instructions, depend on the laws they execute, explain, and expound upon. Title III treats only this category of general administrative norms. However, there are many norms in documents of the Roman Curia that have no direct relationship to a specific law. They are aptly called independent norms, because they are independent of the law, though not contrary to it.[4] The lack of a systematic treatment of general administrative norms in title III is not simply a matter of theoretical inelegance but has practical consequences, because it makes the task more difficult for the Church at large to understand the role and assess the weight of the norms contained in the numerous juridical and pastoral documents issued by the Roman Curia.

The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches includes many of the canons of Book I of the Latin code, but they are arranged much differently, since the Eastern code is not organized into books. A notable difference in the Eastern code is the absence of anything comparable to title III of the Latin code on general decrees and instructions.[5]

Laws and Customs: Canons 1–28

Canons 1–6 show the relationship of the 1983 code to other juridical realities of the Catholic Church. Canons 7–22 establish rules governing ecclesiastical laws in general. Canons 23–28 establish rules governing customs, in particular how they achieve the force of law. In this commentary on canons 1–28, references to ius are noted in the Latin while the word "law" is reserved for lex, for the act of a legislator, except where "law" is followed by ius in parentheses, or when using the standard expressions "canon law" (ius canonicum) and "divine law" (ius divinum).

[3] We rely in particular on the work of E. Labandeira, Tratado de derecho administrativo canónico, 2nd ed. (Pamplona: EUNSA, 1993). It is also published in Italian, Trattato di diritto amministrativo canonico (Milan: Giuffrè, 1994).

[4] They are given by authorities who have executive power within their competence. See c. 479; PB 62, 72, 86, 94, 105, 115. Like executory norms, independent norms lack all force if they are contrary to the law.

INTRODUCTORY CANONS
[cc. 1–6]

Canons 1–6 treat the relationship of the code to other juridical realities: the law of the Eastern Catholic churches, liturgical norms, agreements with states and political societies, acquired rights and privileges, customs, and the universal and particular norms in existence at the time the code went into force in 1983. These canons are basically the same as they were in the first code of 1917. The first six canons of the Eastern code are comparable, but the material treated in canons 5 and 6 of the Latin code is greatly simplified in canon 6 of the Eastern code; canon 2 of the Eastern code provides a rule parallel to canon 6, §2 of the Latin code, but in different words.[6]

A Code for the Latin Church

Canon 1 — The canons of this Code regard only the Latin Church.

The Roman Catholic Church consists of twenty-two autonomous (sui iuris) churches, formerly called "rites," each with its own hierarchy, traditions, and discipline. All of these churches, while remaining juridically distinct, are united under the headship of the bishop of Rome, the pope. This initial canon sets forth the fundamental rule that this code pertains only to the Latin church sui iuris. Consequently, it does not bind the members of the Eastern Catholic churches, notwithstanding some canons that allude to them.[7] The twenty-one Eastern churches sui iuris have their own particular norms and customs as well as a code of law common to all of them, the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.

The 1983 code frequently refers to a church sui iuris as a "rite," but since the promulgation of the Eastern code in 1990, the term "rite" is used for the liturgical, theological, spiritual, and disciplinary patrimony of the church. A "church sui iuris" is the institutional entity as a whole with its own hierarchy and particular laws (CCEO 27–28). The word "rite" also is used to refer strictly to the liturgical tradition observed by a church (cc. 846, §2; 923). The Latin church sui iuris observes the Roman rite liturgy or a variation of it, the most notable variation being the Ambrosian rite of Milan. The twenty-one Eastern churches sui iuris observe five different liturgical rites, as follows:

1. Alexandrian rite: Coptic church, Ethiopian church.
2. Antiochene rite: Malankar, Maronite, and Syrian churches
3. Byzantine rite: Albanian, Byelorussian, Bulgarian, Greek, Italo-Albanian, Yugoslavian, Melkite, Romanian, Russian, Ruthenian, Slovakian, Ukrainian, and Hungarian churches
4. Chaldean rite: Chaldean and Malabar churches
5. Armenian rite: Armenian church

Liturgical Norms

Canon 2 — For the most part the Code does not define the rites which must be observed in celebrating liturgical actions. Therefore, liturgical laws in force until now retain their force unless one of them is contrary to the canons of the Code.

For the most part (plerumque), the code does not contain the norms ordering the liturgy. By saying "for the most part," the legislator implies that there are canons of the code that do regulate the [6] Canon 2 of the Eastern code states: "The canons of the Code, in which for the most part the ancient law of the Eastern Churches is received or adapted, are to be assessed mainly according to that law." This and subsequent translations of the Eastern code are taken from Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches: Latin-English Edition (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1992).

liturgy. These are found in Book IV of the code. The legislator also implies that most laws regulating the liturgy are not found in the code. There is another body of universal ecclesiastical law, even larger than the code, called the liturgical law, consisting of norms too numerous and detailed to be included in the code. These laws are found chiefly in the liturgical books. Another important source of liturgical law since Vatican II is the particular laws on the liturgy enacted by conferences of bishops and diocesan bishops (c. 838). Although canon 2 speaks only of liturgical "laws" (leges), the principle stated in this canon also applies to liturgical norms found in documents that are acts of executive rather than legislative power, such as directories or instructions published by a congregation of the Roman Curia on liturgical matters.

All the liturgical books and rites contain an introduction,[8] and some contain additional introductions to the various parts of the rites. These introductions, printed in black, have some theological content, but they are largely juridical in nature. Within the rites themselves are found the rubrics, printed in red, giving the precise directions for the proper execution of the rite. Both the rubrics and the juridical norms of the introductions are true ecclesiastical laws, subject to the same general rules for promulgation, interpretation, revocation, and dispensation as all other ecclesiastical laws (cc. 7–21, 85–93).

Liturgical norms promulgated before the 1983 code are not affected by the code, unless they are contrary to the canons. In fact, after the code was promulgated it was necessary to modify seventy-six norms of the liturgical books to bring them into conformity with the canons.[9] It should be noted in this regard that canon 2 is incomplete, for not only were the liturgical norms contrary to the code abrogated, but also abrogated were the liturgical norms that were completely reordered by the code in keeping with canon 6, §1, 4°.

From a purely technical viewpoint, canon 2 is unnecessary because the general rules of canon 6, §1, 2° and 4° are applicable also to the liturgical norms. However, the canon has a kind of pastoral and didactic value in that it alerts the canonist and the Christian community at large to the existence of another major and important body of ecclesiastical law apart from the code.

Agreements

Canon 3 — The canons of the Code neither abrogate nor derogate from the agreements entered into by the Apostolic See with nations or other political societies. These agreements therefore continue in force exactly as at present, notwithstanding contrary prescripts of this Code.

A fundamental rule of international relations is that "pacts must be observed" (pacta sunt servanda). If one government could unilaterally alter a treaty or other mutual agreement, there could be no order or security among nations. This is the principle at the root of canon 3. The code has no effect on any kind of agreements made between the Apostolic See with nations or other political societies, such as the United Nations, UNESCO, the European Union, etc.[10] Even if a canon is contrary to a provision of such an agreement, the latter prevails.

Agreements (conventiones) are of various kinds. A concordat is a general agreement that regulates all the matters of concern to the Church and a particular nation. There are also partial agreements, called protocols, modi vivendi, accords, etc., which regulate various kinds of matters. A chief purpose of them is to secure the rights of the Church—in education, ownership and free use of property, freedom to practice the faith, etc. Some agreements give rights to the State, for example, the right in some countries that the government be notified of the appointment of a bishop before it is announced, but these rights are conceded only if the rights of the Church are recognized by the State.

[8] These go by several names: general instruction (institutio generalis), introductions (praenotanda), and general introductions (praenotanda generalia), although frequently authors simply call them the praenotanda, using the Latin word.

Agreements between the Church and the State are not treaties between nations (between a civil government and the Vatican State), but between a nation and the competent authority of the Roman Catholic Church. The Roman Catholic Church is unique among world religions for its highly developed diplomatic relations with civil governments and its participation in world affairs and representation in world organizations. This uniqueness is due not to the fact that the pope is a temporal ruler of the Vatican State, but to the influence of the Church itself with a billion members throughout the world, a unified governance at the universal level, national hierarchies organized into conferences of bishops, and a global corps of papal legates.

The principle that agreements must be observed can be extended to include, not only agreements between Church and State, but all agreements and contracts entered into between any physical or juridic persons in the Church among themselves or with partners outside the Church.[11] Agreements valid at the time the 1983 code came into force are not affected by the code, even if a provision of the agreement be contrary to a canon.

Acquired Rights and Privileges

Canon 4 — Acquired rights and privileges granted to physical or juridic persons up to this time by the Apostolic See remain intact if they are in use and have not been revoked, unless the canons of this Code expressly revoke them.

The purpose of this canon is to protect certain privileges and rights, already lawfully acquired, from being taken away by the 1983 code. It is an application of canon 9 on the non-retroactivity of law. Privileges granted by the Apostolic See and acquired rights remain effective, even if contrary to the code, unless the law expressly states otherwise.

Acquired Rights

In the context of canon 4, an acquired (or vested) right refers to a right, other than an innate right or a legal right, that a physical or juridic person lawfully acquired before the 1983 code went into effect. There are numerous ways by which a right may be acquired; these include the civil law (c. 22), administrative acts (cc. 48, 59, 76, 85), judicial sentences (e.g., c. 1684), contracts (cc. 192, 1290), prescription (c. 197), a promise to marry (c. 1062), election to office (cc. 147, 178), vows and oaths (cc. 1196, 1203).[12] If an acquired right is contrary to a canon of the code, it is not affected by the code and remains intact unless expressly revoked by the canons of the code. In fact, the code does not explicitly revoke any acquired rights.[13]

An example may help to elucidate the meaning of an acquired right. The 1983 code, unlike the 1917 code, requires that tribunal judges, the defender of the bond, and the promoter of justice have doctorates or licentiates in canon law (cc. 1421, §3; 1435). After the promulgation of the code on January 25, 1983, but before it took effect on November 27, bishops in some dioceses appointed persons to these positions who lacked degrees in canon law. Such appointments, valid under the 1917 code, gave these persons the right to the office, even though they did not meet the requirements of the new law. The right was acquired in virtue of the valid appointment, and this right was not affected by requirements of the new law. An appointment is an administrative act—a singular decree—and since the appointments were valid, the persons appointed to be tribunal officials during this period had a right to assume office, even if they did not begin their duties until after the code took effect when the qualifications for the office had changed.

[13] However, c. 510, §1, without explicitly mentioning "acquired rights," prohibits parishes from being joined to a chapter of canons, and it makes this prohibition retroactive by requiring the bishop to separate any such parishes from a chapter. This is an express revocation, albeit implicit, of a right. Regarding the difference between express, explicit, and implicit revocation, see the commentary under c. 20.

Acquired rights must be distinguished from innate (natural) rights and from legal rights. Innate rights come from the divine natural law; they are innate to every human being from birth and include rights such as freedom of religion, the right to a good reputation, the right of parents to see to the education of their children, the right to choose one's vocation and state in life, and many others. Such rights are inviolable and are never lost, even if abused or denied by human authority.

Legal rights, in this context, refer to rights that come to a person in virtue of ecclesiastical law or legal custom, such as rights given by the code to pastors, clergy, religious, and laity (e.g., cc. 533, §2; 278, §1; 670; 229, §2). Such rights are subject to change when the law changes. Otherwise, any right once given in law would be absolute and could never be changed or removed for as long as the person lived, held office, or remained in the clerical or religious state. For example, under the 1917 code, the pastor had a right to two months of vacation each year (CIC 464, §2), but the 1983 code reduced this to one month (c. 533, §2). A pastor appointed before November 27, 1983 could not claim that he had an acquired right under the old law to continue taking two months' vacation for as long as he held office. Rights coming from the merely ecclesiastical law, like other ecclesiastical laws, are subject to the general rules of canons 6 and 20, not the exception of canon 4.[14] If a right is granted by the ecclesiastical law, and a subsequent law abrogates the law or derogates from it, the right is thereby lost or is modified in accord with the new law.

Legal rights coming from a custom that has the force of law (cc. 23–26) are also not the acquired rights of canon 4. If a right acquired on the basis of a legal custom is contrary to a canon of the code, it is suppressed unless the code expressly provides otherwise or unless the custom is centenary or immemorial, in which case the ordinary may permit it to continue in keeping with canon 5, §1.

Privileges Granted by the Apostolic See

Privileges are treated in canons 76–84. A privilege is a favor that is an exception to the law granted by the legislator or his delegate to a physical or juridic person. The canon refers to privileges granted by the Apostolic See. If such privileges are still in use, they may continue, even if contrary to the code. For example, a few religious orders have a centuries-old privilege of amending their constitutions without getting the approval of the Holy See. This privilege remains intact, despite the requirement of canon 587, §2. The code revokes contrary privileges in four cases: canons 396, §2; 509, §1; 526, §2; and 1019, §2.

Privileges granted by any legislator lower than the pope (or his delegate) are revoked if they are contrary to the code. This is evident by the inclusion of the words "Apostolic See" in reference to the privileges in question. One opinion holds that a privilege, insofar as it is the source of an acquired right, would not be revoked by the code even if contrary to the code and granted by a legislator lower than the pope.[15] While it is true that a right is acquired by a privilege, nevertheless canon 4 specifically distinguishes acquired rights from privileges. The only practical reason for this distinction in this context is precisely to allow for the continuance of apostolic privileges contrary to the code while revoking contrary privileges granted by lower legislators.

[14] It would make more sense systematically (as noted in Münster Com, 4/1) if c. 4 were to follow c. 6.

[15] Com Ex, 1:273.

Canon 4 will continue to be applicable to juridic persons for as long as the code remains in force since, unlike physical persons, juridic persons are by nature perpetual, unless legally extinguished (c. 120). Consequently, the acquired rights and the apostolic privileges of juridic persons are presumed to endure as long as the juridic persons do, unless the right or privilege be expressly revoked.

Contrary Customs

Canon 5 — §1. Universal or particular customs presently in force which are contrary to the prescripts of these canons and are reprobated by the canons of this Code are absolutely suppressed and are not permitted to revive in the future. Other contrary customs are also considered suppressed unless the Code expressly provides otherwise or unless they are centenary or immemorial customs which can be tolerated if, in the judgment of the ordinary, they cannot be removed due to the circumstances of places and persons.

§2. Universal or particular customs beyond the law (praeter ius) which are in force until now are preserved.

A custom is a normative practice of the community introduced by the community itself, unlike a law, which is a norm introduced by a legislator. Canons 23–28 treat customs in general, including the formation of new customs, but this canon treats only those customs in observance at the time the code went into effect in 1983. The canon is really concerned only with customs contrary to the code, but the second paragraph on customs beyond the law (praeter ius) resolves a question about whether the previous law affected such customs or not. This paragraph makes it clear that customs beyond the law, that is, those which regulate a matter not treated in the law, are unaffected by the code.

The concern of the canon, therefore, is with customs contrary to the code, whether universal or particular. A universal custom is one that exists in a majority of areas of the Latin church, for example, the custom of having special decorations in church for Christmas. Most customs are particular, in force in one or more areas or communities but not widespread throughout the Church.

Four categories of contrary custom are distinguished: (1) those that are reprobated by the code; (2) those that the code itself expressly permits to continue; (3) those that are centenary or immemorial; (4) all other contrary customs. The code reprobates contrary customs only in six instances (cc. 396, §2; 423, §1; 526, §2; 1076; 1287, §1; and 1425, §1). These expressly reprobated customs may not be tolerated, even if centenary or immemorial. They are absolutely suppressed by the code and may not revive in the future, that is, they may not become legitimate over the course of time like other contrary customs, unless the law reprobating them itself is abrogated.[16]

In certain instances, the code itself expressly permits the continuance of customs, even those contrary to the norm being expressed in the canon. This may be stated explicitly (cc. 438, 1263, 1279, §1), or contained in a general reference to particular or proper law (ius particulare, ius proprium), which includes customs.[17] The exception may also be expressed without any explicit reference to custom or particular law, for example, in canon 858, §1, which speaks of the right of non-parochial churches to a baptismal font, a right that might be based on a custom.

Centenary customs are those that are at least one hundred years old. Immemorial customs antedate the memory of the oldest persons in the community; they have been observed for as long as anyone can remember. The code has great respect for such long-standing customs. Even if they are contrary to the canons, the ordinary[18] may allow them to continue if he judges, according to the circumstances, that they cannot be removed without causing harm or disturbance in his territory or community. In making this judgment, the ordinary should take into consideration the gravity of the law and the circumstances of the case (cf. c. 90). He also should take account of minority viewpoints and expert opinions to avoid the danger of a decision made more on the basis of politics than of principle. The ordinary may tolerate the custom either explicitly, by decreeing or declaring that the custom may be observed, or tacitly, by being aware of the custom's continued observance and doing nothing to eradicate it.

Finally, all other customs contrary to the code[19] are also suppressed, that is, they may not be lawfully observed. Unlike customs expressly reprobated, all other contrary customs are capable of reviving in the future and may even obtain the force of law after thirty years of observance in accord with canons 24–26.

Previous Laws

Canon 6 — §1. When this Code takes force, the following are abrogated:

1° the Code of Canon Law promulgated in 1917;

2° other universal or particular laws contrary to the prescripts of this Code unless other provision is expressly made for particular laws;

3° any universal or particular penal laws whatsoever issued by the Apostolic See unless they are contained in this Code;

4° other universal disciplinary laws regarding matter which this Code completely reorders.

§2. Insofar as they repeat former law, the canons of this Code must be assessed also in accord with canonical tradition.

The canon intends to provide juridical certainty regarding the relation of the 1983 code to norms previously enacted. It clarifies which of these norms are revoked by the code itself and, consequently, which norms remain in force. Although the canon speaks only of leges, that is, laws promulgated by legislative authorities, it also encompasses lesser juridical norms of executive authorities, such as those in general documents published by the Roman Curia,[20] certain statutes of juridic persons (c. 94, §3), and the proper law (ius proprium) of institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life.[21]

1°. The code of 1917 was abrogated at midnight on November 27, 1983 at the same instant at which the revised code came into effect. This date has great importance in canonical practice, because the validity of juridic acts placed before this date (such as marriages) must be judged in accordance with the law in force at that time, not according to the new law. In addition to the 1917 code itself, all other juridical norms and documents, whether legislative or executive, that were intended to implement the 1917 code are abrogated. With the exceptions mentioned in nn. 2–4 of the canon, all juridical norms contained in documents implementing the decrees of Vatican II are not abrogated, since they are not dependent on the 1917 code.

2°. Also abrogated by the 1983 code are other universal or particular laws contrary to the code, unless particular laws are expressly excepted in a canon of the code. A universal law is given for the whole Latin church by the supreme legislator—the pope or the college of bishops. A particular law is given for a particular territory or community within the Church, for example, the law of a diocese or a region of a conference of bishops. All universal laws contrary to a law of the code are abrogated, and all contrary particular laws are abrogated unless the code expressly makes an exception for particular laws (as in cc. 288; 482, §1; 553, §2; 1470, §1; 1561; and 1653, §1).

[19] These are, namely, the contrary customs that are not expressly reprobated, not centenary or immemorial, or not expressly excepted by the code.

3°. Penal laws enacted by the Apostolic See before the 1983 code went into effect, whether particular or universal, are abrogated. An example of penal laws revoked by the code were the penalties established for violations of certain rules governing the election of the pope.[22] Any penal laws enacted by legislators other than the pope or his delegate remain in force, unless they are contrary to the code. This would be the case, for example, if a diocesan law established a different penalty from the code for the same crime; the diocesan law would be abrogated and the law of the code would prevail.

4°. All universal disciplinary laws in effect before the 1983 code are abrogated if they are completely (ex integro) reordered by the code. A disciplinary law in this context simply means an ecclesiastical law, as opposed to a divine law.[23] A disciplinary law is completely reordered by the code when its entire subject matter is treated anew by the code. For example, canon 844 completely reordered the discipline on sacramental sharing contained in the 1967 Ecumenical Directory.[24] The revocation of law by complete reordering is discussed in the commentary below on canon 20.

The second paragraph of canon 6 provides a principle of interpretation: canons of the code that restate (referunt) the former law must also be assessed in light of canonical tradition. In saying "also," the law implies that the canonical tradition is not the only source for interpretation; there are other principles, as noted below in the commentary on canons 16–19. The canonical tradition refers here to the expanse of time prior to the 1983 code in which a common understanding of a norm emerged by means of the practice of the Holy See and the writings of canonical scholars. Since many canons of the code are not new but were taken up from previous sources, especially the 1917 code and documents of the Holy See issued after Vatican II, the interpreter of the 1983 code must investigate the canonical tradition in order to achieve a well-grounded interpretation of such canons. Sometimes this investigation will reveal that there is no consensus on the meaning of a norm, in which case the interpreter must decide which arguments are more persuasive.[25]

The Latin word refero has several meanings, among them "repeat," "refer to," "reproduce," "represent," "restore," "set forth anew." A canon does not have to repeat exactly the wording of the old law for this principle to apply, so long as the substance of the old law has been legislated anew.

TITLE I
ECCLESIASTICAL LAWS
[cc. 7–22]

The canonical system embraces three bodies of law: divine law, both positive and natural,[26] which [22] Paul VI, apconst Romano Pontifici eligendo, October 1, 1975, AAS 67 (1975) 609–649. This has been replaced by John Paul II with another apostolic constitution that also contains penal laws. See Universi Dominici gregis, February 22, 1996, AAS 88 (1996) 305–343; Origins 25 (1996) 617, 619–630.

[23] A non-technical meaning of "disciplinary law" is used here. It has the same general sense as seen in a number of other canons referring to "ecclesiastical discipline": 305, §1; 326, §1; 342; 392, §2; 436, §1, 1°; 445; 1317. Thus, procedural laws, penal laws, and merely ecclesiastical constitutive laws are also capable of being integrally reordered, although penal laws have already been treated in subsection three. Cf. cc. 86 and 87, §1.

[25] For an illustration of this interpretative principle, see the commentary on c. 18 with respect to exceptions from the law.

[26] The divine law consists of the irreformable truths of the faith, both dogmatic and moral. The divine positive law has its source in revelation, expressed in scripture or tradition; the divine natural law is based on the order of creation and can be known by human reason. Only the supreme authority of the Church can authentically determine what constitutes divine law. See cc. 749–750, 841, is the law of God binding all people; ecclesiastical law, the law of the Catholic Church that binds only Catholics (c. 11); and civil law (c. 22), certain laws of the respective civil jurisdictions that bind citizens of the State. The rules of this title apply to ecclesiastical law, the human laws of the Church. Divine laws, given by God, are unchangeable by human beings; ecclesiastical laws, human in origin, can be created and abolished by the competent legislative authorities of the Church. Canon law in the broad sense (ius canonicum) also includes customs, the subject of the next title (cc. 23–28), and the general norms of executive power, treated in the third title (cc. 29–34).

Although the title of this section indicates that canons 7–22 refer only to legislative acts (leges), many of the rules and principles given here are equally applicable to other written sources of the ius, especially the norms in juridical documents of the Roman Curia or lesser executive authorities.[27] Canon 17 provides the legal basis for extending these rules to other general norms of executive rather than legislative power. Since comparable rules and principles governing such norms are lacking, other than in canons 31–34, it is necessary to look to parallel places in the law, namely, pertinent canons in this first title of the code. Thus, most of what is said here about laws applies equally to general administrative norms contained in documents issued by executive authorities such as directories, circular letters, notifications, instructions, etc. The only essential difference between laws and general administrative norms is the authority that issues them (legislative or executive), and the only practical difference is that norms of executive authority cannot be contrary to the law of the comparable[28] or higher legislator (cc. 33, §1; 34). In particular, the following canons of title I of the code may also be applied to general administrative norms: canons 9; 11–14; 15, §2; 17; and 19–21. Canon 31, §2 makes explicit reference to the applicability of canon 8.

The primary source for title I—with the notable exception of canon 22, which was new to the 1983 code—is canons 8–24 of the 1917 code. The comparable section of canons in the Eastern code is found near the end of that code (CCEO 1488–1505). It contains three canons with no counterpart in the Latin code, canon 1492 on the extent to which the faithful of the Eastern churches are subject to laws of the supreme authority of the Church, canon 1493 that defines "common law" and "particular law" in the Eastern canon law,[29] and canon 1505 stating the principle that the use of the masculine gender includes the feminine unless the ius provides otherwise or it is clear from the nature of the matter.

Title I consists of sixteen canons treating establishment of law (c. 7); promulgation, vacatio, and binding force of law (c. 8); non-retroactivity of law (c. 9); invalidating and disqualifying laws (c. 10); subjects of canon law (c. 11); universal and particular laws (cc. 12 and 13); doubts of law and fact (c. 14); ignorance and error (c. 15); official interpretation of law (c. 16); rules for interpretation of law (c. 17); strict interpretation of law (c. 18); cases involving lacunae in the law (c. 19); revocation of law (c. 20); doubtful revocation of law (c. 21); and the canonization of civil laws (c. 22).

Establishment of Law

Canon 7 — A law is established when it is promulgated.

1075, §1. See also cc. 22; 24, §1; 113, §1; 145, §1; 1059; 1163, §2; 1165, §2; 1290; and 1692, §2.

[27] See J. Otaduy's discussion of this point in Com Ex, 1:296.

[28] Thus, a dicastery of the Holy See may not validly make a norm contrary to a law of the pope, and the vicar general or episcopal vicar may not validly make a norm contrary to a law of the diocesan bishop.

[29] CCEO 1493 states: "§1. Beyond the laws and legitimate customs of the universal Church, this Code also includes by the designation 'common law' (ius) the laws and legitimate customs common to all Eastern Churches.

"§2. Included in the designation 'particular law' (ius) are all the laws, legitimate customs, statutes and other norms of law (ius) which are not common to the universal Church nor to all the Eastern Churches."

A law is a binding norm duly promulgated by a competent legislator for the common good of a community capable of receiving a law.[30] Only a legislator, someone who possesses legislative power, can make a law. The code treats the legislative power of the pope and the college of bishops (cc. 333, 336–337), particular councils and conferences of bishops (cc. 445, 455), and diocesan bishops and their equivalents (cc. 391, §2; 381, §2). The dicasteries of the Roman Curia do not have legislative power; they have executive or judicial power. Only the pope and the college of bishops can delegate legislative power.[31]

A law must be enacted according to the necessary legal formalities. The text of the law must be drafted in writing,[32] approved by the legislator, dated, and signed. Then, the law must be promulgated according to the requirements of canon 8. Finally, the law goes into effect on the established date. Often there are three separate dates marking these various acts: the date of issuance,[33] the date of promulgation, and the date the law has binding force. Likewise, different bodies or officials in addition to the legislator may be involved in these several stages. Decrees of an ecumenical council are approved by the council fathers and confirmed and promulgated by authority of the pope (c. 341, §1). Most of the liturgical rites were promulgated by a decree of the Congregation for Divine Worship on the authority of the pope, who approved them and ordered them to be published.[34] Similarly, a diocesan synod first approves the synodal decrees; the diocesan bishop as sole legislator in the diocese (c. 466) then signs them; and finally the vicar general might see to their promulgation in the manner determined by the bishop.

Laws take various forms in the canonical system: canons of the code, the juridical norms[35] of the introductions and the rubrics of the liturgical books, general decrees (cc. 29–30), the juridical norms contained in certain papal documents such as apostolic constitutions and apostolic letters motu proprio,[36] juridical norms in a document of the Roman Curia approved in forma specifica by the pope,[37] decrees of a diocesan synod promul-

[30] This definition is based on that proposed in earlier drafts of c. 7, which said that a law is "a general norm for the common good of some community given by a competent authority." ComCICRec, Schema Codicis Iuris Canonici (1980) and Codex Iuris Canonici Schema Novissimum (1982). The reference to the community "capable of receiving law" is not strictly necessary because it is implicit in the notion of the "competent legislator." It is added because it is contained in the definition of general decrees (c. 29), which are laws. It clarifies that not all communities and groups in the Church are capable of receiving a law and, consequently, that the legislator has no power to make laws for these communities as such, even though, as individuals, they are subject to his authority and to the applicable laws of his jurisdiction.

[31] Canons 30, 135, §2; PB 18, §2.

[32] The pope sometimes makes a change in law orally, and this change is then reported by the Secretariat of State and published in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis.

[33] This is the date listed at the end of a juridical document. Often it is a major feast day or the anniversary of some important event. Rarely does the date of issuance actually coincide with the date the document is first distributed to the public.

[35] Besides the juridical norms, the liturgical books and many documents of the Holy See also contain statements of a doctrinal, or theological, nature. The latter pertain more to the discipline of theology and the munus docendi, the former more to the discipline of canon law and the munus regendi, although canonists and theologians alike have an interest in all the norms of church documents.

[37] Ordinarily, the pope approves a curial document in general fashion (in forma communi), which means that the document remains an act of executive power of the curial dicastery that authored it. If he approves it in forma specifica, he gives the juridical norms of the document legislative force. For documents published since 1992, gated by the bishop (c. 466), etc. Moreover, certain acts, such as authentic interpretations of the law (c. 16, §2) and statutes (c. 94, §3), can be given legislative force. The form of the law, or the document in which the law is published, has less juridical significance than the authority who makes the law. All universal laws, for example, have exactly the same juridical value, or weight, regardless of the form in which they are published. However, there is a hierarchy of legislative authorities that makes a real difference in the weight of the laws. The laws of the pope or an ecumenical council (the supreme legislators) are higher than all other ecclesiastical laws; the laws of plenary councils and conferences of bishops are higher than those of provincial councils and diocesan bishops; the laws of provincial councils are higher than those of diocesan bishops. No legislator may validly make a law contrary to a ius of a higher legislator.[38]

The legislator may make a law only for a community capable of receiving the law, as discussed below at canon 25. A law is given by the legislator for the community; it has a general character and applies to everyone equally for whom it is made (e.g., all pastors in the Latin church, all religious in the diocese, all the faithful in the episcopal conference region, etc.). The bishop, for example, could not make a law prohibiting an abuse in one parish while allowing it to continue in all others; that would not be a law, but a precept (c. 49), an individual administrative act (cc. 35–93). He could make a law for one parish if the law governed a matter unique to that parish, for example, a law regulating a parish shrine or cemetery.

Law is normative; it is binding. If law were not binding, it could not achieve its end, which is to serve the common good, providing harmony and unity in a society. By establishing rules that all the members of the society are obliged to follow, conflicts in the society are minimized and may readily be resolved by turning to the law itself for the solution, or to the authority who is competent in law to decide the matter. Canon law binds in conscience,[39] unless there are causes that excuse from observance, and in the external forum (the visible life of the Church). Because canon law is binding in conscience, it is not necessary to legislate penalties for the violation of the law, except for serious crimes where penalties are required for the common good. Rather, the faithful are called voluntarily to submit to the demands of the law out of respect for Christ's Church and in the hope of salvation, which is the ultimate goal of canon law (cf. c. 1752).

A characteristic of canon law is its rationality, that is, its reasonableness (cf. c. 24, §2),[40] which means it serves a useful purpose and upholds the common good. This characteristic of reasonableness is not a formal requirement for the creation of law, because a law can be validly made and will externally or formally bind the community even if it is not reasonable. However, the law must be reasonable if it is to achieve its purpose, to foster the the precise words in forma specifica approbavit must be contained in the document to verify this special papal approval. See SS, Regolamento generale della Curia romana, art. 110, §4, February 4, 1992, AAS 84 (1992) 201–267; the provision was repeated in the revised Regolamento of 1999, art. 126, §4. See J. Huels, "Interpreting an Instruction Approved in forma specifica," Stud Can 32 (1998) 5–46. Before 1992, specific papal approval was recognized by other formulas, notably ex certa scientia. See V. Gómez-Iglesias, "Naturaleza y origen de la confirmación ex certa scientia," IC 25 (1985) 91–116.

[38] Canon 135, §2 speaks of a higher ius, not a higher lex; e.g., a particular law cannot be validly made if it is contrary to a general administrative norm in a document of the Roman Curia, nor can a particular law be made contrary to a universal custom.

[39] Cf. Comm 16 (1984) 144. Whether a sin is committed by the violation of a given law is a matter for moral theology and pastoral practice, not the science of canon law. Various factors must be taken into consideration in estimating sinfulness, among which are knowledge of the law, deliberate intent to violate the law, the existence of mitigating factors judged in proportion to the gravity of the law, etc.

[40] Thomas Aquinas defined law in part as an ordinance of reason: ordinatio rationis ad bonum commune ab eo qui curam habet communitatis promulgata. STh I-II, q. 90, a. 4.

common good. A reasonable law promotes the welfare of the community, including the individuals who compose it; an unreasonable law is harmful to the common good. Of course, every legislator thinks his law is reasonable when he makes it, but sometimes a well-intentioned law does not live up to the legislator's original expectations. Usually a law is readily received by the community and endures as long as the legislator or his successors consider it useful (cf. c. 20). Sometimes, however, the faithful who are subject to the law, or some of them, find that the law is unreasonable in their circumstances, and an appropriate remedy is sought from the canonical tradition.

The rarest of these "remedies" is the phenomenon of the non-acceptance of law, also known as the non-reception of law, when the majority of the community quietly ignores a law and fails to put it into practice from its very inception, due to the practical impossibility or harm that would come from observing it.[41] Or the law might be accepted in most places, but not in others where a contrary custom develops (cc. 23–27). Likewise, the law initially might be accepted, but could become obsolete or harmful over time and fall into desuetude, the phenomenon known as the intrinsic cessation of law.[42] For good reason, individuals and communities may be dispensed from a law (cc. 85–93); they might be given a privilege exempting them from the law's observance (cc. 76–84); or, in some situations, individuals and small groups may invoke the virtue of epieikeia for justifiable reasons.[43] These phenomena, in some respects unique to the system of canon law, reflect the essential characteristic of the law's rationality. If the law is not serving a reasonable purpose, it is not truly functioning as law should, so an appropriate remedy will be needed, whether this be provided by a competent authority or by the subjects of the law themselves. The subjects of canon law are not passive but are actively involved in determining the law's practical meaning and implementation in the local churches and communities.[44]

Promulgation, Vacatio, and Binding Force

Canon 8 — §1. Universal ecclesiastical laws are promulgated by publication in the official commentary, Acta Apostolicae Sedis, unless another manner of promulgation has been prescribed in particular cases. They take force only after three months have elapsed from the date of that issue of the Acta unless they bind immediately from the very nature of the matter, or the law itself has specifically and expressly established a shorter or longer suspensive period (vacatio).

§2. Particular laws are promulgated in the manner determined by the legislator and begin to oblige a month after the day of promulgation unless the law itself establishes another time period.

Typically, there are several stages of a law's coming into being: (1) the preparation of the text of the law, (2) the approval of the text by the legislator and its issuance on his authority, (3) promulgation, (4) the period when the force of the law is suspended, and (5) the date that the law begins to bind. This canon treats the final three stages. Promulgation is the formal act of publication of a law, which is essential for the law to come into being. If promulgation is omitted or done invalidly, the law has no effect and cannot be enforced. A law does not ordinarily achieve its binding force on the date of its promulgation, but only after a suspensive period called the vacatio legis, literally, the "vacation of the law."

The vacatio is the period between the date of promulgation and the date the law goes into effect. Its purpose is to allow the Christian community some time to adjust to the new law, to make necessary arrangements for administration, catechesis of the faithful, and the like. The normal suspensive period is, for universal law, three months from the date of the issue of the Acta Apostolicae Sedis (AAS) in which the law is published and, for particular laws, one month from the date of promulgation. If the text makes no express mention of the date on which the law is to go into force, then this normal suspensive period is intended, unless by its very nature the law begins to bind immediately.

For a shorter or longer suspensive period, the date the law goes into effect must be expressly stated. Sometimes the suspensive period of a universal law is longer than three months; for example, in the case of a new code that contains many laws, it is necessary to allow more time to get acquainted with and implement them.[45] Some laws bind immediately because of their nature. Among these are laws that are statements of the divine law, authentic interpretations of laws that are merely declarative (c. 16, §2), laws requiring an immediate binding force in order that their purpose be fulfilled, laws that are merely qualifications of or technical points about other laws,[46] laws that are beneficial to the spiritual well-being of the faithful but do not affect the rights of third parties or require any organizational preparation or changes, and laws that revoke an earlier law that has become unnecessary or unjust as a result of a new situation.[47]

Publication in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis, the official journal of the Apostolic See, is the ordinary way in which universal laws are promulgated.[48] The first volume of this journal appeared in 1909. Its predecessor was the Acta Sanctae Sedis, published from 1865 to 1908. The magisterial and juridical texts of the pope and the more important documents of the Roman Curia are published in the AAS in the original language, usually Latin, but occasionally in a modern language like Italian. The language of promulgation is the official version, so any doubts regarding a translation and its interpretation must be resolved by examining the promulgated version. Sometimes the full text of a law is not given in the AAS, but only the decree of promulgation. This is the case, for example, with the laws appearing in the liturgical books and rites, which are published separately by the Vatican Press. At other times, an entire book of laws is published in the AAS, as in the case of the two codes, the Code of Canon Law and the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches. The pope can also choose other means of promulgation, for example, by publication of the text in L'Osservatore Romano.

Particular laws are promulgated by whatever method the legislator chooses; they begin to bind one month from the date of promulgation, unless something else is expressly stated.[49] A diocesan law, for example, could be promulgated by its publication in the diocesan newspaper or newsletter, by being sent to all the parishes or to all juridic persons, etc. A document containing numerous laws, such as the diocesan synod might draw up, should be promulgated by a general decree of the diocesan bishop (c. 29); it suffices to publish the decree while making the document available only to those concerned. The mode of promulgation for [45] The vacatio for the 1983 code was from January 25 to November 27, 1983. For the Eastern code, it was from October 18, 1990 to October 1, 1991.

[47] Münster Com, 8/4–8/5.

[48] The 1917 code, c. 9, required publication in the AAS only of laws given by the Apostolic See, whereas this code requires all universal laws, including the laws of an ecumenical council, ordinarily to be so promulgated. The former code also made no provision for the promulgation of particular laws.

[49] CCEO 1489, §2 specifies no vacatio for laws by legislators other than the Apostolic See, but leaves this to the legislators themselves to prescribe.

the law of a particular council or conference of bishops is also determined by the legislators in question (cf. cc. 446, 455, §3), for example, by sending the law to all the diocesan bishops.

Although they are acts of executive rather than legislative power, general executory decrees must likewise be promulgated in accord with the requirements of canon 8 (c. 31, §2). This rule would also apply to other general administrative norms given for the community, whether by the dicasteries of the Roman Curia or other lesser executive authorities. Such norms, given for the community, function in the same way as laws, though of lesser authority, and so must be formally made public to the community. Usually the documents of the Roman Curia containing such norms are published in the AAS, but sometimes they appear in other publications of the Apostolic See, such as L'Osservatore Romano or Notitiae, or as booklets by the Vatican Press, as in the case of lengthy directories. Instructions (c. 34) and related norms and documents intended for the executors of the law are sent directly to the executors in question and begin to bind immediately, unless noted otherwise. Although instructions of the Roman Curia are sometimes published in the AAS or other journals of the Apostolic See, this is not required, unless a document is approved in forma specifica by the pope, in which case it has the force of law.

Non-retroactivity of Law

Canon 9 — Laws regard the future, not the past, unless they expressly provide for the past.

The principle of the non-retroactivity of law has already been seen in canon 4 with respect to acquired rights, and here it is stated in general fashion. As a rule, law is not retroactive; it affects only future activity, that is, what will take place after the law has gone into force.[50] For example, the liturgical law states that there should only be one altar in a church, unless an additional altar is located in a separate blessed sacrament chapel.[51] This law is binding only with respect to churches built since 1977, when it went into effect. The side altars in older churches may be removed to conform to the law, but this is not required. Another example is the marriage impediment of spiritual relationship, which existed in the 1917 code (CIC 1079, 768), but is not in the 1983 code. Thus, a marriage between a person and his or her godparent would be valid if it took place on or after November 27, 1983, but invalid before. A new law does not change juridical effects brought about under a former law. The legality of an act and its effects must be determined according to the law in force at the time of the act, not a law that went into force after the act took place.

Laws that are expressions of the divine law are always retroactive, as in the case of laws that stipulate the essential elements of capability or will needed to place a juridic act, insofar as they emanate from the divine natural law. For example, certain grounds for the invalidity of marriage in the 1983 code were not in the 1917 code, but they may be applied to marriages celebrated under the former law because they are based on the divine law (e.g., cc. 1095, §3; 1097, §2; 1098).

All authentic interpretations of law that are merely declarative have retroactive force (c. 16, §2).[52] General administrative norms contained in documents of the Roman Curia and other general norms of executive authorities are retroactive, insofar as such norms are merely rephrasing, clarifying, or elaborating on laws that have already been in force. If any such norm enunciates a rule or imposes an obligation not found in the law already, it is not retroactive but binds only from the moment the document goes into force.

[50] This principle of the non-retroactivity of law is longstanding in canon law, going back to Roman law (C. 1, 14, 7).

[51] Rite of Dedication of a Church and an Altar, IV, 7.

Ecclesiastical laws that have a retroactive effect must expressly (nominatim) provide for the past. A law whose retroactive application is doubtful may not be held to be retroactive. Retroactive laws are an exception. They should be made only for pressing reasons or when the benefits are appreciable, especially for the common good, to extend a favor, or to conform obsolete structures and institutes to a new juridical reality, such as that brought about by the reforms of Vatican II. A retroactive law should not be made if it would have an adverse effect on persons or groups, unless there is a substantial and overriding benefit to the common good.[53]

An example of retroactive law is the rule that the penal law more favorable to the offender is to be applied (c. 1313), whether this be the law presently in force or the law in force when the crime was committed. Another example of the law operating retroactively to favor persons is seen in the canonical institute of radical sanation (sanatio in radice), whereby an invalid juridic act is made valid and all the effects of the act are recognized retroactively, as if the act had been valid from the beginning (e.g., c. 1161).

Invalidating and Disqualifying Laws

Canon 10 — Only those laws must be considered invalidating or disqualifying which expressly establish that an act is null or that a person is unqualified.

Invalidating laws (leges irritantes) establish the necessary requirements of a juridic act, such that their non-fulfillment would render the act invalid, null and void, not recognized as legally existing. For example, canon 1108, §1 states that the marriage (a juridic act) of a Catholic is valid only if celebrated according to the canonical form. Disqualifying laws (leges inhabilitantes) establish the necessary qualifications required of a person validly to perform or benefit from a juridic act, such that the act is invalid if the person lacks an essential requirement. For example, canon 658 states that a religious must be at least twenty-one and must have been in temporary vows for at least three years to make perpetual profession validly; and canon 842, §1 states that one who is not baptized cannot validly receive any other sacrament.

Invalidating and disqualifying laws must expressly establish, whether explicitly or implicitly, that an act is null or a person is unqualified. The law uses many explicit expressions pertaining to validity and capability, notably capax esse; dirimere; habere effectum, obtinere effectum or sortiri effectum; incapax; inhabilis; invalidus; irritus; nullus; valide; validitas; validus; vi carere; vim habere; vim non habere; and vitiare.[54]

A law is implicitly invalidating or disqualifying when it has no explicit reference to validity or capability. However, an invalidating or disqualifying intent can be demonstrated from the text and context of the law, parallel places in the law, the purpose and circumstances of the law, the mind of the legislator (cf. c. 17), and/or by reference to the canonical tradition (cf. c. 6, §2).[55] If doubt re-

[53] E.g., c. 510, §1, based on ES 21, §2, establishes the rule that parishes are not to be joined to a chapter of canons, and it requires the diocesan bishop to enforce this rule retroactively. The continuation of a juridic person as pastor would not only be obsolete and anomalous in the new juridic order but, more important, it would adversely affect the common good by depriving the parishioners of the benefits of having an actual person as their pastor.

[54] For canon citations, see X. Ochoa, Index verborum ac locutionum Codicis iuris canonici, 2nd ed. (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Lateranense, 1984).

[55] There is no uniform approach among the commentators on this canon as to the criteria for verifying an implicitly invalidating or disqualifying law. This approach directs the interpreter of the law not to look for certain words in the text but to consider broader factors before concluding whether a law pertains to validity. One must also bear in mind the norm of c. 124, §1.

Some examples of implicitly invalidating and disqualifying laws are cc. 16, §2 (promulgari debet); 176; 338, §1; 526, §2; 609, §1; 684, §3; 684, §5; 995, §1; 1012; 1420, §2 (iudicare nequit); and c. 1482, §1 (substituere nequit). In reference to c. 1012, to say that it per-mains, the law may not be held to be invalidating or disqualifying.

Canon 10 refers only to the ecclesiastical law, not to requirements for validity that are of the divine law. Sometimes the canons give divine law requirements for validity without any express mention of this,[56] while at other times the canons expressly mention that a requirement of the divine law is for validity or capability.[57]

Subjects of the Law

Canon 11 — Merely ecclesiastical laws bind those who have been baptized in the Catholic Church or received into it, possess the sufficient use of reason, and, unless the law expressly provides otherwise, have completed seven years of age.

The laws intended by the canon are those that impose obligations, laws that command or forbid, those to which subjects of the law are bound (tenentur), not laws that confer rights or divine laws that bind everyone. All three conditions of this canon must be met for ecclesiastical laws to bind. The person must: (1) be a Catholic; (2) possess sufficient use of reason; and (3) be at least seven years of age, unless something else is specified in the ius.

Catholics

The law recognizes as Catholic anyone baptized in the Catholic Church or received into it. One is baptized in the Catholic Church by a Catholic minister or, in necessity, also by a non-Catholic minister, if the adult recipient or the parents or guardian of an infant intend a baptism into the Catholic Church (cf. c. 97, §2; 99). An infant of non-Catholic parents or guardian, baptized in danger of death by a Catholic minister,[58] is a member of the church or ecclesial community of the parents or guardian, unless they intended the infant to be baptized and raised as a Catholic, or unless they are not Christians.

Anyone seven or older with the use of reason who was baptized in a non-Catholic church or ecclesial community is received into the full communion of the Catholic Church by means of the Rite of Reception of Baptized Christians into the Full Communion of the Catholic Church.[59] Anyone under seven or without the use of reason who was baptized in a non-Catholic church or ecclesial community is received into the Catholic Church simply by a parent or guardian declaring his or her intention orally or in writing to the pastor or local ordinary that the infant is to be received into the Catholic Church and will be raised in the Catholic religion.[60]

Once a Catholic by baptism or reception, one always remains a Catholic (semel catholicus, semper catholicus).[61] Even those who have joined another religion, have become atheists or agnostics, or have been excommunicated remain Catholics. Excommunicates lose rights, such as the right to the sacraments, but they are still bound to the obligations of the law; their rights are restored when they are reconciled through the remission of the penalty. In three instances, the code grants an exemption from certain requirements of marriage law for the benefit of Catholics who have left the Church by means of a formal act (cc. 1086, §1; 1117; 1124). Although such Catholics have formally joined another religion or made it known in some formal way that they are not Catholic, they are still Catholic in virtue of baptism or reception tains to validity does not imply a resolution of the theological question as to whether the pope may delegate a presbyter to ordain, but is simply an assertion of the legal reality.

and may be reconciled to the Church whenever they choose to conform to the requirements of the law.

The limitation of canonical obligations to Catholics is one of the most important innovations of the 1983 code. Canon 12 of the 1917 code had bound all the baptized to the ecclesiastical laws of the Catholic Church. The implication of the revised law, based on the doctrine of Vatican II, is that non-Catholic Christians have an ecclesial reality of their own and are bound to the laws of their own church or ecclesial community.[62] In some exceptional instances, non-Catholics are required to observe specific laws of the Church, such as when they wish to become a Catholic,[63] be a party to a case before a church tribunal (c. 1476), marry a Catholic (e.g., cc. 1108, 1118, 1125), or receive a sacrament from a Catholic minister (c. 844, §§ 3–4). It is their own desire to interact in a specific way with the Catholic Church that brings about their subjection to the canonical discipline governing that interaction.

Sufficient Use of Reason

In virtue of the divine natural law, one must have sufficient use of reason to be bound by law. Use of reason refers to the ability to conceptualize, make abstractions, and take responsibility for one's own actions. The minimal use of reason required for the subject of canon law would be that of normal seven-year-old children (cf. c. 97, §2). Persons who lack this minimal reasoning capacity, such as those with severe mental illnesses and developmental disabilities like mental retardation, cannot morally or legally be bound to the law. They lack adequate mental capacity to understand and remember the law, and to foresee and evaluate the consequences of their own actions. They are legally incompetent (non sui compos); they cannot act for themselves in law but must be represented by a guardian or curator.

The canonical notion of "use of reason" cannot be applied without reference to developmental psychology and other pertinent sciences. Intellectual and volitional capacity are acquired gradually as a child develops. The use of reason of the normal seven-year-old child does not make the child capable of all legal or moral acts. It takes considerably more understanding and discretion to commit a mortal sin, profess religious vows, marry, or be ordained than it does to receive Holy Communion or the anointing of the sick. The canon speaks of the sufficient use of reason, that which is sufficient for performing the act, exercising the right, or fulfilling the obligation in question.

At Least Seven Years Old

Besides possessing the sufficient use of reason, the subject of the law must also have completed at least seven years of age,[64] unless another age is expressly stated in the ius (law or administrative norm).[65] Although some children below the age of seven may have already attained sufficient use of reason (relative to a law in question), still they are not bound to observe the law. The more important canonical obligations binding those who are at least seven and have the use of reason are to attend Mass and refrain from burdensome labor on Sundays and holy days (c. 1247), to confess all [62] LG 8; OE 5; UR 3, 8, 15, 16. UR 3 speaks of significant ecclesial elements and endowments that exist in other Christian churches and ecclesial communities, including "visible elements," among which would certainly be their own laws and customs. This is recognized explicitly in CCEO 780, §2 in respect to marriage law, which is a fundamental rule equally valid in the Latin canon law.

[63] These would be principally the obligations of the liturgical laws governing the catechumenate and reception into full communion. See J. Huels, The Catechumenate and the Law (Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1994), 10–13, 18–20.

[64] In canon law, one completes a year of life at midnight at the end of one's birthday. The seventh birthday is the final day of one's seventh year, so the law begins to bind the next day. See cc. 202–203.

[65] The law sometimes speaks of the "age of discretion." This is to be understood as the age of seven, or a later age at which a person achieves the use of reason if this was not attained by the age of seven.

serious sins at least once a year (c. 989) and, once they have made their first Communion, to receive Communion at least once a year (c. 920). Certain canonical obligations begin to bind at higher ages: fourteen for abstinence (c. 1252), sixteen for subjection to sanctions (c. 1323, 1°), and eighteen for fasting (c. 1252). Likewise, various canonical rights of the faithful are acquired by law at different ages.[66]

Universal and Particular Laws

Canon 12 — §1. Universal laws bind everywhere all those for whom they were issued.

§2. All who are actually present in a certain territory, however, are exempted from universal laws which are not in force in that territory.

§3. Laws established for a particular territory bind those for whom they were issued as well as those who have a domicile or quasi-domicile there and who at the same time are actually residing there, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 13.

Canon 13 — §1. Particular laws are not presumed to be personal but territorial unless it is otherwise evident.

§2. Travelers are not bound:

1° by the particular laws of their own territory as long as they are absent from it unless either the transgression of those laws causes harm in their own territory or the laws are personal;

2° by the laws of the territory in which they are present, with the exception of those laws which provide for public order, which determine the formalities of acts, or which regard immovable goods located in the territory.

§3. Transients are bound by both universal and particular laws which are in force in the place where they are present.

Universal laws are made for the Latin church by the supreme legislator—the pope or college of bishops (or their delegate)—and they bind those for whom they were made everywhere they go (e.g., clerics, pastors, all the faithful, etc.). If a particular territory has an exemption from a universal law, anyone present in the territory is exempt from that law, not only those with domicile and quasi-domicile but also travelers.[67] A universal law might not be binding in a specific territory for various reasons: (1) a contrary custom, including desuetude;[68] (2) a contrary particular law, not expressly revoked, that was in force before the universal law went into force (cf. cc. 20, 135, §2), or a contrary particular law that the Holy See made or confirmed; (3) an apostolic privilege (c. 76) or other apostolic indult; or (4) a dispensation for a particular case (c. 85).

Particular laws may be territorial or personal. Personal laws are given for non-territorially defined groups of persons that are capable of receiving a law, such as institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life, personal prelatures, and various associations of the faithful.[69] Personal laws bind the persons for whom they were given wherever they go. The presumption of the law is that particular laws are territorial, unless they are clearly personal.[70] For example, a diocesan bishop makes a law pertaining to the exercise of the apostolate by religious. Although the law is given for members of religious institutes, it is territorial [66] See B. F. Griffin, "The Ages of Man," in Code, Community, Ministry, 2nd rev. ed., ed. E. G. Pfnausch (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1992) 18–20.

[67] A common example is holy days of obligation. Although there may be an obligation to attend Mass in one's own country on a certain feast, one is exempt when visiting a country that does not observe the feast as a day of obligation.

[68] A contrary custom is a practice of the community contrary to the law; desuetude is the contrary custom of not observing the law for a sustained period.

[69] On the notion of a community capable of receiving a law, see the commentary for c. 25. Statutes of juridic persons, such as the constitutions of religious institutes, are an example of personal law (ius) in the broad sense; statutes may also be given legislative force (c. 94, §3).

[70] On the notion of "presumptions" in canon law, see L. Örsy, in CLSA Com, 33.

because it applies only to religious who exercise the apostolate in the territory of the diocese. However, a diocesan law governing the spiritual obligations of members of diocesan religious institutes would be a personal law and would apply to the religious even when they are not in the diocese. If there is a doubt as to whether a law is personal, it must be considered territorial.

Canons 12 and 13 are concerned with particular laws that are territorial.[71] Territorial particular laws are given for ecclesiastical territories, especially dioceses, provinces, and the nation or group of nations that makes up a conference of bishops.[72] The diocesan bishop or higher legislator can make laws binding in the diocese. A provincial council or the supreme legislator can make laws for the province. A plenary council, the conference of bishops, or the supreme legislator can make laws for the nation or other territory that makes up the conference. Such territorial particular laws bind those for whom they were issued.[73] As a rule, particular law binds only those who have a domicile or quasi-domicile in the territory (c. 102), and only when they are actually in their territory.

The second and third paragraphs of canon 13 provide special rules governing the observance of particular laws by travelers (peregrini) and transients (vagi). Travelers are persons who are outside their place of domicile or quasi-domicile; transients have no domicile or quasi-domicile (cc. 100, 107). Along with the rules, several exceptions are given. All these exceptions are subject to strict interpretation, not only because they are exceptions, but also because a broad application of them would restrict the free exercise of personal rights.[74]

Generally, travelers are not bound to the particular laws of their own territory when they are absent from that territory. One exception to this rule has already been noted: personal laws bind everywhere. The other exception is for laws whose transgression would cause harm in one's own territory. Such would include laws that regulate the duties of office, residence, and participation in a diocesan synod or particular council.[75] In all such cases, there must be a real danger of harm in one's own territory or the law does not oblige outside the territory, even if one leaves the territory to avoid observing the law.

As a rule, travelers also are not bound to the laws of the territory in which they are traveling. However, they are bound to laws that provide for public order (ordo publicus), determine legal formalities (sollemnia actuum), or pertain to immovable goods in that territory.

The concept of public order was introduced in the late nineteenth century by canonists who borrowed the idea from civil law, especially from French and Italian jurists. It formally entered canon law in the 1917 code (CIC 14, §1, 2°). Laws that protect the public order are those that are so necessary for the good of the community that, when violated, the common good would be harmed.[76] Such laws are indispensable to the society and their violation would be disruptive. Laws that provide for public order include those affecting the exercise of authority (judicial power, administrative offices, parochial functions); governing meetings, public events, and the public celebration of the liturgy; preventing offenses to the faith; and laws given specifically for travelers.[77] The public [71] Universal laws may be seen as either territorial or personal. The effect is the same: they bind everywhere those persons for whom they were issued.

[73] Even a pontifical particular law binds only in the territory for which it was made.

[74] On strict interpretation, see the commentary on c. 18.

[75] Com Ex, 1:335. For example, a diocesan law says that if a parish priest is going to be away from the parish on a Sunday or holy day and he has no one to replace him, he must notify the local ordinary. The parish priest would not be exempt from this law merely by leaving the diocese, because it would bring harm in his own territory.

[77] For example, in a certain diocese, a law requires that visiting priests who stay more than a month in the diocese must receive permission of the local ordinary to exercise public ministry in the diocese. Even though these priests order should not be confused with uniformity of conduct. While an orderly and well-regulated community is desirable, every community may tolerate reasonable exceptions for travelers.[78]

Formalities of acts are the legal formalities connected with contracts, bequests, administrative and judicial procedures, and other juridic acts (cf. c. 124, §1). Immovable goods are land, buildings, and any other structures that are not movable. The observance of laws pertaining to immovable goods and legal formalities follows the legal principle that "the place regulates the act" (locus regit actum).

Transients are persons without any domicile or quasi-domicile. They are bound by both universal and particular laws wherever they are at the time. They are fully subjects of the law and enjoy all the rights of the faithful, including the right to pastoral care and liturgical celebrations within the context of parish and diocese (c. 107, §2).

The rules of the Eastern code governing the observance of particular laws are comparable to those of canons 12 and 13 of the Latin code (CCEO 1491). The Eastern code does not speak of universal law but of "laws enacted by the supreme authority of the Church," which bind everywhere unless given for a particular territory.[79] It uses the term common law (ius commune) for the laws and legitimate customs of the universal Church and for those common to all the Eastern churches sui iuris. It uses the term particular law (ius particulare) for all laws, legitimate customs, statutes, and other norms of law (ius) which are not common to the universal Church or all the Eastern churches.[80] are outside their own territory and do not have quasi-domicile after only a month in the new territory, the particular law in question was made precisely to regulate their situation for the public order of the diocese, for the common good.

[80] CCEO 1493. In the 1917 Latin code, "common law" was used for what is now called "universal law." A vestige of this use can be seen in c. 1362, § 1, 3°.

Doubts of Law and Fact

Canon 14 — Laws, even invalidating and disqualifying ones, do not oblige when there is a doubt about the law. When there is a doubt about a fact, however, ordinaries can dispense from laws provided that, if it concerns a reserved dispensation, the authority to whom it is reserved usually grants it.

Doubt is the state of mind withholding assent between two contradictory propositions. If there exist alternative interpretations of a law or fact, and each is supported by objective reasons, this leads to uncertainty. The doubt must be positive, founded on reasons pro and con; a negative doubt is ignorance. If someone does not know the meaning of a law or the existence of a fact, this is not objective but subjective doubt, or ignorance. The doubt must also be probable, that is, the reasons pro and con are sound.

A doubt of law (dubium iuris) occurs when it is impossible to achieve moral certainty concerning the law's meaning, applicability in a particular case, or force. Even experts cannot resolve the doubt. When there is a doubt of law, even if the law is invalidating or incapacitating, the law in question does not oblige. If the doubtful law is beneficial, for example, granting some favor, then one may continue to benefit from the doubtful law. However, if the law imposes an obligation or restricts freedom, the doubtful law does not oblige. The legislator does not want the community to be in confusion about its obligations, but intends the law to give clear directions for ordering ecclesial life.

A doubt of law may pertain to: (1) the meaning of the law; (2) the extent of its application to doubtful cases; (3) its legitimate promulgation and force; or (4) its revocation.[81] Rarely is the meaning of a law objectively doubtful, but it can happen. A doubt about a law's meaning is usually resolved over time by an authentic interpretation [81] On doubtful revocation, see the commentary on cc. 20–21.

(c. 16, §2),[82] by a new law that rephrases the matter with greater clarity, or by developments in canonical doctrine that lead to a consensus among experts that overcomes the doubt.

The doubt might arise not about the meaning of the law but about the extent of its application to doubtful cases. For example, canon 455 requires that general decrees of conferences of bishops be approved by two-thirds of the members and obtain the recognitio of the Apostolic See. A doubt arose as to whether general decrees referred only to the general decrees of canons 29–30 or also extended to the general executory decrees of canons 31–33. The response determined that the procedure for the approval of general decrees must also be extended to general executory decrees.[83]

Various doubts may arise concerning the law's legitimate promulgation and force, such as: whether the necessary formalities of promulgation were observed; whether the supreme legislator expressly delegated legislative power or approved a curial decree in forma specifica;[84] whether the law is intended to have prescriptive or merely directive force (e.g., calling "guidelines" a diocesan policy intended to be normative); whether the matter was within the legislator's competence (e.g., a diocesan policy requiring reservation of the Blessed Sacrament in the sanctuary of the church rather than in a special chapel as preferred in the universal law).

A doubt of fact (dubium facti) refers to a doubt about some concrete fact that pertains to the law's applicability, such as doubts concerning age, relationship, valid baptism, validity of other sacraments and juridic acts, membership in the Catholic Church, etc. When there is a doubt of fact, the ordinary (c. 134) may dispense. The dispensation is necessary in the case of an invalidating or incapacitating law (e.g., a marriage impediment).

The doubt must be objective and positive. In merely subjective doubt, or ignorance, a thorough investigation must be undertaken to the extent possible to ascertain the facts (e.g., as required in canon 869). If the fact is verified, the law applies; if the contrary, it does not. However, if the investigation is inconclusive and the doubt remains, the ordinary may dispense. For example, in a customary society where no birth records are kept, a young man wants to get married. He looks to be about sixteen (cf. c. 1083, §1), but an investigation reveals that no testimonies provide conclusive proof of sufficient age. The ordinary may dispense to permit the marriage. The doubt here is not mere ignorance. A positive reason exists for believing the young man is old enough to marry because he appears to be sixteen, though the contrary possibility cannot be excluded.

In a doubt of fact, the ordinary may also dispense from laws whose dispensation is reserved to higher authority, provided the higher authority usually grants the dispensation.[85] For example, in danger of death, the Apostolic See usually dispenses from the obligations of priestly celibacy, which permits the priest to convalidate an attempted marriage. In a particular case, a priest admits he never wanted to be ordained, so a doubt arises about the validity of his ordination (the dubium facti). Since there is no time to resolve the doubt by a canonical process (cc. 1708–1712), the ordinary may dispense from the obligations of [82] The first authentic interpretation of the 1983 code concerned the word iterum in canon 917 on receiving Communion more than once a day. The meaning of the canon was doubtful because iterum can mean "a second time" or "again." The latter is more open-ended and would have enabled a person to receive Holy Communion as often as he or she attended Mass, not just twice in one day. However, the authentic interpretation determined that the meaning was "a second time." PCILT, August 7, 1984, AAS 76 (1984) 746; Pamplona ComEng, 1293–1295. CCC 1388 must be read in light of this authentic interpretation.

[83] PCILT, August 1, 1985, AAS 77 (1985) 771; Pamplona ComEng, 1289. This might also be seen as merely declaring that the meaning of "general decree" includes decrees that are both legislative and executory.

[84] Doubt about this can arise only in reference to documents published before June 7, 1992 when a revised Regolamento generale della Curia romana went into effect. See commentary on c. 7 above.

[85] See cc. 291; 1047, §§ 1–3; and 1078, §2 for dispensations reserved to the Apostolic See in the code.

celibacy and the subsequent marriage would be presumed valid, even if later the priest survived and the validity of his ordination were upheld.

The ordinary may not dispense in a doubt of fact when the dispensation is reserved to a higher authority who does not usually grant it or when dispensation in doubt is expressly excluded by law. For example, if there is a doubt as to whether a man and woman are related in the direct line or second degree collateral line of consanguinity, marriage is not permitted and a dispensation is not given (cc. 1078, §3; 1091, §4).

The power to dispense in this canon is broader in some respects than the typical rules for dispensation (cc. 85–93). In doubt of fact, any competent ordinary, not just the diocesan bishop (c. 87, §1), may dispense from universal laws; any competent ordinary, not just the local ordinary (c. 88), may dispense from particular laws; and laws reserved to higher authority can be dispensed by the ordinary even if recourse to the higher authority is possible and there is no danger of grave harm in delay (cf. c. 87, §2), provided the higher authority usually dispenses in the circumstances of the case. Under the meaning of reserved laws in canon 14 must also be understood merely ecclesiastical procedural and penal laws (c. 87, §1). Divine laws and constitutive laws may never be dispensed.

Ignorance and Error

Canon 15 — §1. Ignorance or error about invalidating or disqualifying laws does not impede their effect unless it is expressly established otherwise.

§2. Ignorance or error about a law, a penalty, a fact concerning oneself, or a notorious fact concerning another is not presumed; it is presumed about a fact concerning another which is not notorious until the contrary is proven.

Ignorance is lack of knowledge.[86] Error is mistaken judgment. The two are related, since error is based on insufficient knowledge, but it is not a total absence of knowledge; it is an erroneous application of one's knowledge. With respect to invalidating and incapacitating laws, ignorance and error usually have no effect; actions posited in ignorance or error remain valid or invalid, irrespective of what the person thought or judged at the time. Canon 15 upholds stability in the community. Invalidating and incapacitating laws are generally the most important laws in the canonical system. If they were to become ineffectual due to ignorance or error, the legal system would break down; there would never be certainty that juridic acts were valid. Thus, the canon establishes the rule that ignorance or error does not affect invalidating and incapacitating laws, unless it is expressly established otherwise.[87]

For example, a woman marries her second cousin (sixth degree collateral consanguinity), and she erroneously concludes that she has married invalidly because she had heard that a dispensation was necessary to marry a relative. Her mistaken judgment about the application of canon law does not affect the marriage, which is valid, provided she truly consented to marry him (cf. c. 1091, §2). The same principle is true with respect to ignorance. For example, an unbaptized man receives Holy Communion, but is ignorant of the law that baptism is necessary to receive any other sacrament (c. 842, §1). Ignorance does not affect this incapacitating law, and he receives invalidly.

[86] The canonical doctrine on ignorance has its roots in Roman law (D. 50, 17, 42; D. 50, 17, 206). This tradition is reflected in rule 13 ("Ignorance of fact excuses, but not of law"), and rule 47 ("Ignorance is presumed where knowledge is not proven") of the Regulae Juris in Sexto (hereafter cited as RI rule #). Translations of RI are from A. Gauthier, Roman Law and Its Contribution to the Development of Canon Law (Ottawa: Faculty of Canon Law, St. Paul University, 1996) 108, 112 (hereafter cited as Gauthier).

Inadvertence and forgetfulness, in practical cases, usually may be considered equivalent to ignorance and error.

[87] Some exceptions are the exercise of delegated power in the internal forum in inadvertence (c. 142, §2); common error of fact or law (c. 144); and the effects of ignorance and error on matrimonial consent (cc. 1096–1098).

The second paragraph states a presumption of law (praesumptio iuris). A presumption of law refers to a fact that the law presumes. It is a given and need not be proven. Instead, the burden is on the person who wants to prove the opposite. This is the key difference between paragraph one, which admits of no contrary proofs, and paragraph two, which does. The law does not presume ignorance or error about:

1) A law. The law always presumes knowledge of the law, even if in fact one is ignorant of it. Ignorance of the law does not excuse, unless the law provides otherwise.

2) A penalty. As with a law, knowledge of penalties is presumed. To claim exemption from or mitigation of a penalty, one would have to prove ignorance or error to the extent this is permitted in the law (c. 1323, 2°, 7°; 1324, §1, 8°–9°).

3) A fact concerning oneself. The law presumes that all people with the use of reason have knowledge of their own actions and other facts about themselves.

4) A notorious fact concerning another. Notorious means well known, something that is public knowledge, that the average person would know about.

Without these presumptions, the legal system would be ineffectual, because anyone who claimed ignorance or error could not be held accountable. In all these cases, the presumption of the law can be overturned, but the burden of proof falls on the person asserting ignorance or error.

The law does presume ignorance or error about a fact concerning another that is not notorious, that is, a fact that is not public knowledge. However, this presumption could be overturned by proofs. For example, a woman married a man who is a homosexual and she now petitions for a declaration of invalidity on the ground of error regarding a quality of a person (c. 1097, §2). The court would not initially presume that she knew of the man's sexual orientation at the time she married him, but the evidence of the case might overturn this presumption.

Official Interpretation of Law

Canon 16 — §1. The legislator authentically interprets laws as does the one to whom the same legislator has entrusted the power of authentically interpreting.

§2. An authentic interpretation put forth in the form of law has the same force as the law itself and must be promulgated. If it only declares the words of the law which are certain in themselves, it is retroactive; if it restricts or extends the law, or if it explains a doubtful law, it is not retroactive.

§3. An interpretation in the form of a judicial sentence or of an administrative act in a particular matter, however, does not have the force of law and only binds the persons for whom and affects the matters for which it was given.

Canon law is officially interpreted by the legislator and by judges and administrators. The first two paragraphs treat the authentic interpretation of law by an authority with legislative power; such an interpretation, when given in the form of law, has the force of law and binds everyone for whom it is given. The third paragraph treats the interpretation of laws in concrete cases given in the form of judicial and administrative acts; such a practical interpretation binds only the parties involved in the case.[88]

[88] Commentators do not agree whether the term "authentic interpretation" should be limited to an act of the legislator given in the form of law, whether it includes also judicial or administrative interpretations, or whether judicial and administrative interpretations may be either authentic or non-authentic. These views are nicely summarized, with references, in Münster Com, 16/10–11. We follow the view that authentic interpretations are only those given in the form of law.

Authentic Interpretation

It has already been noted in the commentary on canon 14 that an authentic interpretation by the legislator can officially resolve a doubt of law. Unlike the Anglo-American common law system where the courts settle the meaning of laws, in canon law the competent legislator determines the law's meaning and resolves doubts about it.[89] The supreme legislator entrusts certain powers of authentically interpreting law to the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts (PCILT).[90] Its competence extends to the interpretation of all the universal laws of the Latin church and the common laws of the Eastern churches.[91] Although the PCILT is not empowered to interpret particular laws authentically, it may, when requested, determine whether they are in accord with the universal law.[92]

The power to interpret law as treated in paragraphs one and two is legislative power. Therefore, only the supreme authority may delegate it (c. 135, §2), unless something else is specifically established in the law (ius).[93] The authentic interpretation of particular laws pertains to the competent legislator himself or to the supreme authority[94] or delegate of the same. Thus, a law of the conference of bishops is authentically interpreted either by the supreme authority or delegate of the same, or by the conference itself according to the procedure of canon 455. A law of the diocese may be interpreted authentically by the supreme legislator or delegate, or by the diocesan bishop himself.

There are four kinds of authentic interpretation. (1) Declarative interpretation merely affirms the meaning of the wording of the law that was already certain. (2) Restrictive interpretation narrows the meaning and applicability of the law. (3) Extensive interpretation broadens the meaning and applicability of the law beyond what is included in the text of the law. (4) Explanatory interpretation explains the meaning of a doubtful law, without extending or restricting its original meaning.

Declarative interpretation does nothing other than affirm the meaning of the law that is clear in itself. With restrictive and extensive interpretation, the applicability of the law is narrowed or broadened so that, effectively, it no longer has the same meaning. Explanatory interpretation makes no change in the literal meaning of the law, but determines the precise meaning of an ambiguous law. Explanatory interpretation is really the only one that resolves a doubt inherent in the wording of the law (cf. c. 14). The other three respond to the question: "Does this law really mean what it says?" A declarative interpretation [89] In its classical period, Roman law was based on case law similar to Anglo-American common law, but with Justinian in the year 529, authentic interpretation was reserved to the emperor (C. 1. 14, 12). In the Middle Ages, canon law received from Roman law the principle that "the one who makes the law is the one who is competent to interpret it" (Ad quem pertinet iuris constitutio, ad ipsum pertinet interpretatio). See Gauthier, 20–21.

The legislator refers to the office or organ, not the person; thus it applies to the successors of the legislator or legislative body that made the law.

[90] This is its present name. From 1984 to 1989, before PB went into effect, it was called the Pontifical Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code of Canon Law. Before that, Paul VI in 1966 had established the Commission for the Interpretation of the Decrees of the Second Vatican Council. There was also a commission for the interpretation of the 1917 code, and before that a commission for interpreting the decrees of the Council of Trent.

[91] See PB 154–158 for the competencies of the PCILT; translation in Pamplona ComEng, 1249. For its competency with respect to the common laws of the Eastern churches, see SS, letter, February 27, 1991, Comm 23 (1991) 14–15.

[93] Only the supreme legislator could make a particular law granting to a lower legislator the faculty to delegate the power of authentically interpreting that legislator's laws.

[94] On this point we accept the view of Chiappetta Com, 2nd ed. (1996), 1:59, n. 284, that only the hierarchical superior of the legislator, not any higher legislator, may authentically interpret particular laws.

gives an affirmative answer to the question. A restrictive or extensive interpretation gives a negative answer, affirming that the law does not include this situation (restrictive), or that the law must be seen as also including this situation (extensive).

To have the force of law, authentic interpretations must be put forth in the form of law (per modum legis) and promulgated; they go into force after the vacatio defined in canon 8 has elapsed. An authentic interpretation given in the form of law has the same force as the law itself. A declarative interpretation has retroactive force, since no change is made to the law whose meaning was not objectively doubtful.[95] Extensive, restrictive, and explanatory interpretations are not retroactive with respect to that part of the law whose meaning is changed or explained.[96] Interpretation of a law that is based on the divine law is always retroactive.[97] In practice, it is often difficult to determine which kind of authentic interpretation of universal law is given, since the PCILT does not indicate this.[98] In cases of doubt as to whether an interpretation is merely declarative, the law may not be applied retroactively.

Interpretations not given in the form of law do not bind juridically.[99] The pope often interprets laws by his comments on them in non-legislative texts, such as his allocutions to the Roman Rota. Although these interpretations have great doctrinal value, they are not authentic interpretations of the law. While an authentic interpretation given in the form of law resolves a doubt and closes the debate, other interpretations (even those of the pope himself) allow insights in jurisprudence and canonical doctrine to continue developing within the general parameters established in the law and church teachings. The legislators of the Church also have teaching authority, but legislative and magisterial acts are distinct and should not be confused.

Judicial and Administrative Interpretation

Laws are also officially interpreted by judicial and executive authorities—by the judges in church tribunals and by church administrators (Vatican congregations, diocesan bishops, major superiors, vicars, etc.). Judicial sentences and individual administrative acts[100] involve interpreting the law and applying it to particular cases. Such interpretation has no impact on the meaning of the law and does not have the force of law, that is, it cannot be enforced generally. Judicial sentences and administrative acts bind only the party or parties for whom they are given. The parties are legally obliged to abide by the decision, notwithstanding their right to appeal or take recourse.

Judicial sentences and administrative decisions do not create binding precedents. Nevertheless, the decisions of the Roman Curia do have a kind of precedential value. The sentences of the Roman Rota have a great impact on other courts around the [95] The 1917 code, c. 17, §2, did not require that a declarative interpretation be issued in the form of law. The value of putting all interpretations in the form of law is that it clarifies the intention of the legislator to interpret the law authentically and consequently it removes doubt about the binding force of the interpretation, although doubt might remain about retroactivity if it is unclear whether the interpretation was declarative.

[96] E.g., the authentic interpretation that general executory decrees are included in the meaning of canon 455, §1 is not retroactive. General executory decrees previously enacted by the conferences of bishops do not need to be submitted to the Holy See for recognitio, but only those enacted since the authentic interpretation went into force. See PCILT, response, August 1, 1985, AAS 77 (1985) 771; Pamplona ComEng, 1289.

[97] See, e.g., the authentic interpretation on c. 1103, August 6, 1987, AAS 79 (1987) 1132; Pamplona ComEng, 1295.

[98] An attempt at classification is that of Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations. This work is a good basis for continuing discussion, but it does not seem necessary to use Wrenn's eight categories when c. 16 speaks of only four.

[99] Theoretically, a merely declarative interpretation would be binding, even if not given in the form of law, in the sense that the law itself, which the interpretation reiterates, continues to bind. However, there is no juridical certainty that the legislator intends an authentic interpretation unless he gives it in the form of law.

world. Judges on diocesan and regional tribunals routinely cite decisions of the Rota to strengthen their arguments. The jurisprudence of the Rota has also led to developments in the canon law of marriage, for example, regarding the "psychic grounds" for defective marriage consent (c. 1095) and dolus (c. 1098). Likewise, there is a kind of precedent in the administrative arena, since repeated decisions by the Roman Curia contribute to the praxis curiae (c. 19) and the canonical tradition (c. 6, §2). Lower level administrators and their advisors look to the practice of the Roman Curia for indications of how to settle similar cases.

Sometimes a Roman dicastery gives a declaration on a law's meaning or execution and it is published in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis. Such a decision, if given for a specific physical or juridic person, does not have general application. If the declaration is not directed to anyone in particular, it has general applicability and pertains to the authority of the Roman Curia to issue general administrative norms (cc. 31–34).[101]

Rules for Interpretation

Canon 17 — Ecclesiastical laws must be understood in accord with the proper meaning of the words considered in their text and context. If the meaning remains doubtful and obscure, recourse must be made to parallel places, if there are such, to the purpose and circumstances of the law, and to the mind of the legislator.

The canonical tradition holds in high regard, not only official interpretation by legislators, judges, and administrators, but also the private interpretation of canon law by scholars, which is called doctrinal interpretation. The rules of this canon, as well as those of canons 18 and 19, apply to everyone interpreting canon law—church officials, scholars, and practitioners of the law.

The interpretation of an ecclesiastical law begins with understanding the proper meaning of the key words of the legal text. The "proper meaning" is the way the word or phrase is understood in the canonical tradition—in the practice of the Church and the writings of the "doctors," the canonical scholars. Many canonical words and expressions have a standard, technical meaning that is familiar to canonists but is often not evident to others.[102] Sometimes, this technical meaning cannot be known from the translation, for example, the difference between lex and ius, which are both translated in English as "law." The Latin text is the official text. If the Latin word is open to various meanings, looking at different translations to see how translators interpret the word is helpful.

The proper meaning of the words is not usually determined solely by examining the text of the law in isolation; the text must be seen in relation to other statements that make up the context of the law.[103] The context refers to related texts in the same book, document, or section in which the law is published, for example, the article, chapter, title, part, or book of the code in which a canon is found, or the introductory section of certain juridical documents that briefly provides the historical context, theoretical underpinnings, and rationale for the norms that follow. The context may often clarify the law's purpose and the way it functions in relationship to other laws surrounding it. By examining this context, the interpreter is better able to grasp the meaning of the key words and phrases of the law, which leads to its correct understanding and application.

If the meaning of the law is not clear from the text and its context, the canon directs the interpreter of the law to make recourse to parallel places if they exist, to the purpose and circumstances of the law, and to the mind of the legislator. Actually, these additional steps are a necessary part of any thorough, scholarly interpretation of a law. While examining the text and context of a law is usually sufficient for applying the law in practical situations, the process delineated in the second sentence of the canon is always necessary for good doctrinal interpretation. This more thorough examination and explanation of the law is illuminating even if the law's meaning is not doubtful and obscure.

[101] This point is important to keep in mind in assessing the weight of responses of curial dicasteries that are translated in the Canon Law Digest and Roman Replies. Those that are private in character—given to individuals—are not binding on others, unless they are merely reiterations of the ius vigens.

[102] Ordinarily, a text of law does not define its own terms, but it does so now and then, e.g., cc. 29, 34, 48, 49, 59, 76, 85, 100, 102, 134, 145, 435, 573, 607, 710, 731, etc.

The first means given for acquiring a deeper understanding of the law is to look for any parallel places where the matter is treated in juridical texts.[104] These would be norms given elsewhere that treat the same subject or make use of the same rule or principle as that of the law at hand. Consulting the Eastern code to see how it treats a subject in the Latin code is often helpful, because there might be certain differences, as well as similarities, that may shed fuller light on the meaning of the Latin canon. Such parallel passages may also be found in juridical documents other than the two codes. For example, in reference to many canons of Book IV, parallel passages exist in the liturgical books, in the Constitution on the Liturgy of Vatican II, and in postconciliar documents.

Another means of interpreting the law is to seek to uncover the purpose of the law (ratio legis). Each law has a specific purpose, besides the overarching purpose of canon law itself, which is the spiritual welfare of the faithful, the salus animarum (cf. c. 1752). As noted above, the specific purpose of the law is sometimes discernible from the context, for example, in the introduction to or theological foundations of a juridical text.[105] Often, however, the purpose of the law is only implicit and requires reflection on the law and its relation to its context, the legal system as a whole, and/or the very mission of the Church. Some authors refer to this purpose of the law as the "value" behind the law, the good that the law seeks to accomplish.[106] If the interpreter can correctly apprehend the values behind the law, understanding of the law is enriched. These values might be theological, moral, philosophical, sociological (for the good of the church society), or strictly legal (such as laws that establish rules or principles of law). For example, the purposes of the law on the impediment of disparity of cult (c. 1086) are to prevent Catholics from marrying someone who could pose dangers to their Christian faith and the Catholic upbringing of the children, and to call attention to the importance of a sacramental marriage. Sometimes, however, the purpose is not at all evident. An old law might be restated just to preserve a long-standing tradition that served the Church well in the past and might still be serviceable in some places and circumstances, for example, the law requiring the faithful to receive Communion at least once a year (c. 920). Discovering the purpose of the law is not a precise science but more of an art, requiring persons with broad knowledge not only of canon law but also of related sciences, especially the theological disciplines.

The circumstances of the law are the relevant historical facts about the matter regulated by the law, factors that led to the immediate creation of the law, and, if the law is being restated or modified later, the circumstances at that time. Investigation of the circumstances takes the interpreter into the field of history, especially church history. The circumstances include the political, social, and ecclesial factors and other influences relevant to the making of the law. This might involve study of the law's remote history, discussions about the matter at Vatican II, postconciliar developments, and the various drafts of the law before its most recent promulgation. Knowing such facts and circumstances will often shed light on the law's purpose and meaning.

[104] These are not steps that must be taken successively, but in any order that is most effective with respect to the law in question.

[105] See, e.g., Ecum Dir 6 which lists the purposes of the directory. These general purposes of the directory as a whole illuminate the individual purpose of each specific norm in the directory. The theological values expressed in the directory, especially in part one, provide further insights into the purpose of the juridical norms.

[106] See L. Örsy, Theology and Canon Law (Collegeville: Liturgical Press, 1992), passim; and M. Wijlens, "The Church Knowing and Acting: Relationship between Theology and Canon Law," Louvain Studies 20 (1995) 21–40.

The mind of the legislator (mens legislatoris) does not mean the subjective mind of the legislator or his successor—what he inwardly thinks or wills—because that is largely unknowable and even irrelevant. It is the objective text of the law that must be observed, not what anyone presumes the legislator might have been thinking when he made the law. The mind of the legislator does not refer to a human person's mind at all.[107] Instead, it is a construct, an "institutional figure"[108] signifying the whole institution of the law itself—the canonical system—especially the basic rules, values, and principles that underlie and support it.[109] Knowing this "mind of the legislator" takes considerable study and experience in the field of canon law, and it also requires knowledge of related disciplines, such as ecclesiology and moral theology.

The rules of interpretation in canon 17 are not the only ones observed by canonists. Other commonly used means of enriching the understanding of the law and its function and purpose include consideration of the canonical tradition (c. 6, §2), pertinent customs (cc. 19, 27), general principles of law, the jurisprudence and practice of the Roman Curia, and the constant and common opinion of learned persons, as discussed below under canon 19. Going into such depth in the everyday application of laws is not usually necessary. However, the use of these additional methods of interpretation leads to a more profound understanding of the law, even of laws whose meaning is not doubtful and obscure, and this benefits both the canonical science and the faithful who are called to observe the law.

Strict Interpretation

Canon 18 — Laws which establish a penalty, restrict the free exercise of rights, or contain an exception from the law are subject to strict interpretation.

To understand this canon, it is necessary to distinguish the categories of strict and broad interpretations from those of restrictive and extensive interpretations. Restrictive and extensive interpretations change the meaning of a law by limiting or broadening its applicability. Only the legislator may offer such an interpretation, in accord with canon 16; it must be promulgated and is not retroactive. Strict and broad interpretations do not change the law's meaning in any way. Strict interpretation limits the law's application to the minimum stated in the law; broad interpretation widens the application of the law to all possible cases that can fall within its meaning. Broad interpretation is normative when a law is favorable; strict interpretation is required when a law is "odious," namely, in the three instances mentioned in this canon.[110]

The definition of membership in a religious institute may be useful in exemplifying these distinctions. A strict interpretation of the law would hold that religious life begins with the profession of temporary vows (c. 654); therefore, odious laws applicable to religious, such as a penal law for violation of an obligation of religious life,[111] may not be applied to novices. A broad interpretation would hold that religious life begins with the novitiate (c. 646), so novices are in some sense already members of the institute and may participate in many respects as professed members, such as, in accord with proper law, by living and working in the community, by wearing the habit, etc. A restrictive interpretation of religious life would hold that only those in perpetual vows are religious; this would illicitly deny to temporary professed rights that they have in the law (e.g., c. 670). An extensive interpretation would hold that even postulants or associates are members of the institute; this would illicitly extend to them the rights or impose the obligations proper only to professed religious and/or novices.

[109] E.g., the fundamental principle that laws must be interpreted in such a way that they do not result in anything unjust or absurd, which is contrary to the nature of law as an ordinance of reason; the principle that beneficial laws should be broadly interpreted and burdensome laws strictly interpreted; the rule of canonical equity; the role of custom; etc.

[110] This follows from the long-standing canonical principle that odious matters are to be restricted and favors amplified: Odia restringi, et favores convenit ampliari. RI 15.

[111] E.g., c. 1392. A novice may be dismissed for not observing religious obligations, but penal laws could not be applied unless the laws were applicable to all the faithful.

Penal laws are those for whose violation the law prescribes a penalty.[112] Strict interpretation of penal laws is necessary to protect the rights of persons, including those who have committed or been accused of a crime. A judge or superior cannot penalize someone for an offense that is not a crime in canon law, nor impose a harsher penalty than the law itself establishes. The crime must be gravely imputable by reason of malice or culpability and be committed exactly as stated in the law before the offender is subject to a penalty (c. 1321). For example, the crime of abortion is subject to the penalty of latae sententiae (automatic) excommunication (c. 1398), but an attempted abortion, though sinful, is not a crime.[113]

A law that restricts the free exercise of a right places one or more limitations on a right recognized in canon law, be it natural, ecclesial, or acquired.[114] The terms of such laws are subject to strict interpretation to enable maximal exercise of personal rights within the letter of the law. For example, all the faithful have a right to receive Holy Communion (cc. 213, 912). To restrict this right, there must be a clear basis in the law,[115] or the right is unlawfully denied. Thus, pastors are not free to extend to parents the requirement of preparation of children for the sacrament (c. 913, §1), and unlawfully deny the sacrament to children whose parents do not participate. Likewise, persons may not be denied the Eucharist whenever the minister considers them unworthy, but there must be positive proof that all the terms of the law have been met: (1) they have committed an objectively grave sin that (2) is manifest, and (3) they obstinately (after a warning) continue to commit the sin (c. 915).[116]

There is no consensus among the commentators on either the 1917 or 1983 codes on how to apply the rule that laws that contain an exception from the law are subject to strict interpretation.[117] However, it seems evident that this rule should be applied in accord with the axiom on which this canon is based, that "favors are to be broadened and odious things are to be restricted."[118] Therefore, favorable laws, even if they are exceptions to the rule, are subject not to strict but to broad interpretation. For example, canon 932, §1 states that the eucharistic celebration is to be carried out in a sacred place unless necessity requires otherwise, in which case it must be in some fitting place. The rule is that the Eucharist is to be celebrated in a sacred place; the exception is that it may be celebrated in another fitting place in a case of necessity. Since the exception is a favor, the meaning of "case of necessity" calls for a broad interpretation—not only when it is physically impossible to celebrate in a sacred place, but also in cases of pastoral need, such as when it is spiritually beneficial for a group of the faithful occasionally to have a Mass in a school, home, etc. Many laws allow exceptions that grant favors, the terms of which are subject to broad interpretation.[119] Each term or condition of the law must be fulfilled for the exception to apply, but the meaning of each is subject to broad interpretation.

[113] The authentic interpretation of December 12, 1988 on what constitutes the crime of abortion was extensive and could not have lawfully been made except by the legislator or his delegate. It is not retroactive. AAS 80 (1988) 1818; Pamplona ComEng, 1297.

[114] In one sense, any law that imposes an obligation or a prohibition limits one's personal freedom, but what is meant here is a right that canon law recognizes as such, including the human rights of the divine natural law.

Laws containing an exception from the law must be strictly interpreted, even if the exception grants a favor, whenever broad interpretation would have an "odious" result, in particular, when broad interpretation would infringe upon the exercise of another person's rights or whenever a broad interpretation would be unreasonable. If an exception is favorable to one person or group, but infringes on the rights of another, the exception must be strictly interpreted. For example, if a pontifical religious institute were to claim that its apostolate is exempt from the authority of the diocesan bishop (c. 591), it could not base this claim on some broad understanding of exemption but it would have to prove that a pope had expressly granted this specific exemption that would restrict a fundamental right and obligation of the bishop (cc. 763, 394).[120]

In general, exceptions from the law are odious and require strict interpretation whenever a broad interpretation would be unreasonable, such as when a broad interpretation would weaken the law's purpose or be harmful to church order. Deeply rooted in the canonical tradition is the conviction that a law must be reasonable,[121] and so it follows that interpretation of law must also be reasonable. If broad interpretation of an exception to the law, though granting a favor, results in an unreasonable application of the law, it is odious and contrary to this canon. Unreasonableness may be demonstrated when a broad interpretation would be contrary to a legal custom or the express policy of the particular territory or community,[122] or when it would be contrary to standard canonical principles and rules.[123]

Cases Involving Lacunae

Canon 19 — If a custom or an express prescript of universal or particular law is lacking in a certain matter, a case, unless it is penal, must be resolved in light of laws issued in similar matters, general principles of law applied with canonical equity, the jurisprudence and practice of the Roman Curia, and the common and constant opinion of learned persons.

This canon provides a remedy for a lacuna legis, literally, a "hole in the law." A lacuna occurs, as the canon states, when an express provi-

[120] For other examples of this kind, see cc. 312, §1, 3°; 377, §4; 523; 1021.

[121] See commentary on cc. 7 and 24.

[122] It is also possible that the particular custom or policy is needlessly strict and needs to be reassessed in light of changing circumstances.

[123] E.g., c. 89 states the basic rule that the pastor and other presbyters and deacons cannot grant dispensations from the law, unless this power has been expressly granted to them. Since this is a fundamental rule on which the validity of the dispensation is based, one may not broadly interpret the meaning of "expressly granted" to include tacit delegation, despite the fact that the granting of a dispensation is a favor. Thus, when a visiting priest is appointed to substitute for a vacationing pastor, any faculties to dispense must be explicitly granted by law or delegation or implicitly granted by appointing him administrator (c. 540, §1). He cannot simply presume that his appointment as the pastor's replacement tacitly confers all the powers of the pastor.

sion of universal or particular law[124] or a custom[125] is lacking to provide a solution for a concrete case.[126] Laws are meant for the generality of cases, but sometimes no law exactly covers a particular case. Often, customs arise in those areas of the community's life not regulated by law. If there is no law or legal custom, and some matter requires a solution, a lacuna exists.[127] This canon establishes four sources that judges, administrators, scholars, and other interpreters of the law should use to seek a rule, norm, or principle to resolve the case.[128]

1. Laws issued in similar matters.

When there is no precise law or custom for a particular case, the interpreter may find elsewhere in the law a norm issued for a similar matter and, by analogy of law (anologia legis), apply it to the case. For example, the law requires a seriously ill person to have attained the use of reason before receiving the sacrament of the anointing of the sick, but it allows children with a serious illness to be anointed before the age of seven provided they have sufficient use of reason to be comforted by the sacrament.[129] However, the universal law says nothing about seriously ill persons who have not attained the use of reason due to a developmental disability such as mental retardation. By analogy of law, they may be anointed if they have sufficient use of reason to be comforted by the sacrament.[130]

2. General principles of law applied with canonical equity.

Pertinent general principles of law (ius) may be useful in finding a solution to a case involving a lacuna. Among these are general principles derived from the divine law, both positive and natural; the general principles contained in Book I of the code; the fundamental laws at the beginning of Book II of the code; and other general princi-

[124] Although the canon speaks of lex, this must be understood in a broad sense to include all written sources of the objective ius—laws, general administrative norms, and, when applicable, statutes and ordinances.

[125] This must be a legal custom, one with the force of law (cc. 23–26), if the solution is to be binding, as when given by a judge or administrator who must officially resolve a case. E.g., if a case has been handled the same way for at least thirty years and a legal custom has been established, there is no lacuna. The custom itself has the force of law and must be observed.

[126] The "case" must be understood broadly, not just in terms of administrative and judicial cases, but anytime a lacuna exists and a just solution must be found to resolve the matter. This includes a lacuna caused by an objectively doubtful law (c. 14). Solutions to cases by application of c. 19 pertain only to liceity; an invalidating or incapacitating effect must be expressly stated in the law (c. 10).

[127] According to L. Örsy, a "lacuna in the proper sense occurs when there is a right that must be supported, or an injustice that cries for redress, or a freedom that needs protection, and there is no appropriate provision in the legal system." CLSA Com, 37.

[128] Comm 17 (1985) 34–35. Administrators who must make a decision for the good of the community and judges who must decide a case are obliged to observe c. 19; canonists should use it whenever required by their science or to assist the faithful in finding practical and equitable solutions. The suppletory norm made by an administrator or judge binds only in that case. Solutions derived by canonists and other private persons are not binding but may be adopted more widely to the extent that the reasoning on which they are based is persuasive.

[130] Some other examples are: the authority to issue dimissorials, missing in c. 1018, §1 for personal prelatures, is supplied by analogy with c. 295, §1; the requirement for a probationary period before transfer from one religious institute to another (c. 684, §2) can be extended to transfers from one society of apostolic life to another (c. 744, §1); the procedure for the removal and transfer of parish priests (cc. 1740–1747) can be applied to removal and transfer from other offices (c. 193, §1); the norms for the election of the diocesan administrator in sede vacante (cc. 423–424) can be applied to the election of the priest in charge of the diocese during an impeded see (c. 414); the rules for the collegial acts of juridic persons (c. 119) can be applied to other groups.

Another notable lacuna in the code is the absence of rules governing general administrative norms and other forms of written ius comparable to the rules that exist for leges in title I of the code. By analogy of law, pertinent canons from title I can be used to supply for this lacuna.

ples governing canonical institutes and acts.[131] Juridic maxims and principles from Roman law and the canonical tradition are useful, in particular the Regulae Juris in Sexto.[132] Principles from contemporary civil law systems might also be helpful, provided they are not contrary to the divine or the canon law and are congenial with the canonical system.

Equity is an ethical principle by which judges and superiors apply the law with mercy. Avoiding mere juridical formalism, they seek an interpretation and enforcement of the law that, while faithful to the law's meaning, take into account the situation of persons and the concrete circumstances of the case, bearing in mind the overall purpose of the law, which is to promote the common good and the salus animarum (cf. c. 1752). Equity corrects the rigor of the law and tempers it with mercy. It is a higher form of justice, an expression of Christian love, or charity.[133] Both judges and administrators (bishops, vicars general, religious superiors, parish priests, et al.) must render decisions equitably, applying the law with compassion and keeping in mind the nature of the case and the circumstances of persons. Just as they must always enforce the law with canonical equity, so also must they equitably apply general principles of law (ius) in solving a case involving a lacuna.

3. The jurisprudence and practice of the Roman Curia.

Jurisprudence is the science of law that develops from actual judicial cases. The jurisprudence in question is especially that of the Supreme Tribunal of the Apostolic Signatura and the Roman Rota. The Rota is particularly influential in church tribunals around the world as a source of jurisprudence on marriage law. The principal legislation governing the Roman Curia acknowledges this role of the Rota in stating that it "fosters unity of jurisprudence and, by virtue of its own decisions, provides assistance to lower tribunals."[134]

The practice of the Roman Curia refers to the administrative activity of the Roman dicasteries, in particular, the way it resolves specific cases. As for its juridical value, the curial practice is not binding on lower authorities, but is to be taken into account. The curial dicasteries usually develop a common approach to the various kinds of cases that fall within their competence. Knowing the way they handle cases and the decisions they reach may assist local administrators who encounter similar cases. For example, the law says nothing about a person who wishes to receive Communion, but can ingest food and drink only from a stomach tube. May the bishop dispense from the liturgical law[135] to allow Communion to be given through the stomach tube? In reaching [131] Such principles are not usually stated explicitly as principles but are known to be such by reflection upon the entirety of the laws governing a juridic entity. For example, the liturgical laws taken as a whole lead to a number of principles, among them, that the integrity of liturgical celebrations must be protected, that the active participation of the faithful is to be fostered, that preparation for the liturgy is required, that the diocesan bishop has authority over the public exercise of divine worship, that significant adaptations in the liturgy cannot be made except by legislative authorities, that the Catholic liturgy is primarily directed to benefit the Catholic faithful, etc. General principles can likewise be derived for other major juridic institutes, like marriage, diocesan administration, judicial procedures, etc.

[133] Equity also exists in the civil courts, e.g., when a judge does not apply the maximum penalty in consideration of the circumstances of the convicted person and the crime—a first-time offender, young age, provocation to commit the crime, etc.

Equity should not be confused with epieikeia. Equity is applied by interpreters of the law, especially administrators and judges; epieikeia is used directly by the subject of the law on his or her own behalf. Epieikeia is a virtue by which the subject of the law does not observe the law when, in particular circumstances, a greater good is at stake. See J. Coriden, "Rules for Interpreters," in The Art of Interpretation (Washington, D.C., 1982) 5–6.

his decision, it might help the bishop to know that the Holy See has granted indults permitting this, but refused an indult for Communion through a nasal tube.[136] The bishop may take this practice of the Roman Curia as a possible solution for his own case.

This rule on consulting the jurisprudence and practice of the Roman Curia is difficult to observe consistently, because the Holy See does not systematically publish its decisions, particularly those in the administrative realm. For the most part, the interpreter must look to private collections, most notably (in English translation) the multi-volume Canon Law Digest and Roman Replies and CLSA Advisory Opinions.[137]

4. The common and constant opinion of learned persons.

The learned persons (doctores) are those who publish scholarly monographs, commentaries, and canonical opinions. When an opinion is both common and constant, it is safe to use as a source for resolving a case where there is no applicable law or custom. A constant opinion is one that endures over an extended period, one that has stood the test of time. The common opinion is the one that becomes dominant by the force of its argumentation and the depth of its reasoning. This is not simply a matter of counting the number of authors who hold one view or another. Sometimes a minority opinion is more persuasive on its merits and should be preferred to the majority opinion. This may happen especially if the minority opinion adds new information not known or considered by earlier authors, and the common opinion of the past is clearly now incomplete or even obsolete.

A lacuna in penal cases may not be resolved by the means provided in this canon. A judge or superior may not impose a penalty for a case unforeseen in the law, in keeping with the long-standing principle, nulla poena sine lege. This exception is intended to protect the right of those accused of a crime not to be punished except according to the law.[138] Analogously, solutions derived from the four sources of this canon may not be applied if they would restrict the free exercise of rights or be unjust or unreasonable (cf. c. 18). Moreover, equity must prevail in solutions derived from all four sources for resolving cases, not just from the application of general principles of law (ius).

The four sources of this canon for resolving cases involving a lacuna are equal to each other in value; the order of their presentation does not imply any ranking. The interpreter should use as many of them as may be helpful in reaching a solution for a given case.

Revocation of Law

Canon 20 — A later law abrogates, or derogates from, an earlier law if it states so expressly, is directly contrary to it, or completely reorders the entire matter of the earlier law. A universal law, however, in no way derogates from a particular or special law unless the law expressly provides otherwise.

Divine laws do not change, but ecclesiastical laws, being of human origin, can be revoked partially (derogation) or entirely (abrogation). This canon treats the ways that a law may be revoked by a later law, either expressly or tacitly. The legislator competent to revoke a law is the legislator who promulgated the law, or his successors. The pope may revoke the law of any lower legislator, [136] CLD 6, 562–565 records three affirmative replies on the stomach tube, and a negative reply on the nasal tube. These were granted by the Holy Office in the early 1960s before diocesan bishops had the power to dispense from universal disciplinary laws.

[137] Both are published by the CLSA in Washington, D.C. The CLD mainly contains public documents, which are a binding source of ius and not the subject of c. 19, but it also has numerous private replies. RR consists mainly of private replies. These replies are the best source for determining the practice of the Roman Curia with respect to actual cases.

[138] Canon 221, §3 uses the words ad normam legis, which means that the faithful may not be punished by canonical penalties on any basis other than legislation.

but it is disputed whether a particular council or conference of bishops may revoke a law of the diocesan bishop.[139]

Express revocation occurs when a later law expressly states that it is revoking an earlier law, either explicitly or implicitly. A law explicitly revokes when it unequivocally states that it is derogating from or abrogating one or more previous laws, for example, canon 6, §1, 1°. A law implicitly revokes by using a general expression or formula to the effect that previous laws are being abrogated or derogated from, such as "notwithstanding anything to the contrary," "anything presently in force contrary to this law is abrogated," "derogating from other laws in force," etc.

Unlike express revocation, tacit revocation makes no mention of the fact that any previous law is being revoked. Tacit revocation occurs when a later law is directly contrary to an earlier law, and when a later law completely reorders the matter of the earlier law.[140]

A later law is directly contrary to an earlier one whenever the two are in opposition to each other, as when the later law permits or commands something that had been prohibited or when it prohibits something that had been permitted or commanded. For example, n. 39 of the 1975 edition of the General Instruction of the Roman Missal said that the Alleluia before the gospel at Mass may be omitted if not sung, but n. 23 of the 1981 Lectionary for Mass says that the Alleluia "must be sung," that is, it must be omitted if not sung and may never be recited.

The second way in which a later law tacitly abrogates or derogates from an earlier law is when the later law completely reorders (de integro ordinet) the entire subject matter of the earlier law. (1) The revocation affects an entire document when a new document is published treating anew the entire matter of an earlier one.[141] It is unnecessary for the legislator or executive authority to abrogate expressly the earlier document; the complete reordering of its subject matter in the later document tacitly abrogates it.[142] (2) The revocation may affect all or some of the norms governing a juridic institute (that is, a subject matter or entity regulated by law). For example, canons 873–874 on the qualifications of godparents completely reordered n. 10 of the 1969 Christian Initiation: General Introduction by treating anew the whole institute of godparents; and canons 960–963 on general confession and absolution completely reordered the 1973 Rite of Penance, nn. 31–34.[143] (3) The abrogation or derogation by a later law may affect only one or several laws or

[141] E.g., the 1993 Directory for the Application of the Principles and Norms on Ecumenism completely reordered the previous directory of 1967 and 1970, as well as all other "norms already established for implementing and developing the decisions of the Council given up to the present" (Ecum Dir 6). In virtue of this complete reordering of ecumenical law (ius), the ius vigens on ecumenism consists of the pertinent canons of the Latin and Eastern codes and the 1993 Ecum Dir, not any other documents before 1993.

[142] Some authors have suggested that there was no need for the legislator expressly to abrogate the 1917 code in c. 6, §1, 1° of the 1983 code, because this would have been accomplished in virtue of the 1917 code's complete reordering by the 1983 code. However, this may have left uncertainty regarding the status of those parts of the 1917 code that were not treated anew in the 1983 code, so express abrogation probably was necessary.

[143] Emendations, 12–13; 17–19 (full citation above at c. 2). The Emendations went into effect on the same day as the code (November 27, 1983), so in reality this was express revocation by the legislator. However, those who prepared the changes in the liturgical books did so in light of the principles of cc. 2, 6, and 20. Had the pope not acted expressly, the revocations would have tacitly occurred anyway due to the code's direct contrariety with and complete reordering of those earlier liturgical laws. In this sense, it is perfectly correct to consider the liturgical rites as having been altered by the code, since all the emendations were directly and solely the result of the code's promulgation. The Emendations provide numerous examples of the application of the principles of direct contrariety and complete reordering.

The complete reordering of an entire document, and sometimes of an entire institute, is easy to demonstrate. It is more difficult to determine when one or more later laws abrogate or derogate from one or more previous laws by completely reordering their subject matter, because there are so many individual norms in the various documents that might be affected. Often, the code or post-code laws and documents will have completely reordered certain norms in a document, while other norms in the same document will not have been reordered. The following are some indicators of the abrogation of or derogation from a law or general administrative norm due to its complete reordering by a later law:

1. A law (lex) restates exactly a general administrative norm or slightly rephrases it without altering its substance; although there is no material difference between the two, the new law has greater juridic value than the administrative norm and must now be considered the ius vigens.[145]

2. A new law deals with the same matter as a previous law or norm, but rephrases it such that the new law is incompatible with, even if not directly contrary to, the former law or norm.

3. A new law changes part of an old law or norm but leaves the rest intact; this is a derogation, not abrogation.[146]

4. A new law adds something to an old law or norm such that the old law or norm is now incomplete and cannot stand on its own as the ius vigens on the matter; this is "subrogation," a derogation by the addition of new material.[147]

5. The forcefulness of the new law is different from that of a former law or norm, for example, the new law says "must" and the former law or norm said "should." There is no incompatibility in content, but a difference in force.

With respect to the liturgical books published before the 1983 code was promulgated, the Holy See itself made an authoritative judgment concerning what norms needed to be changed in them because of the code. With respect to norms in most documents issued from Vatican II to the 1983 code, there is no authoritative guide on what is still in force, and what is not, in light of the [144] The typical examples of complete reordering given by the authors are usually entire documents and less often whole legal institutes. However, the canon speaks of the complete reordering of a law, using the singular. Thus, even a single law can be totally or partially revoked by being completely reordered by another law.

In the opinion of this author, the category of "complete reordering" includes "direct contrariety." A law that is directly contrary to a new law has been reordered as completely as possible! From this perspective, the category of "direct contrariety" is not necessary.

[145] An earlier general administrative norm, an act of executive power, is formally changed when it is promulgated anew as lex. Since law, an act of legislative power, has greater juridic value than an administrative norm, the previous norm with a lower juridic value, though saying the same thing as the new law, cannot be considered the ius vigens. To do so would undervalue the new law, and lead to mistakes in interpretation and application, such as if a later general administrative norm were contrary to it. Cf. cc. 33, §1 and 34, §2.

However, a law does not revoke another law (lex) by restating it if the former appears in a document that still has the force of law. Often, for example, a liturgical law is repeated in other liturgical books; this is simply the reiteration of a law that continues to be in force.

[147] This could be considered simply a new law that is not at all incompatible with the previous law but simply adds new elements. In reality, however, the previous law has been changed, because it no longer adequately represents the ius vigens; one would incorrectly cite the old law as if it were the law governing the subject matter. The old law is derogated not by changing something in it, but by adding something to it that makes it incomplete on its own.

code and the laws and administrative documents published since the code. Consequently, it falls to canonical doctrine (the writings of scholars) to demonstrate which pre-1983 code norms remain the ius vigens and which norms have been completely reordered and therefore abrogated or derogated from by the code and by laws and administrative documents issued after the code.

The revocation of general administrative norms contained in documents issued by executive authorities such as the congregations of the Roman Curia is subject to the rules of canons 33 and 34, §§ 2–3.[148] For example, a new directory abrogates an earlier directory on the same subject; a new law or general administrative norm revokes earlier general administrative norms that are directly contrary to it or that have been completely reordered by the new law or norm.[149] However, a general administrative norm cannot revoke a law or a legal custom.

Particular or Special Norms

The second sentence of canon 20 states a general principle: universal law does not revoke particular or special law unless it expressly says so. Ius particulare includes particular laws (leges), customs, and general administrative norms (e.g., general executory decrees of a vicar general or an episcopal vicar). Opinions differ on the meaning of the term "special law" (ius speciale),[150] but the expression appears to be a way of stressing that the rule of the canon applies not only to the norms and customs of particular territories, but also to norms and customs of juridic persons. This interpretation is in continuity with canon 22 of the 1917 code, which spoke of "statutes of special places and individual persons"[151] as well as with previous schemas on this canon of the code which referred to "special statutes of persons"[152] or simply "special statutes."[153] In keeping with the principle of canon 6, §2, ius speciale may be understood as referring to statutes of juridic persons (c. 94), including the proper law (ius proprium) of institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life. However, the change from "statutes" to ius speciale indicates that the legislator intended a broader meaning than just statutes. Thus, ius speciale means not only the written norms of a juridic person, but also includes their legal customs.

A new universal law revokes neither particular nor special norms, unless the law expressly abrogates or derogates from them as, for example, in canon 5, §1 with respect to contrary customs and in canon 6, §1, 2°–3° with respect to contrary particular laws and particular penal laws. Revocation of particular and special norms by universal law cannot occur tacitly. A particular norm directly contrary to a universal norm remains in force for the subjects of that particular norm, while the universal norm binds everyone else. Nor can a particular or special norm be completely reordered by a universal law. In doubtful cases, the continued viability of the particular and special norms must be upheld (cf. c. 21).

Canon 1502 of the Eastern code expresses the same rules as canon 20. However, it does not mention ius speciale, since it is explicit in the Eastern law that the term ius particulare includes laws, customs, statutes, and all other particular norms (CCEO 1493, §2).[154]

148 The "implicit" revocation mentioned in cc. 33, §2 and 34, §3 also includes tacit revocation.

149 Instructions and similar norms and documents of the Roman Curia given for the executors of the law (c. 34) cannot revoke administrative norms given by the Roman dicasteries for the community. E.g., an instruction may be issued to explain and elaborate on the norms of a directory, but it could not revoke any of these norms. That would be contrary to its nature and purpose.

150 See F. X. Urrutia, "De quibusdam quaestionibus ad librum primum Codicis pertinentibus," P 73 (1984) 297–301. See also the standard commentaries on the 1983 code.

153 ComCICRec, Schema Codicis Iuris Canonici, 1980, c. 20.

154 In our view, the expression ius speciale in c. 20 of the Latin code is not necessary, since the term ius particulare encompasses its meaning also in the Latin canon law.

Doubtful Revocation

Canon 21 — In a case of doubt, the revocation of a pre-existing law is not presumed, but later laws must be related to the earlier ones and, insofar as possible, must be harmonized with them.

This canon provides a rule for a doubt about the revocation of a law. A doubt exists when probable reasons exist for and against the revocation of an earlier law by a later one, and even experts are not able to overcome the doubt. The revocation of the earlier law may not be presumed. Instead, one should examine the two together and attempt to harmonize them.

This should not be confused with canon 14, which says that doubtful laws do not oblige. If the revocation of the earlier law is doubtful, it does not bind, but its revocation may not be presumed; one must attempt to harmonize it with the later law. One cannot presume that a law has been revoked, yet, on the other hand, the presumption of non-revocation does not make a doubtful law binding. Although not binding, the earlier law cannot be disregarded, as if it had been certainly revoked. Perhaps the later law did not abrogate the earlier law but merely derogated from it. In this case, it is possible to observe the unaffected part of the earlier law. An authentic interpretation or further changes in the law may also clarify the force of the earlier law.

A law that expressly revokes an earlier law leaves no doubt that the earlier law lacks all force. This is true even of implicit revocation by means of a general formula such as "anything to the contrary notwithstanding."[155] Likewise, a law that is directly contrary to an earlier law leaves no doubt about the revocation of the earlier law; the earlier law is revoked because it is manifestly incompatible and irreconcilable with the later law. However, a doubt may arise about revocation by the complete reordering of the entire subject matter of the earlier law.

When a new law or series of laws treats the subject matter of a previous law or laws, various questions may arise. Was the reordering by the new law complete (de integro)? Was the entire subject matter (tota materia) reordered, or only part of it? If the old law contained a provision not mentioned in the new, is the old provision revoked by the complete reordering of the matter in the new law, or does it continue to exist? Is the former law incompatible with the new law, or can both be observed? If such questions are unresolvable, a doubt exists.

This canon prescribes a solution to the problem. In doubt about revocation, an attempt must be made to relate (trahere)[156] the new law to the old and see if they can be harmonized. If they can be harmonized, then both should be observed. If only part of the former law can be harmonized with the later law, then only that part should be observed. Such observance cannot be enforced, however, because a doubtful law does not bind (c. 14). This suggests that there may be another purpose for the rule of canon 21. The legislator may be saying that, by making the effort to harmonize the two laws, it could become clear that the two are not wholly incompatible, and thus a true doubt never really existed.

Canonization of Civil Laws

Canon 22 — Civil laws to which the law of the Church yields are to be observed in canon law with the same effects, insofar as they are not contrary to divine law and unless canon law provides otherwise.

In some instances, canon law does not have its own norms on a matter but defers to the civil laws.

[155] However, if it is doubtful whether an earlier law is truly contrary to the later law, then the presumption favors the continuance of the earlier law, which is to be reconciled with the later.

[156] The Latin words, trahendae sunt, mean in this context that the two laws must be examined together and compared with each other.

The rule of this canon says that, whenever the canon law yields (remittit) to the civil law, the civil law must be observed and its effects are the same in canon law. This is frequently called the canonization of the civil law, because the canonical system adopts as its own and grants complete force to the applicable civil laws. The interpretation and application of such laws must be done according to the rules and standards of the civil law, even by judges, superiors, and others operating within the canonical system. When the civil law conflicts with divine law or canon law, the latter prevails. For example, if a contract to sell church property is valid in the civil law but invalid in the canon law, the ecclesiastical judge or superior must attempt to enforce the canon law.[157]

A better translation of the canon's opening words would be, "the civil laws to which the law (ius) of the Church yields," because canon law does not yield to civil laws in general, but only in certain matters. The code canonizes the civil laws on guardians of minors, prescription, the merely civil effects of marriage, the document required for a proxy marriage, contracts, possessory actions, and rules for settlements, compromise, and arbitration.[158] By canonizing the civil laws on these matters, the canon law avoids conflicts with the various laws of the many civil jurisdictions throughout the world.

The civil laws (leges) in question are all pertinent norms of the State or society—not only legislation but also administrative law, customary law, and other norms. It refers to all levels of the law—international, national, state, county, city (or comparable levels).[159] The term "canon law" (ius canonicum) here refers only to ecclesiastical law (ius), but generally it has a broader meaning, including both divine law and the various sources of the ecclesiastical law. The explicit mention of the divine law calls attention to the necessity of evaluating the civil laws also in accord with the divine law, for example, as it is expressed in the moral teachings of the Church.

Sometimes the canon law recognizes the applicability and effects of the civil laws on a certain matter without canonizing the laws, that is, without incorporating them into the canonical system itself.[160] In other canons, the code exhorts or requires the observance of the civil laws on a certain matter, which is another way in which the canon law recognizes the applicability of the civil laws without canonizing them.[161] Recognition of the civil laws does not eliminate the possibility that, in individual instances, competent church authorities may determine that a certain civil law should not be observed if it would harm the interests of the Church.

In respect to most legal matters regulated by civil law, canon law says nothing. Morally, citizens are bound to observe legitimate civil laws, but they are obliged to disobey any laws or other directives that "are contrary to the demands of the moral order, to the fundamental rights of persons or the teachings of the Gospel."[162] For the Catholic, two systems of law oblige simultaneously, canon law (including divine law) and legitimate civil laws. While both are binding within separate but parallel systems, the canon law prevails whenever it conflicts with the civil law. Nevertheless, a contrary civil law can still influence the canonical system. For example, canon law does not recognize the validity of civil divorce, yet many ecclesiastical tribunals will not admit petitions for the invalidity of marriage unless civil di-

CUSTOM

In addition to the divine and ecclesiastical law, customs are a major source of the ius canonicum. A law is a norm given for the community by a legislative authority; a custom is a norm introduced by the community itself. Customs are often called the "unwritten law," but this is not a definition, because a custom could be written down and it would still be a custom. The key difference between a law and a custom is their respective origins —the legislator for a law, the community for a custom.

In the first millennium, custom was more important than law in ordering the Christian communities. From the twelfth century, legislation grew in importance, but custom continued to enjoy a privileged place. While legislation became the predominant focus of canonists, particularly since the first code of 1917, customs continued to be formed and to shape significant parts of ecclesial life, especially in areas not directly regulated by laws.[164] Today, the convergence of certain demographic, historical, and theological realities has brought about a new awareness of the importance of customs in the inculturation of the Catholic faith within the many thousands of particular communities that make up a world-Church of more than a billion adherents.[165]

Three kinds of practices introduced by the community may be distinguished: an optional practice, which the community does not consider to be binding, that is, the majority of the community would not be opposed to the removal of the practice; factual custom (custom of fact), which the majority of the community considers binding, but does not have the force of law; and legal custom, a custom with the force of law. The canons of title II are concerned with factual and legal customs, in particular, how a factual custom may attain the force of law, which gives the custom legal protection against removal by anyone except the legislator or the community itself.

A custom, like law, is a general norm for the community, a norm that regulates a matter that also could be regulated by law.[166] Custom relates to law in two ways. (1) It is beyond the law (praeter ius) when the law says nothing about the specific matter regulated by the custom. (2) It is contrary to law when it conflicts with what the law prescribes. Traditionally, canonists have recognized a third category of customs in accord with the law. However, this tradition needs to be reassessed for three reasons. (1) So-called "custom in accord with law" does not function as true custom, that is, it creates no new norm for the community.[167] It is either simply a way of observing a law in force, or else it may properly be called a custom beyond the law.[168] (2) The code

[165] This point is developed in J. Huels, "Back to the Future: The Role of Custom in a World Church," CLSAP 59 (1997) 1–25, especially 1–3.

[166] This need not be a positive norm but could simply be the practice of not observing a law (desuetude). It makes no difference whether the community acts in good or bad faith. Even if the community knowingly disregards a law, this non-observance could become a custom with the force of law. However, as will be seen in c. 24, a custom must be reasonable, at least in the circumstances of the community that observes it, for it to attain the force of law.

[167] On this point, see Otaduy, in Com Ex, 1:460–461.

[168] E.g., in a certain diocese it is the "custom" to give the Christmas collection of all the parishes to the priests' re-does not mention customs in accord with the law. (3) All the canons can be literally and reasonably interpreted without positing a category of custom in accord with the law. Indeed, the law makes more sense without this category.[169]

The law of the Eastern code on custom is substantially the same as that of the Latin code (CCEO 1506–1509). A notable difference is that the Eastern code has a brief theological rationale for custom, which states that custom "responds to the action of the Holy Spirit in the ecclesial body" (CCEO 1506, §1). Other significant differences will be noted below.

Title II treats the notion of legal custom (c. 23), the requirement that legal customs be reasonable (c. 24), the community capable of inducing a custom (c. 25), the time required to create a custom with the force of law (c. 26), custom as interpreter of law (c. 27), and revocation of custom (c. 28).

Legal Custom

Canon 23 — Only that custom introduced by a community of the faithful and approved by the legislator according to the norm of the following canons has the force of law.

A legal custom is not a law; it remains a custom but has the force of law (vis legis).[170] Where the legal custom is in force, the faithful are bound to observe it, unless the community is in the process of forming a custom contrary to it. Whether legal or factual, a custom is a normative practice of a community, that is, the community intends the custom to be binding. However, a legal custom has greater stability than a factual custom and cannot be removed except by a contrary law or custom. This canon establishes the rule that, besides being introduced by an ecclesiastical community (c. 25), a custom must be approved by the legislator to attain the force of law.

The community. Only a community within the Church, as discussed below at canon 25, can introduce an ecclesiastical custom. This does not mean that the community's leader may not introduce it, but the community must want it. If a practice is imposed against the will of the majority of the community, it is not a custom and cannot attain the force of law.

The competent legislator. The supreme legislator may approve any custom, universal or particular. A plenary council or conference of bishops (in accord with canon 455) may approve customs particular to the region. The diocesan bishop may approve diocesan customs. With respect to customs contrary to the law, determination of the competent legislator depends on the extent of the law to which the custom relates. If the custom is contrary to the universal law, only the pope or the college of bishops may approve it. If it is contrary to a particular law, the competent particular legislator, or his hierarchical superior, is the competent legislator. For example, the diocesan bishop or the pope could approve a custom contrary to a diocesan law.

Approval of a custom may be either specific or legal. With specific approval, the custom achieves the force of law immediately. Customs may be specifically (specialiter) approved (c. 26) either expressly or tacitly. The legislator expressly approves a custom by explicitly stating this fact in a public document.[171] He tacitly approves a custom tirement fund. This may be seen simply as one way of observing c. 222, §1 or, if the practice is considered normative, as a custom beyond the law, since the law says nothing specifically about Christmas collections.

[169] Canon 28 speaks only of customs contrary to and beyond the law being revoked tacitly by a contrary law or custom. If there were customs in accord with the law, it follows that they could not be tacitly revoked by a contrary law or custom of the community but only expressly by law. This would lead to the absurd conclusion that a community could not change a custom it had introduced!

[170] CCEO 1506–1507 speaks of the vis iuris instead of the vis legis, but no difference in meaning is intended. See Nu, n. 10 (1980) 103 and n. 13 (1981) 12.

[171] The privately expressed views of the legislator are juridically irrelevant. Contra Pamplona ComEng, 94–95, express approval is not given in the form of law. That would make the custom a law, an act of the legislator, rather than approval precisely as custom, a norm of the community.

when it is certain that he is aware of the custom's existence but does nothing to eliminate it, for example, when he celebrates the Eucharist at which the custom is observed.[172] Specific approval may be given at any time within the thirty years it would have taken the custom to attain the force of law by legal approval.

Legal approval, also called "general" approval,[173] is the usual way that customs are approved and are verified as having obtained the force of law. Legal approval is demonstrated when all the conditions of canons 24–26 are met: the custom must be reasonable and not contrary to the divine law; the community must be capable of receiving a law and must intend to introduce a normative practice; the custom must be observed for thirty continuous and complete years. These rules require no intervention of the legislator. Since it is impossible for the legislator to be aware of every custom, the mechanism of legal approval enables customs to achieve the force of law without his specific approval.

As an aid in understanding the following canons, it may be helpful to summarize the various ways in which customs are distinguished. (1) A custom is universal if it is widespread throughout the Latin church or the entire Catholic Church; otherwise, it is particular.[174] (2) A custom may be either beyond the law or contrary to it. (3) A custom is legal and has the force of law if the legislator has approved it, in which case only a contrary law or custom can remove it; otherwise it is factual and any competent superior of the community can remove it. Both factual and legal customs are considered normative by the community, unlike optional practices. (4) A custom may be approved specifically by the legislator, whether expressly or tacitly, in which case it attains the force of law immediately, or it may obtain legal approval in accord with canons 24–26, in which case it takes thirty years to attain the force of law. (5) A centenary custom is at least one hundred years old; an immemorial custom is one that has been observed for as long as anyone can remember.

Reasonableness

Canon 24 — §1. No custom which is contrary to divine law can obtain the force of law.

§2. A custom contrary to or beyond canon law (praeter ius canonicum) cannot obtain the force of law unless it is reasonable; a custom which is expressly reprobated in the law, however, is not reasonable.

Ecclesiastical law and custom, although different in origin, have the same purpose—to order the Christian community and promote the spiritual good of the faithful. To be true to this purpose, both law and custom must be rational, or reasonable; both written and customary norms must be "ordinances of reason."[175] If a law or custom is unreasonable, it lacks the essence of a true canonical norm. An unreasonable law must be changed by the legislator, or the community will cease on its own to observe it, the phenomenon called the "intrinsic cessation" of law.[176] If a custom—a norm introduced by a community—is unreasonable, it cannot achieve the force of law, even if it persists for more than thirty years.

Canon 24 states two kinds of customs that are always unreasonable: those contrary to the divine law and those that are expressly reprobated in the [172] CCEO 1507, §4 explicitly states that the approval of the legislator may be tacit. The more common opinion of canonical authors is that tacit approval also is possible in the Latin church.

[173] Comm 3 (1971) 87; M. Benz, "Die Mitwerkung des Gesetzgebers bei der Entstehung von Gewohnheitsrecht," AkK 155 (1986) 466–479, especially 472–474.

[174] Customs, by nature, are particular; by the time they become universal, they are usually taken up into law. An example of a universal custom is the decoration of churches at Christmas.

[175] Thomas Aquinas, STh I–II, q. 90, a. 1–4.

[176] In fact, this is a contrary custom. The law mandates or prohibits something, and the community does not do it. Since an obsolete or harmful law is unreasonable, the contrary practice of the community, tolerated by the diocesan bishop or competent superior, restores the rationality of church order.

law (ius).[177] Reprobated customs should not be confused with customs that have been abrogated or prohibited in law; the latter may revive and some day become legal; reprobated customs cannot. The juridical text must expressly state that it is reprobating a custom, as with the words reprobata contraria consuetudine. The code expressly reprobates contrary customs in six canons.[178] These practices may never attain the force of law as long as the laws that reprobate them remain in force. Unlike customs contrary to divine law that are intrinsically unreasonable, expressly reprobated customs are not necessarily unreasonable by nature, that is, they could be justified in certain circumstances; instead, they must be considered unreasonable simply because of their explicit reprobation in the law.

A custom contrary to or beyond the law (ius) may be reasonable or unreasonable. The ius to which a contrary custom relates could be a law, a general administrative norm, a statute, an ordinance, or a legal custom. A custom beyond the law is a practice not regulated by any written norm. All customs contrary to or beyond the ius must be reasonable to attain the force of law. Unreasonable customs are those that are against faith or morals, occasion sin, are opposed to the constitution or liberty of the Church, harm the common good, or disrupt the "nerve of ecclesiastical discipline."[179]

The leaders of Christian communities (diocesan bishop, pastor, religious superior, etc.) are responsible for deciding whether a custom is reasonable. By allowing a factual custom to continue, a favorable judgment about the custom's reasonableness is implied; by seeking to eradicate the custom, the superior judges it to be unreasonable. This judgment cannot be based solely on the fact that the custom is contrary to a written norm; otherwise, there would be no role for contrary customs in the canonical system. Rather, it must be based upon a consideration of various criteria depending on the nature of the practice and the circumstances of the case, such as the custom's theological/liturgical propriety, usefulness, meaningfulness to the community, the gravitas (cf. c. 90, §1) or importance of the norm to which the custom is contrary, whether it is peacefully observed, whether most of the community wants to keep observing the practice even after learning it is contra ius, etc.

The Community

Canon 25 — No custom obtains the force of law unless it has been observed with the intention of introducing a law by a community capable at least of receiving law.

The canon lays down two further requirements for a custom of fact to become a custom with the force of law, both pertaining to the community that introduces the custom. The community must (1) be capable of receiving a law (lex), and (2) have the intention of introducing a norm (ius).[180]

[177] Cf. c. 5, §1. Use of the word ius instead of lex makes it evident that customs may also be expressly reprobated by other written sources of the objective ius, such as the ius proprium of institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life. Thus, the reprobation of contrary factual or future customs is not an exclusively legislative power, although legislative power (or a contrary legal custom) is needed to remove a custom that already has the force of law (c. 28). For an opposing view, see H. Socha, in Münster Com, 24/3.

[179] Such would be customs that impede the exercise of ecclesiastical authority or violate fundamental principles and rules of the canonical system. In 1918, the Holy See ruled that the custom, contrary to the 1917 code, of lay persons serving as judges, auditors, and assessors in tribunals "disrupts the nerve of ecclesiastical discipline and is contrary to the liberty and immunity of the Church." This custom was contrary to a fundamental rule of the 1917 code that only clergy could exercise the power of jurisdiction; it was not just a matter of the disciplinary laws requiring these officials to be priests (CIC 118, 1573–1575, 1581). See SCConc, response, December 14, 1918, AAS 11 (1919) 128; CLD 1, 97–98.

The community capable of forming a custom that could attain the force of law must be a community for whom a legislator may enact a law. It is not necessary that the community actually have had any legislation enacted for it, so long as it is capable of receiving a law. The community must be an identifiably ecclesiastical community that, while composed of members of the faithful, does not depend for its continuing existence on any particular physical persons. The community must be ecclesiastically recognized, that is, juridically connected to the Catholic Church as a group, not simply as a collectivity of individual Catholics.[181]

Communities that are capable of receiving a law may be divided into three categories: (1) the community that makes up a juridic person;[182] (2) communities and institutions that, although not juridic persons as such, have been canonically established in some way and are subject to ecclesiastical regulation and supervision;[183] and (3) homogeneous groups of persons who belong to entities defined in 1 and 2, for example, the permanent deacons of a diocese, the lay brothers of a clerical religious institute, the faithful who belong to a parish organization, Catholic hospital chaplains in the diocese, etc.

Not capable of receiving a law are individual families and private associations of the faithful whose statutes have not been approved and which are not subject to hierarchical supervision.[184] The key factors in determining whether a community is capable of receiving law are that, as a distinct community and not merely as a collection of individuals, it is juridically tied to the Catholic Church and subject to supervision by someone with legislative power. The legislator competent to supervise the group would also be competent to make a law for it.

For a custom to obtain the force of law, the capable community must have the intention (animus) of introducing a norm, namely, a normative practice that the community wishes to observe and maintain. A norm is not a merely optional practice about whose observance and preservation the community is indifferent. The community must consider its custom to be binding. It suffices that the faithful want to observe and maintain the custom, even if they are not conscious of this intent. An intention is an act of the will; people can will something without consciously alluding to it in their minds,[185] because the mind and the will are separate though related faculties (cf. cc. 1099–1100). The intention of the community to introduce a norm is usually explicitly manifested only when a superior or minority group within the community attempts to remove the custom. If the community is disturbed by and objects to the attempted removal, the intention to have a binding norm is proven; if the community is unperturbed by the attempt to re-

[181] Authors on both the 1917 and 1983 codes apply variously the concept of the "community capable of receiving law." With respect to the 1917 code, see J. P. Cook, Ecclesiastical Communities and Their Ability to Induce Legal Customs, CanLawStud 300 (1950).

[182] E.g., all churches sui iuris, all particular churches, institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life and their provinces, personal prelatures, parishes, public associations, private associations that have acquired juridic personality after approval of their statutes (c. 322), formally established houses of religious institutes, seminaries, etc.

[183] E.g., private associations that have been approved by ecclesiastical authority and are subject to its regulation; the community that makes up a Catholic institution (such as a university or hospital) which, though not a juridic person, is controlled by a juridic person or Catholic faithful and is subject to canon law; local communities of religious institutes whose members reside in a house that lacks juridic personality but has been established in accord with the proper law of the institute.

[184] Such groups certainly form their own customs, but they are not recognized by canon law as ecclesiastical customs, and they cannot attain the force of law.

[185] E.g., a person wills to avoid physical injury, but this intention need not be conscious to be operative. Many other examples could be given. The canonical doctrine on this issue is surveyed in P. Pellegrino, L' "animus communitatis" e l' "adprobatio legislatoris" nell'attuale dottrina canonistica della consuetudine antinomica (Milan: Giuffrè, 1995). S. Gherro offers a different view from that expressed here in "L'animus communitatis della consuetudine canonica," Ephemerides iuris canonici 38 (1982) 137–139.

move the practice, it is proven that the community does not consider its practice to be binding, and thus the intention to introduce a norm does not exist. The community's indifference shows that the practice is optional and not a real custom.[186]

A custom must be the practice of most members of the community. The majority must intend to introduce a norm, not just tolerate a practice imposed by the community's leadership. A minority practice cannot become a custom with the force of law.

The Eastern code (CCEO 1507, §1) mentions nothing about the community's "intention of introducing a law," but says the practice must be "continuous and peaceful" for the period prescribed in law. This suggests an evolution in the mind of the legislator, namely, that the phrase in the Latin code is unnecessary, since it is clear from the very notion of canonical custom that it is a norm introduced by the community. It further suggests that the community's intention to introduce a norm is demonstrated when the custom has been continuously and peacefully observed for thirty years.

The Required Time

Canon 26 — Unless the competent legislator has specifically approved it, a custom contrary to the canon law now in force or one beyond a canonical law (praeter legem canonicam) obtains the force of law only if it has been legitimately observed for thirty continuous and complete years. Only a centenary or immemorial custom, however, can prevail against a canonical law which contains a clause prohibiting future customs.

The final rule for the formation of a legal custom is given in this canon, which deals with contrary customs and customs beyond the law.[187] Such customs must be observed for thirty continuous and complete years to attain the force of law. If a law prohibits a contrary custom from forming in the future, it could not attain the force of law unless it were legitimately observed for one hundred complete and continuous years (centenary), or unless it were observed as long as anyone in the community could remember (immemorial).[188] A prohibition on future customs does not affect legal customs already existing, which may continue, but it does affect factual customs already in existence that have not yet attained the force of law.

The custom must be legitimately observed, meaning "according to the law," especially canons 24–25. The observance must be for thirty complete years in accord with canons 202, §2 and 203. It must be continuous, that is, without interruption (c. 201, §1).[189] The observance of a custom is in-[186] The purpose of the law on custom may be seen as protecting legal customs from being easily removed, while at the same time allowing the community's leaders the freedom to remove factual customs and optional practices, especially when these are contra ius. The only time the law on custom affects the community's practical life is when someone in authority attempts to remove or change a custom.

[187] The canon speaks of custom contrary to the ius and beyond the lex. Some authors suggest that the use of praeter legem canonicam was a mistake, and the law really means praeter ius, but we believe an interpretation on the basis of the literal meaning of the text, as required by c. 17, is possible. Thus, the only customs praeter ius of concern to the legislator in this canon are those that are beyond the law (praeter legem), not customs beyond other kinds of ius, such as statutes. This means that there is freedom in particular law (ius particulare, but not in the lex particularis) to establish a period other than thirty years for the time needed to establish a binding custom that is praeter ius, e.g., the constitutions of a religious institute with respect to an internal custom of the community. In the absence of such a particular norm, the rule of c. 26 must be observed (cf. c. 19 on laws passed in similar matters).

[188] The canon speaks of a canonical law (lex canonica), not ius. This means that if another source of the ius, such as a statute, were to prohibit future contrary customs, it would take only thirty years to attain juridical force, or that period determined in the ius particulare.

This provision of law has minimal application, as neither the 1917 nor the 1983 code contains a canon prohibiting future customs. A law prohibiting a future contrary custom is not the same as a law revoking or reprobating a contrary custom.

[189] The canonical tradition also holds that the custom must be free (not coerced, but desired by the majority), re- terrupted if: (1) the majority of the community ceases to observe it for a time, (2) the custom is continuously observed but for a time the community does not consider it normative (c. 25),[190] or (3) the custom is expressly disapproved by legitimate ecclesiastical authority. The latter refers not only to those with legislative power but also to executive authorities (the Roman Curia, the vicar general, major superiors, etc.) over matters within their competence.[191] The disapproval may be general by means of a public document (cc. 29–34), or directed to a specific community by an individual administrative decree (cc. 48–49). Observance of a contrary custom is also interrupted if a new law or norm is enacted that repeats the law or norm to which the custom was contrary, for example, the repetition of a norm in a new edition of a liturgical book or a revised directory (cf. c. 28). If the custom continues after the interruption, a new period of thirty years would be required for it to attain the force of law, barring no further interruptions.

The rules of this canon apply only to legal, not specific, approbation. The latter is treated above in the commentary on canon 23.

The Best Interpreter

Canon 27 — Custom is the best interpreter of laws.

The interpretation treated in this canon is better understood as interpretation-in-practice rather than the technical interpretation of a law's meaning treated in canons 17–18. Thus, to say that custom is the best interpreter of law means it is the surest and most reliable way of understanding how the law is to be understood and observed within an actual community. The canon is a well-established maxim in the canonical tradition going back to Roman law, whence it came.[192] It is a particularly useful principle for interpreting a universal law in the diverse particular churches. The law given by the universal legislator provides general rules for the entire Latin church, but circumstances within the many particular churches and communities vary considerably. The sound traditions and customs that have endured the test of time in these many settings provide a solid foundation for the practical interpretation of laws that regulate the same matters as do these customs. The canon applies also to particular laws, but to a lesser degree, since particular laws are themselves frequently a way in which matters treated in the universal law are concretized for particular places and communities.

Authors do not agree on exactly which categories of customs are intended by the canon. Some limit its application only to so-called customs in accord with the law. Others say it refers only to factual customs, because legal customs are themselves norms that must be observed, not interpretations of law. We believe that all customs can interpret the law, but in different ways.

Legal customs, in communities where they are in force, do not interpret the law, because they themselves are norms that must be observed, even if contrary to the law. However, for communities struggling to apply the law in practice, the legal customs on the matter observed by other communities could be helpful means of interpretation. Factual customs contrary to the law might be abuses, so they are not a reliable source of interpretation of the law unless their reasonableness in the circumstances is plainly evident and the cus-peated (with a frequency dependent on the nature of the practice and the circumstances), and public (not concealed and provable).

[190] This is a theoretical possibility, but rarely possible to prove.

[191] Cf. Michiels, Normae generales juris canonici, 2:85. In reality, even lesser superiors, e.g., pastors and local religious superiors, are able to interrupt the observance of a custom pertaining to a matter within their competence. For example, if the pastor eliminates a factual custom contrary to a liturgical law (c. 528, §2), the observance of the custom is effectively interrupted; if it continues under a new pastor, the thirty-year time period must begin again.

[192] D. 1, 3, 27; cf. RI 45. The use of lex in this canon is traditional, not technical. It should be understood to include all forms of the objective, written ius.

tom is tolerated by the ordinary. Customs beyond the law (praeter ius) treat matters not regulated in the law, but they are useful in interpreting laws that deal with similar matters. The rule of this canon does not strictly apply to optional practices of the community that popularly are called customs, but lack an essential feature of custom—that it be observed with the intention of introducing a norm (c. 25). However, such practices may be considered in the application of the law, especially given the difficulty of determining whether the community intends its custom to be normative.

Revocation of Custom

Canon 28 — Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 5, a contrary custom or law revokes a custom which is contrary to or beyond the law (praeter legem). Unless it makes express mention of them, however, a law does not revoke centenary or immemorial customs, nor does a universal law revoke particular customs.

Canon 5 revokes all customs contrary to the code, with the exceptions noted. Canon 28 provides a general rule for the revocation of all customs, but especially legal customs, since factual customs may be removed by executive authorities as well as by law or custom.

A law may revoke a custom in two ways, expressly or tacitly. A law expressly revokes a custom by naming the precise custom or, more commonly, by means of a general formula revoking contrary customs, such as "anything to the contrary notwithstanding." This formula, if it appears in a universal law, revokes only universal customs contrary to the law (which are very rare), but if used in a particular law, it revokes customs contrary to both particular and universal law within that jurisdiction.

A later law tacitly revokes a custom simply by being contrary to it, such that the two are incompatible. The custom can no longer be observed at all or in part without conflicting with the new law, thus the abrogation or derogation of the custom by the new law. Likewise, a new legal custom, contrary to a previous custom, revokes the previous custom. The canon speaks of a contrary custom or law; this is the new law or custom that is contrary to the old custom. The old custom may have been contrary to or beyond the law (ius) in force at that time; in either case, it is revoked (abrogated or derogated from) by the later law or legal custom contrary to it.

Two categories of contrary customs may not be tacitly revoked by a contrary law but must be expressly revoked. (1) No law tacitly revokes centenary and immemorial customs. A general formula revoking contrary customs must refer specifically to centenary and immemorial customs, or they are not revoked.[193] (2) Universal law does not tacitly revoke contrary particular customs that have the force of law. The universal law must expressly revoke contrary particular customs, either by explicitly stating this,[194] or by means of a general formula that includes particular customs.[195]

The revocation of customs by particular law is a question disputed by authors. Certainly, a particular legislator can revoke, for that particular jurisdiction, any custom within the legislator's competence that is contrary to law, whether the custom be contrary to universal or particular law (cf. c. 392). However, some authors maintain that the particular legislator cannot revoke a custom beyond the law (praeter ius), even within his own jurisdiction, if the custom is also in force in a higher legislator's jurisdiction. For example, a diocesan bishop cannot revoke a national custom

[195] E.g., reprobata quacumque consuetudine, or non obstante iure particulari contrario. The revocation of particular law (ius) includes the revocation of particular customs, but the revocation of particular legislation (lex) does not affect customs. Universal law could not revoke contrary particular customs with a general formula such as non obstante consuetudine contraria, because this formula makes no express mention of particular customs.

beyond the law in his own diocese; that must be done by the conference of bishops, plenary council, or supreme legislator. Since the point is doubtful, this latter opinion must be followed, lest the community's right to observe a legal custom be denied by dubious means or broad interpretation (cf. cc. 14, 18).

A new legal custom tacitly revokes an older custom that is contrary to it, even if the older custom is centenary and immemorial. For example, in a certain parish the people had the custom of praying the rosary after daily Mass, but for the past thirty years it was not observed. The old custom is revoked by desuetude, the contrary practice of not observing it. Nothing prevents the resumption of the custom if the pastor and the community want it, but there is no legal right to resume it as there had been before the thirty years expired.

The canon speaks of customs contrary to or beyond the law (lex). Although it speaks only of legislation, the canon may be applied to other forms of the objective ius, in keeping with the rule of canon 19 on laws issued in similar matters. For example, a custom of a province of a religious institute is revoked if new constitutions are approved that contain a contrary norm. However, general administrative norms, as in documents of the Roman Curia, cannot revoke legal customs; only the legislator can do this and, with respect to the universal legislator, the revocation of a particular custom must be expressly stated.[196]

Proof of a Custom

A legal custom has the force of law and, if contrary to law, must be observed in place of the law where the custom is in force. In case of a conflict between a superior who wants to remove a custom and a community that wishes to retain it, the higher superior or judge who is petitioned to decide the case must determine whether a legal custom exists. Unless the legislator has specifically approved the custom, the following are key questions whose answers must be sought by the testimonies of witnesses and/or authentic documents and writings or opinions of experts.

1. Is the community capable of receiving a law, that is, is it a juridically established Catholic community subject to legislative authority, or a homogeneous group within such a community?

2. Is the custom the practice of the majority of the community?[197]

3. Did the community intend to introduce a normative practice, not just an optional one?[198]

4. Has the custom been observed for at least thirty years without interruption? Is the custom centenary or immemorial?

5. Is the custom reasonable?[199]

If a custom has the force of law, the community has the right to maintain it. If the competent legislative authority opposes a legal custom, he may revoke it only by means of a law (c. 8).

[196] The only curial documents that could revoke customs are a legislative decree (c. 29) or a document approved in forma specifica by the pope; in either case, the legislative power comes from the pope.

[197] This is relative to the nature of the custom. E.g., if the custom occurs only at a particular parish Mass, the majority of people attending that Mass, not all parishioners, constitute the homogeneous community.

[198] Ordinarily, this is indicated when the custom has been continuously and peacefully practiced for thirty years. In a conflict situation, it is also indicated when a significant part of the community opposes removal of the custom.

[199] This is best argued on the basis of principles related to the nature of the custom. E.g., a liturgical custom is reasonable if it conforms to sound principles of liturgical celebration; it is unreasonable if it hinders the ends of the liturgy or obscures its proper nature. Experts must be consulted.

TITLE III
GENERAL DECREES AND INSTRUCTIONS
[cc. 29–34]

The first five titles of the code define and regulate different types of normative behavior, moving from the more general and abstract (laws) to the more specific and particularized (statutes and rules of order). Title III serves as a bridge between the generality of law and the particularity of its execution. It moves from the realm of prescribed norms, whether written (laws) or unwritten (customs), to that of the application of those norms, from the legislative to the executive.

The six canons of title III show that terminology and juridic specification do not always coincide with precision. In the canons, the term "general decree" is ambiguous; it may refer to a normative legislative act (a law) or to an executive (or administrative) act of application. The code commission recognized this ambiguity when it stated that "the term decree signifies both laws and the administrative acts which provide for the execution of laws."[1] Canon 29 looks back to the abstract norm of law while canon 30 moves on to new material—the application of law.

General Decrees: Nature/Identification with Laws

Canon 29 — General decrees, by which a competent legislator issues common prescripts for a community capable of receiving law, are laws properly speaking and are governed by the prescripts of the canons on laws.

Although this canon begins title III, it properly belongs to the category of ecclesiastical law. It is placed here to clarify a distinction between traditional usage and juridic reality. At times, particularly at the level of the episcopal conference or diocese, legislative acts are promulgated under the title of general decree. Such general decrees are actually laws. Consequently, only a person (or persons, in the case of a council) who possesses legislative power can issue these decrees. Moreover, as laws, these decrees apply to a "community capable of receiving law." Such a community is one whose ecclesiastical superior possesses legislative authority. Thus, a diocese is such a community, for it is subject to an ecclesiastical superior with legislative authority, that is, to a bishop. A parish, however, would not qualify as a community capable of receiving law, since it is only a part of the community of the diocese and the parish's direct ecclesiastical superior, the pastor, possesses only administrative authority.

Because the decrees are really laws, the prescripts of title I, not the prescripts of title III, apply. Moreover, the presence of this canon underlines the fact that it is only these types of general decrees—that is, decrees promulgated by a legislator—that have the true force of law. As the subsequent canons indicate, general executory decrees do not make law, they apply law.

The confusion caused by this double use of the term "general decree" is illustrated by the question raised concerning the proper interpretation of the term "general decree" in canon 455, §1. Was the reference only to general legislative decrees or also to general executory decrees? An authentic interpretation clarified the issue by indicating that the use of "general decree" included the general executory decrees regulated by canons 31–33.[2]

Limits of the Exercise of Executive Power

Canon 30 — A person who possesses only executive power is not able to issue the general decree

mentioned in can. 29 unless, in particular cases, it has been expressly granted to that person by a competent legislator according to the norm of law and the conditions stated in the act of the grant have been observed.

This canon begins the code's normative organization of the executive, or administrative, function of governance, that is, that function of governance which applies laws rather than creates them.[3] It starts out on a negative note—indicating what an executive official cannot do. Those officials entrusted with the application of the law do not have authority to enact new laws, even if such laws are promulgated under the form of general decrees as described in the previous canon.

The canon provides an exception, however. An executive official can validly issue the type of general decree described in canon 29 if that official has received delegation to do so from a competent legislative authority.[4] The limits and conditions for the use of the delegation would be contained in the act of delegation. Since the code itself limits delegation of legislative authority to the supreme authority of the Church, the competent legislative authority mentioned in the canon would be the Roman Pontiff or an ecumenical council.

Purpose/Issuance of General Executory Decrees

Canon 31 — §1. Those who possess executive power are able to issue, within the limits of their competence, general executory decrees, namely, those which more precisely determine the methods to be observed in applying the law or which urge the observance of laws.

§2. With respect to the promulgation and suspensive period (vacatio) of the decrees mentioned in §1, the prescripts of can. 8 are to be observed.

Canon 31 introduces the positive regulation of executive (or administrative) activity. In considering this activity, some brief remarks about terminology may be helpful. While canon 135, §1 refers to the division of governance into the legislative, executive, and judicial functions, the code also uses the term "administrative" to refer to the activities of executive authority. For example, title IV of this book concerns singular administrative acts; canon 149, §2 refers to an administrative tribunal; and canon 1400, §2 speaks of an act of administrative power. In these canons, "administrative" refers to the activity of executive authority.

The use of the adjective "administrative" as a reference to the executive function of governance, however, should not be confused with the similar terminology in the code of an "act of administration." The acts of administration mentioned in canons 638, §1 and 1277 are not necessarily acts of executive authority but rather actions involving some use of ecclesiastical goods.

Administrative activity, that activity performed by a person who possesses administrative or executive authority, encompasses the broad and difficult to define area of governance that is neither law-enacting nor formally judicial. It is difficult to define because administrative/executive activity includes applications of laws that are quasi-legislative (for example, the general executory decrees described in this canon) as well as applications that are quasi-judicial (for example, the imposition of a penalty through an administrative process). Administrative activity is that action of governance which carries out the day-to-day application of abstract norms to the concrete circumstances of ecclesial life, apart from those specific activities entrusted to the courts.

Canon 31 regulates that aspect of executive authority that more closely resembles legislative actions. A general executory decree is analogous to a law. Like a law, it is general and abstract. It differs from a law, however, in that it does not create a new norm as such but applies an existing norm more specifically. The general decree depends upon a prior law. General decrees specify the law or urge its observance; they do not create new law.

This distinction is important, particularly in the interpretation of general decrees issued by the Roman congregations. They are executive, not legislative, acts[5] and are thus dependent upon the canons of this section for their proper interpretation.

Although this canon clearly states that general executory decrees are not laws but applications of existing laws, the analogy to law remains. The second paragraph of the canon prescribes that general executory decrees are to be issued in the same way that laws are promulgated.

Subjects of General Executory Decrees

Canon 32 — General executory decrees oblige those who are bound by the laws whose methods of application the same decrees determine or whose observance they urge.

This canon determines those obliged to observe the general executory decrees described in the preceding canon. It does so by stating that those who have to observe a law must also observe the general decrees that further specify that law.

An apparent lack of precision in this canon is that the extent of an administrator's competence does not necessarily coincide with that of the legislator. Canons 12 and 13 determine those who are obliged to observance of a law. A general executory decree, however, obliges only those who are both obliged to the law by virtue of canons 12 and 13 and under the authority of the administrator who issues the general executory decree. While a prescript of the code may well oblige all members of the Latin rite, a general executory decree of an episcopal conference would oblige only those members of the Latin rite under the authority of that particular episcopal conference. The law may remain uniform, but its application through general executory decrees may vary from one executive authority to another.

The Relation of Decrees to Laws

Canon 33 — §1. General executory decrees, even if they are issued in directories or in documents of another name, do not derogate from laws, and their prescripts which are contrary to laws lack all force.

§2. Such decrees cease to have force by explicit or implicit revocation made by competent authority as well as by cessation of the law for whose execution they were given. They do not, however, cease when the authority of the one who established them expires unless the contrary is expressly provided.

General executory decrees further specify a law or urge its observance.[6] Such decrees, consequently, depend upon the prior existence of the law; they are not equal but subordinate to the law. The first paragraph of canon 33 emphasizes this dependence. An act which fulfills the definition of canon 31, §1, no matter what title it has, can further specify a law but it cannot nullify the provisions of that law. Should it do so, those provisions of the decree which contradict the law have no effect. They are not to be observed nor can they be used as an argument to suggest that the law has been changed or repealed. Only the legislator or a legitimate delegate can change or repeal laws.

Canon 31 indicates how a general executory decree comes into being. The second paragraph of canon 33 describes how a general executory decree ceases. Three possibilities are given. First, the competent authority can repeal the act; if an administrator can issue a general executory decree, the administrator can also repeal that decree.

Second, a general executory decree loses force if the law which it executes ceases to exist. Since a general executory decree depends upon a prior law, its continued existence also depends upon the continued existence of that same law. When the law ceases, so does the decree, since the decree is merely a specific application of the law.

[5] See PB, arts. 18 and 156, AAS 80 (1988) 864 and 901, as well as the Regolamento Generale della Curia Romana, art. 109, §§1 and 2, AAS 84 (1992) 244.

[6] See, for example, the Ecumenical Directory, AAS 85 (1993) 1039–1119.

Third, a general executory decree can cease to exist when the administrator who issued it leaves office. This third manner of cessation of a decree, however, is the exception rather than the norm. The general norm is that when an administrator leaves office, the general executory decrees issued by that administrator remain effective. Since general decrees are issued as a necessary or useful specification of the law, they share the law's quality of permanence. Thus, a general executory decree ceases when the issuing administrator leaves office only if the decree expressly provides for that result.

Rules for Instructions

Canon 34 — §1. Instructions clarify the prescripts of laws and elaborate on and determine the methods to be observed in fulfilling them. They are given for the use of those whose duty it is to see that laws are executed and oblige them in the execution of the laws. Those who possess executive power legitimately issue such instructions within the limits of their competence.

§2. The ordinances of instructions do not derogate from laws. If these ordinances cannot be reconciled with the prescripts of laws, they lack all force.

§3. Instructions cease to have force not only by explicit or implicit revocation of the competent authority who issued them or of the superior of that authority but also by the cessation of the law for whose clarification or execution they were given.

The code explicitly includes norms for instructions in order to provide juridic certainty that instructions are not laws and that laws cannot be enacted under the title of "Instruction."[7] Rather, like general executory decrees, instructions are acts of executive authority, that is, administrative acts. Both general executory decrees and instructions are issued by those who possess executive, or administrative, authority. They are both dependent upon a prior law for their existence and effect.

What distinguishes the two are the object and the audience. A general executory decree further specifies a law or urges observance of a law. An instruction, on the other hand, further specifies how the law is to be applied in practice. A general executory decree binds those obliged to observance of the law. An instruction binds subordinate administrators, namely those who are responsible to execute or apply the law.

An instruction, therefore, is a handbook or guideline for those whose responsibilities involve the application of the law in concrete circumstances—people such as pastors, vicars, directors of religious education, etc.[8] The guidelines for the application of the law found in an instruction, however, are not merely suggestions; they oblige those who are responsible for the application of the law. Instructions provide more detailed regulations in an attempt to ensure a more uniform application of the law accommodated to current circumstances. Instructions are based on the presumption that coordination of activity fosters the common good.

Because instructions are a type of executive, or administrative, action, their relationship with the law is similar to that of general executory decrees. The second and third paragraphs of this canon apply the earlier norms of general executory decrees to instructions.

TITLE IV
SINGULAR ADMINISTRATIVE ACTS
[cc. 35–93]

CHAPTER I
COMMON NORMS
[cc. 35–47]

The Author of an Administrative Act

Canon 35 — A singular administrative act, whether it is a decree, a precept, or a rescript, can be issued by one who possesses executive power within the limits of that person's competence, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 76, §1.

With title IV, the code begins the normative regulation of the typical activity of an executive authority or administrator—the particularized application of the law to concrete, specific circumstances. It is important to note that not every action of an administrator is an administrative act. An administrator often handles a variety of affairs. Administrators answer correspondence, order office supplies, chair staff meetings, and approve expense accounts. The fact that an action is performed by an administrator does not make that action an administrative act as understood in these canons.

An administrative act is a juridic action. It is an act performed by an administrator as a function of office and intended to have a juridic effect. An administrative act changes the juridic situation of a physical or juridic person. It is consequently a more limited notion than a mere action of an administrator, for it entails a legal consequence.

The current canon categorizes administrative acts as decrees, precepts, or rescripts.[9] A singular administrative act that resolves a controversy or makes a provision is a decree. A precept imposes an injunction. A rescript answers a request for a favor, that is, a request for some juridic action to which the petitioner does not have a legal right.

Although canons 35–47 provide the general norms for singular administrative acts, inconsistencies of usage do occur in the code. Canons 1400, §2 and 1445, §2 refer to acts of administrative power. Sixteen canons[10] refer to indults, even though an indult is not included here as a type of administrative act. Despite such inconsistencies, however, it is clear that an indult of release from vows issued by the Holy See or a diocesan bishop in accord with canon 691, §2 is an administrative act and must conform to the prescripts of the general norms given here in Book I.

Interpretation of an Administrative Act

Canon 36 — §1. An administrative act must be understood according to the proper meaning of the words and the common manner of speaking. In a case of doubt, those which refer to litigation, pertain to threatening or inflicting penalties, restrict the rights of a person, injure the acquired rights of others, or are contrary to a law which benefits private persons are subject to a strict interpretation; all others are subject to a broad interpretation.

§2. An administrative act must not be extended to other cases besides those expressed.

The rules for the interpretation of an administrative act parallel those given in canons 17 and 18 for the interpretation of laws. As with laws, administrative acts must be understood according to the proper meaning and common usage of the words. The law presumes that an administrator expects to communicate meaning, not confuse the issue, and thus uses a particular language in accord with its own rules of grammar, syntax, and vocabulary. This should not obscure the fact, however, that legal systems themselves have particular vocabularies that may attribute a specific meaning to a word even though that word may have other meanings in non-legal contexts.

[9] Canons 48 to 75 provide more specific norms for these three types of singular administrative acts.

If there is doubt about the exact meaning or extent of the administrative act, however, additional rules apply. Administrative acts that restrict freedom or the free exercise of rights are to be interpreted strictly, that is, interpreted so as to be limited in their application. This canon lists the cases in which such limitation applies: administrative acts that involve lawsuits, threaten or impose penalties, restrict rights, injure the acquired rights of others, or are to the benefit of private persons and contrary to the law. In other circumstances in which sanctions or the restriction of rights are not at issue, administrative acts are subject to broad interpretation.

Unlike laws, which are general and abstract, singular administrative acts are concrete and individual. They are applications of the law to a particular need. Consequently, the present canon restricts the application of a singular administrative act to the situation for which it was issued. When a lacuna legis appears, analogous laws are applied to fill the "gap" in the law. This does not hold true in the sphere of administrative activity. If the need for administrative action arises, the proper response is not to apply another administrative act to the situation by way of analogy, but to request a concrete response from the competent authority.

Written Form of an Administrative Act

Canon 37 — An administrative act which regards the external forum must be put in writing. Furthermore, if it is given in commissorial form, the act of its execution must be put in writing.

In regulating the activity of public officials, the code adopts the practice common to contemporary legal communities—the rule that official acts must be issued in written form. This is not a recommendation for administrators but a requirement. The canon prescribes that an administrative act must be issued in writing. The Latin text uses the strongest form of the jussive. Nevertheless, written form is required only for legitimacy, not for validity. According to canon 124, §1, requirements for the validity of juridic acts are to be expressed in the law; in the current canon written form is not expressly required as a condition for validity. Moreover, canon 58, §2 makes explicit provision for acts given orally, which would seem unnecessary if such acts were invalid by law. The canon does not even require that the written document be signed, though some means of authentication seems necessary by virtue of canon 40 below.

The canon does qualify this requirement, however. An administrative act must be issued in writing when it concerns the external forum. The general understanding of governance in the law is that it deals with the external, public order of the community. In fulfilling its mission of sanctification, however, the Church also functions authoritatively in the internal forum, the forum of conscience. In those more unusual circumstances when an authoritative act of executive authority takes place within that forum—some action, for example, by the Apostolic Penitentiary—the requirement of written form does not apply. The canon does not prohibit issuance in writing in such circumstances, but neither does it require it. Singular administrative acts in the internal forum will follow the specific directives which regulate the activities of those executive agencies competent to act in such matters.

The requirement of written documentation in executive activity in the external forum extends not only to the original administrative act but also to the execution of that act when the act is issued in commissorial form. An administrative act is an application of the law to some concrete case. It thus applies to some particular person or persons —whether physical or juridic. It is generally not sufficient that an administrator apply the law. The administrator must also communicate that application to the interested or affected parties. Just as a law that was not promulgated would be an ineffective law, so too an administrative act that was not communicated would remain an ineffectual act of governance.

The communication or execution of an administrative act can take place in two ways. The simplest way would be to notify the affected parties—to hand them the written document, send it to them in the mail, etc. This is a process of simple notification. The written document, or at least its content, is conveyed to the parties in some immediate way.

With new technology, however, new questions arise. May an act be communicated by fax or e-mail? The difficulties with new technologies concern elements of security and authenticity. E-mail can lack appropriate security and cannot be easily authenticated, though further development may resolve these problems. Fax transmittals are more trustworthy than e-mail, since a facsimile can show the actual document, including signatures and seals. The authentic decree, however, remains the written document, at least at present. Canon 40 below, though, seems to take into account developing technology by allowing execution of a decree if "previous notice" of the official act has been received.

At times, simple notification may not be opportune. The administrator and the parties may be at some distance from one another. The content of the act may be of such importance that the administrator wishes to verify that certain conditions are fulfilled or that specific circumstances are verified. In such a case, the administrator may entrust the execution of the act to another person. The law refers to this process as the issuance of an act in commissorial form. The original act is to be executed by means of a secondary instrument.

For example, the supreme moderator of a clerical religious institute of pontifical right may receive a petition for separation from the institute. His decree of dismissal is an administrative act, an act of executive authority, since he is an ordinary in the law. It is an act in the external forum with clear juridic effects. Consequently, he must issue his decree as a written document.

It may happen, however, that the supreme moderator does not merely notify the petitioner of his decision but entrusts the execution of his decision to the local superior. The local superior must verify that the situation as described in the petition is true. The local superior has a responsibility greater than that of simple notification. The superior, consequently, carries out his executive responsibility in written, verifiable form.

This is a common practice when the executive authority responsible for a decision is removed from the actual situation, as occurs in the activity of the Roman congregations. To help ensure good governance, the execution of an act of governance is entrusted to someone closer to the scene. Because such acts of execution are also decisory, though in a subordinate manner, the law also requires that they be written.

Government by written documentation is the common practice of contemporary societies. It is a practice which canon law accepts and requires in its own regulation of the use of authority. Written documentation has certain advantages. No matter how clear a person may think he or she has been, disputes do arise. A written document provides objective evidence that can be referred to and studied. Even a text can be vague or understood in various ways. If every written act were clear and unambiguous, there would be no reason to provide the norms for interpretation found in canon 36. Yet a written text provides a far better starting point for resolution of a dispute than the parties' recollections of what may have been said or decided. In its option for written documentation, canon law follows the accepted practice of contemporary legal communities.

Limitations on an Administrative Act

Canon 38 — An administrative act, even if it is a rescript given motu proprio, lacks effect insofar as it injures the acquired right of another or is contrary to a law or approved custom, unless the competent authority has expressly added a derogating clause.

The use of executive authority, the application of the law to the exigencies of the moment, is not an exact science that follows rigorous and un-bending rules of deduction. It is an art, the prudent weighing of myriad factors so that the values professed by the community can be concretely realized at a particular moment and in a particular situation. Such activity requires freedom, flexibility, and good judgment.

Discretionary activity, however, is not unlimited. It is bound by the requirements of justice, the good of the community, and the rights and dignity of individual persons. Administrative activity is discretionary, but it is a structured, regulated discretionary activity.

The current canon places limits upon the discretionary use of executive authority. An administrator may issue an act either because the administrator has received a request for action or because the administrator personally perceives that some action is called for. Nevertheless, the administrative act itself cannot injure another person's acquired right or be contrary to the law or to an approved custom. If the act is issued in violation of one of these three elements, it lacks juridic effect.

The canon notes an exception, however. If an administrative act is issued in violation of one of the elements mentioned above, it lacks effect unless the competent authority has expressly added a derogating clause, that is, a clause explicitly exempting the act from these legal restrictions. Care must be taken in applying this exception. The executive authority who issues an act is not necessarily an authority competent to affix a derogating clause. Who has such competence? The legislator who promulgated the particular law, approved the custom, or regulates the exercise of rights may add such a derogating clause when exercising executive authority. Although the present canons specifically treat the exercise of executive authority in the Church, it must be remembered that there is no division of powers in the Church analogous to that found in contemporary constitutional governments. The Roman Pontiff for the universal Church and the bishops for their particular churches exercise legislative, executive, and judicial functions. Consequently, these authorities, when acting administratively, may derogate from the norms they enacted in their capacity as legislators.

Those who possess legislative authority may also entrust to subsidiary administrators the power to derogate or dispense from laws or approved customs. The universal law in canons 87 and 88 offers an example of such in reference to dispensations. Such derogating authority, however, must be explicitly entrusted in some way. The exercise of executive authority of itself does not include authority to derogate from laws.

Finally, it must be noted that even if a particular administrator does have the authority to derogate in the ways described in this canon, an administrative act issued in violation of a law, an approved custom, or an acquired right still lacks effect unless that administrator specifically adds the derogating clause to the act itself. The administrator must clearly indicate that the action is an exception to the norm.

Conditions Affecting Validity

Canon 39 — Conditions in an administrative act are considered added for validity only when they are expressed by the particles if (si), unless (nisi), or provided that (dummodo).

A community functions more securely and productively if there is stability in its juridic activity. Actions should generally effect what they intend. Consequently, the law generally favors efficacy over inefficacy, validity over invalidity. Canon 39 concretizes this value. An administrative act may include conditions within the text. Nonetheless, these conditions do not affect the validity of the act unless they are expressed in a specific way.

At this point the text becomes somewhat problematic. The official text of the canon seems to give a taxative list. Unlike the norm of canon 10 which prescribes that laws are invalidating or disqualifying only when expressly stated to be such, canon 39 lists specific particles which are to be used in order to indicate a requirement for validity. Conditions in an administrative act affect validity only when they are expressed through the particles si, nisi, or dummodo. This presents no problem at all if the administrator happens to issue the particular act in Latin. If one of the three particles is used to express a condition, that condition affects the validity of the act. If no particle appears, then there is no condition affecting validity.

Yet what of administrative acts in the vernacular? The only official text of the law is Latin. The three particles in the canon can be expressed in various ways in various languages. Is it sufficient to say in English that "if," "unless," and "provided that" always refer to validity? After all, the English text is not official. If a clause begins "provided that," does that mean that the clause affects the validity of the act whereas a clause that begins "in the event that" does not?

It is worth noting that the Eastern code addresses this issue. Canon 1516 of the Eastern code states, "Conditions attached to administrative acts are considered to affect its [sic] validity only when they are expressed by the particles, si, nisi, dummodo, or by similar words in the vernacular."

Application of the law in a language other than Latin presents certain problems when the law determines a specific vocabulary without providing for the use of the vernacular, as occurs here. The Eastern code clearly offers a more effective formulation. The law favors validity. An administrator, consequently, would do well to be very explicit when expressing conditions that affect validity in order to avoid the real possibility of doubt.

Invalid Anticipation of an Administrative Act

Canon 40 — The executor of any administrative act invalidly carries out his or her function before receiving the relevant letter and verifying its authenticity and integrity, unless previous notice of the letter had been communicated to the executor by authority of the one who issued the act.

The preceding canons concern the administrative act itself. Canon 40 begins a series of provisions for the execution of an administrative act. The law now attends to the concrete application of the act, the action through which the exercise of executive authority is put into effect.

As mentioned earlier, an administrator can entrust the application, or execution, of an administrative act to another in two ways. The administrator may ask the executor of the act simply to notify the interested party. In this situation, the executor is merely an intermediary for the purposes of communication. The executor, however, may be entrusted with greater responsibility—the responsibility to issue a decree of execution. In the first method of execution, the administrative act is handed over or made known to the interested party/parties. In the second, an additional administrative act is issued—the act of execution, an act which is also to be issued in writing according to the norm of canon 37.

Before a person fulfills the responsibility of execution, however, he or she must have received and verified the authorization to do so. The executor is not to presume this beforehand. The executor must have received the documentation entrusting execution of the original act and ascertained that it is properly prepared, signed, sealed, etc. and that there are no suspicious or doubtful emendations added to the text. If the executor fails to do this, the execution is invalid.

There is an exception to this requirement for validity. If the administrator who issues the act informs the proposed executor of the commission in a more informal way and the executor acts upon that information, the execution of the act is valid. During the period of revision prior to the promulgation of the code, there was a proposal to eliminate this exception in the new law. The proposal was not accepted, however, on the grounds that the exception reflected a common and often useful practice.[11]

Thus, a member of an institute of consecrated life, because of his future apostolic work or the territory in which he resides, might request a dispensation from canon 1015, §2 so that he can be ordained by a bishop of a different ritual church. As the date of the ordination nears, however, no rescript has been received. His superior telephones the dicastery and determines that the dispensation was in fact granted but has been delayed in the mail. Based upon this information, the ceremony takes place even though the official rescript has not been received. The flexibility provided by this exception to the rule is evident and protects the common good and individual welfare from an overly formal approach to governance.

Limitations on the Activity of an Executor

Canon 41 — The executor of an administrative act to whom is entrusted merely the task of execution cannot refuse the execution of this act unless it clearly appears that the act itself is null or cannot be upheld for another grave cause, or the conditions attached to the administrative act itself have not been fulfilled. Nevertheless, if the execution of the administrative act seems inopportune due to the circumstances of person or place, the executor is to suspend the execution. In such cases the executor is to inform immediately the authority who issued the act.

This canon strives to strike a balance between two important values: consistency in government and subsidiarity. In entrusting the execution of an administrative act to another, an administrator must have confidence that the act will be executed as issued, that it will not be changed or modified by the executor. If one cannot rely on a consistent application of decisions, responsible policy and governance become difficult, if not impossible. The law provides for consistency in action. If an administrator entrusts the simple execution of an act to another, the person must execute the act.

On the other hand, an administrator, particularly an administrator at a distance from the actual situation, may be unaware of the local situation or even mistaken in understanding the circumstances of the case. The law attempts to make provision for such situations. The current canon carefully qualifies the requirement of execution when certain circumstances arise.

The general principle requiring execution remains, though with some qualification. A person who receives a mandate of simple execution cannot refuse to execute the act except in three specific situations. An executor is not to execute an administrative act (a) if it is clear that the act is null, in other words, that the administrative act lacks some requirement for its validity; (b) if it cannot be upheld for some serious reason other than nullity, for example, if the administrative act is contrary to an approved custom yet contains no derogating clause; or (c) if the conditions attached to the administrative act have not been fulfilled. It would certainly appear that (c) would be a specific responsibility of any executor—the person on the scene, so to speak. In any event, the executor must immediately inform the issuing authority of what has occurred, since the act is ultimately not the responsibility of the executor but of the issuing administrator.

It could also happen that the executor perceives that if the administrator had understood the local situation, the administrator would not have issued the act. This is, of course, a prudential judgment, a conclusion about the mind of the administrator. The judgment may be correct or not. The law, however, gives weight to the considered judgment of the person on the scene. If the executor judges that the execution of the administrative act is untimely due to some particular circumstance, the executor may delay the execution until he or she clarifies the situation with the issuing authority. Thus, a balance is struck between the authority of the issuer and the prudent judgment of the local person.

Invalid Execution of an Administrative Act

Canon 42 — The executor of an administrative act must proceed according to the norm of the mandate. If, however, the executor did not fulfill the essential conditions attached to the relevant letter and did not observe the substantial form of proceeding, the execution is invalid.

When an administrator entrusts the execution of an administrative act to another person, the administrator may include instructions as to how the execution is to take place. The executor must proceed accordingly. Failure to do so renders the execution either illicit or invalid. Any failure to follow the instructions set forth for the execution of the act would result in an illicit execution. If the document entrusting execution of the act attaches essential conditions for the execution—conditions which must be expressed according to the norm of canon 39 since the document is itself an administrative act—then failure to fulfill those conditions would render the execution invalid. Similarly, if the executor does not substantially observe required procedural formalities, the execution would also be invalid. In other words, the executor must follow at least the general substance of any guidelines indicating how he or she is to carry out the mandated execution.

Although this canon refers to "essential" conditions, it would be more precise and clearer if it had simply repeated the terminology of canon 39, that is, "conditions for validity." Canon 1523 of the Eastern code does so with the result that it is a more precisely formulated norm.

Substitution of an Executor

Canon 43 — The executor of an administrative act can, according to his or her prudent judgment, substitute another as executor unless substitution has been forbidden, the executor has been chosen for personal qualifications, or a substitute has been predetermined. In these cases, however, the executor may entrust the preparatory acts to another.

In general, when a person has been entrusted with the execution of an administrative act, that person can designate a substitute to handle the matter. The freedom to entrust this responsibility to another, however, can be limited by the issuer of the administrative act. The original executive authority may prohibit the use of a substitute or personally designate a particular substitute. The authority may also have chosen the particular executor for some specific reason—because of the person's office (the pastor, the school principal, etc.) or some specific qualification. When such specification is clearly expressed, designating a substitute is also precluded.

Even when substitution is not permitted, the executor is still able to entrust the preparatory acts to another. The person cannot designate someone else to do the actual execution, but can ask another to verify the documents, ensure that the conditions required by the act are fulfilled, take care of any preliminary details, etc. Only the actual execution must be done personally.

Succession in Office of the Executor

Canon 44 — The executor's successor in office can also execute an administrative act unless the executor was chosen for personal qualifications.

The law assumes that when an official is designated to perform an executive function, it is the person as officeholder, not the person as private individual, who is chosen to carry out the responsibility. Thus, when there is a change of office, responsibility follows the office, not the person.[12] The person's successor assumes the responsibility. If the execution of a rescript has been entrusted to the pastor of a parish and the pastor is transferred before executing the rescript, then the new pastor assumes the responsibility of execution.

The law admits an exception to that rule when the person as an individual rather than as an official has been designated to execute an administrative act. In such a case, the responsibility remains with the person apart from the office. Because this is the exception rather than the rule, however, the designating authority must clearly express such a qualification when entrusting an act to an executor.

[12] RI 46: Is qui in ius succedit alterius, eo iure, quo ille, uti debebit. (The one who takes over the responsibilities of another must fulfill the responsibilities which the former had.)

Remedy for Error in the Execution

Canon 45 — If the executor has erred in any way in the execution of an administrative act, the executor is permitted to execute the same act again.

An executor is responsible for implementing the administrative act. The administrative act has priority. It is the original administrative act which intends to apply the law to a concrete need. The important thing, consequently, is to ensure that the act is properly implemented. If the act of implementation is somehow defective, the law is concerned that the defect not overly hinder effective governance. Mistakes in execution can be corrected. If a certain method or specific formalities are required in the execution of an act and the person responsible for the execution makes some mistake, the act of execution can be repeated. In fact, it is the responsibility of the executor to repeat the act of execution if a mistake has been made. After all, it is the original act of governance that is important. The execution of that original act is only a secondary function.

Continuity of Executive Powers

Canon 46 — An administrative act does not cease when the authority of the one who established it expires unless the law expressly provides otherwise.

An administrative act is a public, not a private, act. As an act of executive authority, it is an action done in fulfillment of some office in the Church. When Titius, the bishop of Pamphylia, appoints a pastor, it is the bishop of Pamphylia who makes the appointment, not Titius the private person. When Titius retires and Matthew takes possession of the see, the slate is not wiped clean. The acts of governance of the bishop remain as part of the continuation of the episcopal office.

The importance of this norm is clear. No society could function adequately if every change of office resulted in institutional collapse—the abolition of all previous decisions and provisions. Institutional continuity is an essential component of a stable social group, a safeguard against chaos and uncertainty.

The continued effectiveness of acts of executive authority is provided in the law, but not absolutely. In specific cases, the law may determine that an act is to cease when the authority who issued it leaves office. Because that is the exception, however, and not the rule, the law must make express provision in such cases.

Revocation of an Administrative Act

Canon 47 — The revocation of an administrative act by another administrative act of a competent authority takes effect only from the moment at which the revocation is legitimately made known to the person for whom it has been given.

For the most part, administrative acts take effect when the person affected by the act receives official notification. The same holds true when one administrative act revokes a previous act. When the executive authority issues the new act, the prior act continues in effect until the moment of notification.

CHAPTER II
SINGULAR DECREES AND PRECEPTS
[cc. 48–58]

Singular decrees and precepts are types of administrative acts. The current law distinguishes three forms of administrative activity: the singular decree, the singular precept, and the rescript. The content of the specific administrative act determines its form: singular decrees communicate decisions or provisions; singular precepts impose injunctions; rescripts grant dispensations, privileges, or other types of favors. This chapter sets forth the norms for the first two categories: singular decrees and singular precepts.

The Singular Decree: Concept/Species

Canon 48 — A singular decree is an administrative act issued by a competent executive authority in which a decision is given or a provision is made for a particular case according to the norms of law. Of their nature, these decisions or provisions do not presuppose a petition made by someone.

Canon 48 lists five elements as constitutive of a singular decree:

(1) A singular decree is an administrative act, that is, an action of executive authority which intends some juridic effect.

(2) It must be issued by a competent authority; the official must have a legal basis for action.

(3) It is to be issued according to the norm of law; the exercise of executive authority is discretionary but still confined within legal boundaries.

(4) It communicates a decision or makes some provision; in other words, through the singular administrative decree, the competent executive authority settles some controverted matter or provides for some need of the Church.

(5) It does not presuppose a petition or request for action on the part of another. A singular decree can be in response to some request or it can be the product of the free initiative of the executive authority.

Of these five elements, the fourth concerns the actual content of the act. It is that content which distinguishes the singular decree from other types of administrative acts. The singular decree communicates a decision or makes a provision. In the fulfillment of office, an executive authority may be called upon to settle some dispute or controversy. When confronted with the prosecution of a criminal act, for example, an ordinary may decide to settle the case through an administrative, rather than a judicial, process.[13] The ordinary's decision would consequently be issued in the form of a singular decree.

Executive authorities also issue singular decrees in order to make some provision for the good of the Church. Although the term provision refers elsewhere to the process of filling an ecclesiastical office[14] (and, in fact, the decree of appointment to office is one of the most common types of provision), its use here is broader. It has to do with an administrator's responsibility to provide for the specific needs of the community. A particular community may be benefited by the establishment of a new association of the faithful. In response to that perceived benefit, the diocesan bishop may establish the new association by means of a singular decree. A major superior of a clerical religious institute of pontifical right erects a new religious house by means of a singular decree. Through such decrees, executive officials place concrete actions for the common good.

As defined here, a singular decree is a concrete application of the law to a particular situation—whether that be some decision about a disputed issue or a specific response to a perceived need. The singular decree manifests a clearer characteristic of positive action than does the singular precept described in the following canon.

The Singular Precept: Concept

Canon 49 — A singular precept is a decree which directly and legitimately enjoins a specific person or persons to do or omit something, especially in order to urge the observance of law.

Canon 49 offers an example of either the limitations of vocabulary or the difficulties in editing text. The code proposes to distinguish between two concepts: that of a singular decree and that of a singular precept. Canon 48 defines the singular decree. In offering its definition of the singular precept, however, this canon refers to it as a decree. If canon 49 had followed the logic of the preceding canon, it would have begun as follows: "A singular precept is an administrative act." After all, according to the overall organization of this section of the code, singular decrees and singular precepts are types of administrative acts; the singular precept is not a type of singular decree.

[14] See cc. 146 and following.

A better formulation in this regard is found in canon 1510, §2, 1° and 2° of the Eastern code. That paragraph begins by stating, "Administrative acts are above all..." and then continues in numbers one and two to distinguish decrees from precepts. The paragraph clearly indicates that both are types of administrative acts and avoids the repetitive and misleading use of the term "decree."

What distinguishes the precept from the decree is the precept's negative character. Although both are actions of an executive authority, a decree has a more positive aspect to it. The decree settles an argument, makes a decision, provides for a concrete need of the community.

The precept, on the other hand, imposes an injunction. Through a precept an administrator orders someone to do something or to refrain from doing something, generally to observe the law or to refrain from behavior in violation of the law. In a real sense, an injunction provides for a need of the community, but it does so through a command or an obligation imposed upon a particular person or group.

An executive authority enjoins such an obligation "directly and legitimately." The precept is imposed directly, not through the mediation of another. It is imposed legitimately, that is, according to the norm of law. The precept must concern something over which the administrator has authority and must be imposed upon a person or persons who fall within the jurisdiction of that same administrator. A diocesan bishop may enjoin one of his own clergy against running for office in a local election, forcefully remind a lax diocesan official to carry out his or her duties, or prohibit an unauthorized liturgical innovation.

Information and Consultation before Decree

Canon 50 — Before issuing a singular decree, an authority is to seek out the necessary information and proofs and, insofar as possible, to hear those whose rights can be injured.

Although this particular chapter concerns singular decrees and precepts, the term "precept" occurs only twice—in the preceding canon and in canon 58, the last canon of the chapter. The intervening canons refer only to singular decrees. Nevertheless, some of the provisions would seem to apply equally to precepts, particularly those which determine such matters as legal effects, notification, and cessation.

After defining singular decrees and precepts, the chapter moves on to their issuance, notification, and interpretation. At first glance, canon 50 may appear so obvious as to make one wonder why it would be included in the law. Yet despite its commonsense reasonableness, it makes an important statement about the use of authority. Acts of governance are not acts of whimsy or caprice but actions intended to realize the common good and the salvation of souls. Thus, the legitimate use of authority requires information and consultation. A penalty cannot be imposed through an administrative process without a prior gathering of evidence.[15] Otherwise it would be an act of injustice rather than of good governance.

The present canon is thus important in this section. An administrative act is to be the result of investigation and considered judgment. Most particularly, those who will be affected by the act are to be informed and consulted insofar as this is possible. Canon 1517, §1 of the Eastern code even more effectively expresses this principle of consultation by stating that those who will be "directly touched" by the decree should be consulted. Some administrative procedures in the Latin code—such as those for the transfer or removal of pastors[16]—more exactly specify the need for investigation and consultation. Nonetheless, the gathering of information is prescribed as a fundamental requirement of administrative action, though not a requirement for the validity of the act.

[16] See cc. 1740 and following.

Written Form of a Decisory Decree

Canon 51 — A decree is to be issued in writing, with the reasons at least summarily expressed if it is a decision.

According to canon 37, singular administrative acts which concern the external forum must be issued in writing. Canon 51 repeats this requirement with a significant addition. A decisory decree must not only be issued in writing but must also give, at least in summary form, the reasons for the decision. It is not enough simply to communicate one's conclusion; the administrator must also give the reasons that led to that conclusion.

As the canon notes, this requirement applies only to decrees which communicate a decision. When an administrative act settles some controversy or decides some disputed issue, the administrator must provide an explanation. If a diocesan bishop chooses to resolve a criminal accusation through an administrative process, his final decree must express the reasons underlying his decision, the logic of the evidence that has led to that decision.

On the other hand, when a diocesan bishop makes provision for an office, the requirements of this canon do not apply. In appointing a pastor, the diocesan bishop does not have to indicate in his decree of appointment why he decided on this particular priest. It is simply presumed that he acts reasonably in making provision for the good of the Church.

The issuance of decisory decrees is more strictly structured because such decrees more frequently affect a person's juridic situation and rights. Decisions resolve disputes. Administrative acts that decide an issue are thus similar to judicial sentences. Like judicial sentences, they are subject to appeal to a higher authority. As a protection to all parties, the law requires that the logic for the decision be publicly evident.

This requirement has further application in the event of recourse against the decree. Although a person aggrieved by an administrative act can make recourse to the administrator's hierarchical superior for any just reason,[17] recourse to an administrative court can be made only if it is alleged that the act is illegitimate, that is, has violated the law in some way. The norms for the Second Section of the Signatura Apostolica, the administrative court of the Apostolic See, state that recourse to the tribunal against an act of administrative power is possible only when the petitioner contends that the act "violated some law either in the decision-making process or in the procedure used."[18] Although a detailed discussion of the illegitimacy of acts and the competence of the Second Section is beyond the scope of this work, it is sufficient to note that inclusion of the reasons for a decision provides a concrete foundation for determining the legitimacy or illegitimacy of the executive authority's decision-making process.

The canon gives no exceptions or qualifications to its requirement. Although canon 55 deals with situations which exempt the administrator from handing over a written text, no similar provision permits the exclusion of reasons in decisory decrees. This is in contrast to the corresponding provisions of canon 1519, §2 in the Eastern code. This canon also requires a summary of the reasons but adds a qualification: "If there is danger of public or private harm, so that the reasons should not appear in it, they are to be contained in a secret book and revealed, if asked for, to the one who is studying the possibility of interposing recourse against the decree."

This is a limitation to access not found in the Latin code. When an administrator makes use of this exception, only a person contemplating recourse has access—and only if the person requests access, though how the person would know of the secret record is not evident. Since the Eastern code also provides for oral notification rather than handing over of the written text in exceptional circumstances, it is not clear what purpose this limitation on a person's right to know actually serves. In this regard, the provision of the Latin Code offers a more concrete protection of rights.

[18] See PB, art. 123, §1.

Limited Application of a Singular Decree

Canon 52 — A singular decree has force only in respect to the matters which it decides and for the persons for whom it was given. It obliges these persons everywhere, however, unless it is otherwise evident.

Just as canons 11–13 clarify the scope and application of ecclesiastical laws, so does this canon explain the scope and application of singular decrees and precepts. As noted above, the activity of executive authorities is limited to those actions that fall within the scope of their competence and those persons who are subject to their authority. Canon 52 further specifies the limits of an administrative act.

A singular decree or precept applies only to the matter contained in the decree. It cannot be extended to additional cases or similar situations. If a singular decree decides some issue, that decree does not become a binding precedent for further administrative activity such as a court decision would in the common law tradition. The singular decree applies only to the specific situation concerned.

Likewise, the singular administrative decree applies only to those persons for whom the act was issued. Again, the act cannot be extended to other persons in similar situations. The administrative act is concrete and specific. The law does not acknowledge the legitimacy of application by analogy. If similar situations arise, new acts are required to respond to those situations.

Once an act is legitimately issued and executed, however, it effectively binds the person or persons to whom it was issued until such time as it is withdrawn or otherwise legally abrogated. It binds the person, not the place where the person happens to be, and continues to bind the person or persons even if they move outside the territory of the particular administrator. If a diocesan bishop imposed a censure using an administrative process, the censure continues until revoked even if the person moves to a new diocese. It remains a legitimate and effective act of governance.

Conflicting Decrees

Canon 53 — If decrees are contrary to one another, a particular decree prevails over a general in those matters which are specifically expressed. If they are equally particular or equally general, the decree later in time modifies the earlier to the extent that the later one is contrary to it.

Canon 20 provides rules for determining the applicable norm when a situation of conflict of laws arises. This canon similarly provides for situations of conflict between singular decrees or precepts. The canon considers two possible situations in which singular decrees may deal with the same situation or circumstances: one in which there is a conflict between a general decree and a specific decree; the other in which there is a conflict between two general decrees or two specific decrees. There is an assumption in the canon that the conflicting decrees are products of the same administrative authority, since conflict of authority is a separate issue—the decree of a higher authority supersedes that of a lower authority.

The first case considers the situation in which an executive authority issues a general executory decree, the type of decree which might give guidelines or specifications for some activity. The same authority also issues a singular administrative decree regarding the same activity. This decree provides for the particular situation of a specific parish or group—a parish or group that falls under the administrator's authority and, consequently, under the authority of the general executory decree. However, it conflicts with the general executory decree. In such a circumstance, the provision for the specific situation takes precedence over the more general guidelines. In this, the canon follows the traditional principle given in rule 34 of the Regulae Iuris: Generi per speciem derogatur, or "The specific derogates from the general."

The second case concerns a situation in which an executive authority issues two conflicting general decrees or singular decrees without providing for the resolution of the conflict within the texts of the decrees themselves. When such a situation arises, the more recent decree takes precedence. The law presumes that the administrator's intention in providing for the public good is better reflected in the action that is more immediate in time.

Operative Force of a Singular Decree

Canon 54 — §1. A singular decree whose application is entrusted to an executor takes effect from the moment of execution; otherwise, from the moment it is made known to the person by the authority of the one who issued it.

§2. To be enforced, a singular decree must be made known by a legitimate document according to the norm of law.

This norm of law answers the question: When does an administrative act take effect? Acts of governance affect persons and communities. Although their originating source may be the authority of the particular office-holder, they can be concretely effective only if communicated, made public to those subject to the governing authority. Interior intention is not sufficient for an act of governance. The intention must be expressed and communicated in some public way.

The code determines that singular administrative acts become effective at the time of notification, that is, at the time they are made known to the person or persons affected by the act. If the administrative act is one which is to be executed by someone other than the administrator who issued the act, then the act takes effect when the executor fulfills his or her responsibility to communicate the decree. When it is a case of simple communication of the act, then the act takes effect when the person or persons affected are notified. The basic rule in either case is that administrative acts take effect when the affected parties are informed of them.

Although the basic rule is simple and fairly straightforward, there still remains the question of determining what is meant by notification. Is it enough that the person or persons are told of the administrative act by a third party—for example, by someone in the administrator's office? Is something more official required? The second paragraph responds to this by prescribing that effective notification must be made through a legitimate document according to the norm of law; otherwise, the decree cannot be enforced. In the majority of cases, this means through an official, written document as indicated in canons 37 and 51.

Substitute Form of Communication of a Decree

Canon 55 — Without prejudice to the prescripts of cann. 37 and 51, when a very grave reason prevents the handing over of the written text of a decree, the decree is considered to have been made known if it is read to the person to whom it is destined in the presence of a notary or two witnesses. After a written record of what has occurred has been prepared, all those present must sign it.

A situation may arise when it would be inopportune or inadvisable to hand over a written document. The law permits an exception to the norm only for a very grave reason. A very grave reason would generally be something detrimental to the common good or the good of the persons involved, such as the possibility of scandal or defamation of character. Simple convenience, however, would not appear to be sufficient to justify an exception.

Even if the administrator judges that there is a sufficiently grave reason not to hand over a written document, notification must still occur through some publicly verifiable act. The text of the act is to be read to the person in the presence of either a notary or two witnesses. A testimony of this action—the oral notification before witnesses—is then to be prepared and signed by all the parties and witnesses. This document of attestation then becomes the legal proof of legitimate notification.

Presumptive Communication of a Decree

Canon 56 — A decree is considered to have been made known if the one for whom it is destined has been properly summoned to receive or hear the decree but, without a just cause, did not appear or refused to sign.

The previous canon provides for exceptional circumstances of notification. This canon continues the consideration of such unusual cases. There may well be sufficient reason not to hand over the written document. The administrator may attempt to secure notification according to the norm of the previous canon. Yet the person or persons may simply not cooperate, either by not showing up for the oral notification or by refusing to sign the attestation of notification. If there is a good reason for failure to appear or refusal to sign, then the administrator must take some action to rectify the situation. A new appointment can be scheduled, etc.

On the other hand, the person or persons affected by the administrative act may simply be uncooperative for no good reason, or at least for no apparent good reason. Lack of cooperation cannot be used to obstruct the ongoing governance of a community. In such circumstances, therefore, lack of cooperation does not prevent the legal effectiveness of the administrative act. The law accepts the act as legally notified, even if actual notification has not occurred.

Presumptive Negative Response of Authority

Canon 57 — §1. Whenever the law orders a decree to be issued or an interested party legitimately proposes a petition or recourse to obtain a decree, the competent authority is to provide for the matter within three months from the receipt of the petition or recourse unless the law prescribes some other time period.

§2. When this time period has passed, if the decree has not yet been given, the response is presumed to be negative with respect to the presentation of further recourse.

§3. A presumed negative response does not exempt the competent authority from the obligation of issuing the decree and even of repairing the damage possibly incurred, according to the norm of can. 128.

The previous canon dealt with the situation of an uncooperative subject. This canon considers the situation of the uncooperative or negligent administrator, the situation when no response is forthcoming although some response is indicated. In that event, the law itself provides the response.

An executive authority may be obliged to issue a singular administrative decree either because the law requires it or because a person legitimately requests some action. If an election requires confirmation by a competent executive authority, the competent authority must respond by virtue of canon 179, §§1 and 2. Similarly, if a group of electors legitimately submits a postulation to a competent executive authority by virtue of canon 180, §1, the competent authority has an obligation to respond to the petition. When legal responsibility exists, the administrator must give a response within three months determined according to the norm of canon 202, §2. The only exception to this rule is if a particular norm determines a different time limit.[19]

If an administrator fails to respond despite the obligation to do so, the law itself provides for the administrator's negligence. Once the time limit has passed, a negative response is legally presumed. The canon establishes a general rule: Silence means denial. Specific norms, however, can overturn this presumption. Canon 268, §1, for example, provides that in cases of excardination and incardination silence from the competent authorities is to be taken as approval rather than denial. The present canon provides a general rule; the rule, though, can be qualified or even contradicted in specific norms.

The presumption of negative response, however, is with respect to subsequent recourse. The presumed negative response does not resolve the concrete situation requiring some action but offers the possibility of requesting action from the administrative superior. The administrative superior can then either provide for the situation or enjoin the original administrator to take action.

Nor does a response supplied by the law exempt an administrator from the responsibilities and consequences of negligence. The legal obligation to issue a decree remains. Likewise, the administrator is responsible for damages caused by the failure to act.

Cessation of a Singular Decree or Precept

Canon 58 — §1. A singular decree ceases to have force through legitimate revocation by competent authority as well as through cessation of the law for whose execution it was given.

§2. A singular precept not imposed by a legitimate document ceases when the authority of the one who issued it expires.

A singular decree ceases to have effect if competent authority revokes it or the law it applies ceases to have force. In making this provision, the first paragraph follows the norms given for general decrees and instructions in canons 33, §2 and 34, §3. Regarding singular precepts, the second paragraph states that a singular precept that is not imposed by a legitimate document ceases when the official who imposed it leaves office. Otherwise, it remains in effect. A precept given orally, therefore, would have effect only while the particular administrator remained in office.

RESCRIPTS

After having presented the norms concerning the personal precept (ius), the code turns next to the favor (gratia). A precept is appropriately conveyed in an decree, but a rescript acknowledges a favor granted in response to a request. For perfectly rhetorical reasons, it is important to keep this distinction in mind. Since the precept is principally concerned with observing the law (divine, positive, natural, moral, canon, liturgical), the Church can always oblige. But a favor is just that: a gift, a benefit, a courtesy. By definition, then, we have no claim on favors. So it is well to remember this when requesting an indult of exclaustration or a dispensation from the obligation of celibacy. Also, by reason of the materials, the hierarchical principle prevails in these chapters.

Structurally speaking, chapter 3, which presents the common norms on rescripts (cc. 59–75), follows earlier sections in Book I. Under an organic metaphor, it presents the five essential elements that constitute a rescript: competence, matter, recipient, execution, and cessation. Like the titles on ecclesiastical laws and custom, these three chapters have a beginning, a middle, and an end. They also specify those elements that make singular administrative acts a species of constitutive law.

Canonical Concept of Rescript

Canon 59 — §1. A rescript is an administrative act issued in writing by competent executive authority; of its very nature, a rescript grants a privilege, dispensation, or other favor at someone's request.

§2. The prescripts established for rescripts are valid also for the oral granting of a permission or favors unless it is otherwise evident.

Because the competent authority can always urge following the law, the precept is usually imposed. A favor, on the other hand, requires a petition (suapte natura).[1] Addressed to one with ordinary executive power (cc. 136–138), thereby ensuring competence, the petition asks for a favor (CCEO 1527, §1). While the canon mentions both privilege and dispensation, which chapters 4 and 5 will explain, it also mentions "or other favor." This may include petitioning for an honorary degree from an ecclesiastical faculty, securing admission in a pontifical society, or requesting a papal blessing to commemorate a particular anniversary or occasion. Or the petition may ask for information, even to resolving a doubt of law. The rescript (from the Latin rescribere) acknowledges the petition and grants the request.

The body of the petition, usually a formal letter, should contain the following points: the precise request desired, the worthiness of the recipient, the concrete reasons applicable for this particular case, any supporting testimonials, and an appropriate conclusion. As an administrative act (c. 35), it imports a necessary formality, especially when it goes from one office to another. The rescript itself, as a juridic act (c. 124), will embody all the requisite formalities and solemnities.

The second paragraph, a new provision, pertains largely to permissions which a religious superior or a pastor might grant orally (CCEO 1527, §2). While the code surely favors the writing culture, it provides realistically enough for oral acts (e.g., cc. 55, 74). In general, canonists agree that an oral act suffices for validity but not for proof (cc. 74, 131, §3). In addition to competence, the following six canons also condition validity.

[1] F. J. Urrutia points to the inadequacy of the translation in modern language editions of the code. See Les normes générales (Paris: Tardy, 1994) 135, n. 1.

Canon 60 — Any rescript can be requested by all those who are not expressly prohibited from doing so.

According to the canon, anyone, whether baptized or non-baptized, can effectively (efficaciter) request and obtain a rescript.[2] In principle, then, the Church recognizes the capacity and the legitimacy of everyone to petition either the local ordinary or the Apostolic See (e.g., c. 1142). While continental canonists refer to this stance as that of "the passive subject," the nature of the activity itself belies the epithet. Indeed, the law itself grants to catechumens (c. 206) certain favors like receiving blessings (c. 1170) and even Christian burial (c. 1183, §1).[3] The law also indicates those who are expressly excluded from benefiting from favors (cc. 1331, §2, 3°; 1332; 1333, §4). In these cases, however, any penalty has to be declared or proved.

Canon 61 — Unless it is otherwise evident, a rescript can be requested for another even without the person's assent and has force before the person's acceptance, without prejudice to contrary clauses.

The Church has a long history of acknowledging distinguished services and awards various dignities and honors by way of recognition (RI 16, 77). Awards ceremonies occur at the local, national, and international levels. These awards, however, presuppose the appropriate requests, of which the recipients are presumably unaware (CCEO 1528). So the efficacy of the acknowledgement does not depend on the intention of the recipient but rather on that of the competent authority. In other words, the Church regularly acts on behalf of others, with or without their knowledge (e.g., c. 1164). The validity of the rescript, as a juridic act, derives from the competence of the issuing authority.[4] According to canon 71, the recipient is free to use the favor or not. In the case of a dispensation from the vows of religion, the law provides otherwise (c. 692). A contrary clause, however, relative to the dispensation from celibacy limits that freedom. So the canons allow for both validity and for acceptance.

Canon 62 — A rescript in which no executor is given has effect at the moment the letter is given; other rescripts, at the moment of execution.

The notification of a rescript occurs either directly or indirectly. When the issuing authority mails the favor directly to the petitioner, he acts in forma gratiosa. The rescript takes effect according to the date found on the document (CCEO 1511). This agrees with the general principle found in Regulae Iuris 15, that odious things be restricted and favorable ones extended. If the rescript requires an executor, either necessary or voluntary, this indirect form of notification takes place in forma commissoria. This means that he must comply with the norms found in canons 40–45. So the diocesan bishop, as a necessary executor, notifies the petitioner that his rescript of laicization has arrived. In this case the rescript takes effect from the time of notification.

Conditions for Validity

Canon 63 — §1. Subreption, or concealment of the truth, prevents the validity of a rescript if in the request those things were not expressed which according to law, style, and canonical practice must be expressed for validity, unless it is a rescript of favor which is given motu proprio.

§2. Obreption, or a statement of falsehood, also prevents the validity of a rescript if not even one proposed motivating reason is true.

[2] See Comm 17 (1985) 54.

[3] According to the RCIA, no. 47, catechumens also have their proper marriage rite.

[4] Does the recipient have to accept the favor? Traditionally, commentators reply in the negative. See F. M. Cappello, Summa Iuris Canonici, 4th ed. (Rome: Apud Aedes Universitatis Gregorianae, 1945) 114–15, no. 144.

§3. The motivating reason in rescripts for which there is no executor must be true at the time when the rescript is given; in others, at the time of execution.

Since the rescript concerns a favor, the reasons for granting it must be factually true. In order to uphold this truth-value, the canon forbids both subreption and obreption. Either withholding the truth or lying about the truth constitutes fraud (c. 125, §2) which the canons explicitly prohibit (cc. 67, §2, 69). We are liable to encounter subreption today with somebody applying for admission to a seminary or a religious community.[5] Moreover, the first paragraph adds for validity other criteria: "according to law, style, and canonical practice" (CCEO 1529, §1), necessary for the validity of a juridic act (c. 124). By way of exception, a rescript granted motu proprio (i.e., spontaneously) derogates from these essential conditions in favor of largesse: "Any favor granted by the prince should remain" (RI 16).

The second paragraph indicates the necessary relationship between the motivating reason as cause and the valid rescript as effect.

The third paragraph asserts the existence of the motivating reasons by acknowledging the two modes of notification mentioned in canon 62 (CCEO 1529, §1). Although both modes uphold the truth-value intrinsic to any concession, it prevails at different moments. Any executor, either voluntary or necessary, should make sure that the motives are in fact well founded.

Canon 64 — Without prejudice to the authority of the Penitentiary for the internal forum, a favor denied by any dicastery of the Roman Curia cannot be granted validly by any other dicastery of the same Curia or by another competent authority below the Roman Pontiff without the assent of the dicastery before which the matter was initiated.

This canon concerns the use of executive authority at the level of Church universal. Associated with the Apostolic Penitentiary and the Roman Curia, it represents a principle of good order. Since all the dicasteries are juridically equal (PB, art. 2, §2), the petitioner cannot legitimately play one off against another. That is, "What is forbidden directly may not be done indirectly" (RI 84). Given multiple competencies of the various congregations, one congregation cannot validly grant what another congregation has denied. Still, another dicastery may review the petition. In that case, validity requires the assent (not the consent) of the prior dicastery; otherwise we are dealing with subreption. Canonical authors say that this assent is tantamount to concession. If circumstances so warrant, the petitioner may have recourse to the Apostolic Penitentiary (PB, arts. 117–120) in case of a request denied in the external forum. Needless to say, the Holy Father grants favors freely.

Canon 65 — §1. Without prejudice to the prescripts of §§2 and 3, no one is to petition from another ordinary a favor denied by one's own ordinary unless mention of the denial has been made. When this mention has been made, however, the ordinary is not to grant the favor unless he has obtained the reasons for the denial from the prior ordinary.

§2. A favor denied by a vicar general or by an episcopal vicar cannot be granted validly by another vicar of the same bishop even if the reasons for the denial have been obtained from the vicar who denied it.

§3. A favor denied by a vicar general or by an episcopal vicar and afterwards obtained from the diocesan bishop without any mention made of this denial is invalid. A favor denied by a diocesan bishop, however, even if mention is made of the denial, cannot be obtained validly from his vicar general or episcopal vicar without the consent of the bishop.

This canon essentially applies the same principles at the local level, that of the particular church (CCEO 1530). Since one may have several ordinaries, whether proper or cumulative but competent, it is possible to ask each of them at the same time. This strategy, while not forbidden by the law, seems to violate the spirit of the law (RI 88). In short, the canon presents three situations.

The first paragraph, looking to the coherence of the legal system, ensures that a petitioner does not play one office against another, e.g., the ordinary of domicile and the ordinary of quasi-domicile. If the former has denied the request, the latter must be informed of the reasons before granting it. Otherwise the favor will be invalid by reason of fraud.

The second paragraph applies the same principle of inter-communication between the vicars. While their specific competencies may be limited, their executive authority may be very broad. But in the hierarchical order, they are perceived as equals, exercising a share in the bishop's power of governance. Denial here by one vicar precludes recourse to another.

The diocesan bishop surely can grant favors. In the case of a previous denial, the bishop needs to know the reasons for denial, and that for validity. The vicars, after all, act in the name of the bishop. Moreover, according to Urrutia, the bishop can grant a favor motu proprio, that is, spontaneously.[6] In this case, he does not need to be informed of previous requests and previous denials, and the favor is valid by reason of the bishop's own authority. However attractive this opinion (especially by way of analogy with the previous canon), it really subverts the norm and encourages duplicity. Nevertheless, the diocesan bishop can reverse a previous refusal. On the other hand, an inferior office cannot reverse the decision of a superior (c. 139). The canon upholds the unity of governance within the diocese.

Canon 66 — A rescript does not become invalid due to an error in the name of the person to whom it is given or by whom it is issued, or of the place where the person resides, or in the matter concerned, provided that, in the judgment of the ordinary, there is no doubt about the person or the matter.

[6] Urrutia, 140, no. 423.

The canon concerns a doubt of fact (c. 14), one that pertains either to the recipient of the favor or to the matter of the rescript itself. The local ordinary or the major religious superior must be personally satisfied that despite any accidental errors relative to the identity, the address, and the contents the rescript is authentic (c. 40). That is, the canon conditions the execution of the rescript on the judgment of the ordinary. Substantial doubt occurs when there is question of the person or the favor intended. The ordinary must resolve any doubt in order to ensure validity.

Contrary Rescripts

Canon 67 — §1. If it happens that two contrary rescripts are obtained for one and the same thing, the particular prevails over the general in those matters which are particularly expressed.

§2. If they are equally particular or equally general, the earlier in time prevails over the later unless there is express mention of the earlier one in the later one or unless the person who obtained the earlier one has not used the rescript out of malice or notable negligence.

§3. In a case of doubt whether a rescript is invalid or not, recourse is to be made to the one who issued it.

The canon concerns contrary rescripts. The first paragraph gives us a principle to resolve any conflict; the second paragraph offers another strategy. In this matter, it is well to recall the legal maxim "It is fitting that odious things be restricted and favorable ones extended" (RI 15).

Relative to the object or the matter of the rescript, the first paragraph explains that the more concrete provision prevails over the generic (RI 34). This application of the incarnational principle, already established in canon 53, asserts the priority of the specific, the particular, and the concrete over the general. As such, it encourages a certain immediacy in deciding and behaving. In this way, the canonical tradition reverses the philosophical bias which prefers the universal, the general, and the abstract to the concrete and the particular.

The second paragraph offers another strategy should the contrary rescripts be equally particular or equally general. It refers to a priority in time according to the principle "Whoever is prior in time has preference at law" (RI 54). Since decrees usually import obligations, they take effect later. But rescripts import favors, which means that they take effect earlier. Moreover, the priority in time involves an acquired right (cc. 36 §1; 38).

This same paragraph notes two exceptions. If the later rescript refers even indirectly (expresse) to the previous document, the presumption of priority no longer obtains. In this case, the beneficiary loses the original ius ad rem for another. Because the competent authority has either revoked or suspended the earlier rescript, the law respects this intention. The second exception concerns non-use of a rescript through either deceit or notable negligence. For the first, Pope Innocent III established the legal principle at work here in the year 1203: "Fraud and deceit should prove an advantage to no one" (X.1.3.16; F 2:23). "Notable negligence" would indicate that the matter was of little or no importance to the petitioner. In this case, delay harms everyone (RI 25). However, canonical authors agree that both fraud and notable negligence would have to be proved.

If the rescripts still remain contrary, the canon provides for recourse (§3). The petitioner can ask the competent authority to clarify the situation. Despite the numerous matters which come to the attention of chancery and curial officials, they are usually quite happy to clarify ambiguous situations.

Notification

Canon 68 — A rescript of the Apostolic See in which no executor is given must be presented to the ordinary of the one who obtained it only when it is prescribed in the same letter, or it concerns public matters, or it is necessary that conditions be verified.

In effect the canon ensures an executor in three specific instances. And this pertains for lawfulness only, not for validity (c. 10). Otherwise the general principle for rescripts given in forma gratiosa obtains. Nevertheless, the rescript may require in its wording the recognition by an ordinary (c. 134). Indeed, the text may require such presentation, even for validity. In this case the Apostolic See has clearly conditioned the rescript (c. 39). A second instance of presentation occurs with "public matters." Because persons—both physical and juridic —receive rescripts, their contents often enough bear on the public purposes of the diocese. If a religious community, for example, receives permission to call a school "Catholic" (c. 803, §3), the ordinary should be advised. So public matters pertain to the external forum. Canon 1706 illustrates the principle involved here. "Public" then is opposed to private, and not to occult. Accordingly, because certain faculties granted to religious are considered private, they do not affect the public order directly; the awareness (visum) of the ordinary is not required. Finally, a rescript must be presented to an ordinary who will verify that any attached conditions have been fulfilled, viz., that the recipient is a practicing Catholic in good standing. The integrity of the juridic act (c. 124) requires that attention. Since the rescript is valid from the time of its date, commentators discuss when the recipient should present a rescript to the ordinary. As a general rule, the recipient must avoid any suspicion of the deceit and notable negligence of the previous canon.

Canon 69 — A rescript for whose presentation no time is specified can be shown to the executor at any time, provided that there is neither fraud nor malice.

Having qualified the rescript given in forma gratiosa, the code proceeds in this and the following canon to consider those given in forma commissoria. The first canon turns on the presentation of the rescript to an executor. In general, either the law or the text will determine the time frame. But this canon allows for a situation in which no time has been specified. When does the executor receive the rescript? This canon provides only a negative norm: the avoidance of fraud and malice. To take away deliberately an honor reserved for another presumes imputability (c. 1321, §3).

Canon 70 — If in a rescript the granting of a favor is entrusted to an executor, it is up to the prudent judgment and conscience of the executor to grant or deny the favor.

By definition the rescript confers a favor (gratia) which one cannot claim as a right (ius). Here, in the case of a rescript granted in forma commissoria, the canon concedes a great deal of discretion to the voluntary executor. We find an analogous situation in canon 41. Admittedly, the executor cannot act arbitrarily; the canon stipulates as criteria "the prudent judgment and conscience of the executor." As in the case of decrees, circumstances may very well have changed. The canon leaves the executor free "to grant or deny the favor." Since the favor is perceived as indivisible, the executor must grant or deny the favor as a whole and not by parts. Unlike the necessary executor, who is charged, the voluntary executor takes charge of the whole business.

Supplementary Norms

Canon 71 — No one is bound to use a rescript given only in his or her favor unless bound to do so by a canonical obligation from another source.

The canon envisages two situations. In the case of a perfectly personal (dumtaxat) rescript, the code grants complete liberty to the recipient. A priest, for example, may receive a dispensation commuting for him the liturgy of the hours. He is free to avail himself or not of this favor as circumstances warrant. That is, a favor does not become an obligation (RI 61). The second instance concerns a rescript given to benefit others. Here, the recipient has an obligation to use it, provided that the obligation derives from a canonical source. Again, a priest may have been granted the faculty to confirm (c. 885, §2). As long as the faithful are well prepared and properly disposed, he must exercise his faculty (c. 843, §1). The same principles apply to favors given orally. In concrete circumstances, the pastoral context will suggest the appropriate response.

Canon 72 — Rescripts granted by the Apostolic See which have expired can be extended once by the diocesan bishop for a just cause, but not beyond three months.

This new canon indicates the bishop's leadership role in his diocese. The law permits him to extend a favor granted by the Apostolic See under three conditions: "once," "for a just cause," "but not beyond three months." Since a rescript grants a favor which presumably contributes to someone's welfare, the bishop needs only "a just cause" in order to prorogue the favor. By way of respecting the appropriate competencies, he may exercise this faculty once. If necessary, he should be able to renew the favor within the canonical time provided. This means that the bishop does not anticipate the expiration. His decree (c. 62) takes effect after the expiration date, thereby ensuring a duration of three months. The current law uses three months as normative, found, for example, in canons 8, §1; 57, §1; 102, §2; 158, §1; 189, §3; 379; 437, §1; 1623; and 1646.

Canon 73 — Rescripts are not revoked by a contrary law unless the law itself provides otherwise.

This canon illustrates the precise difference between an obligation (ius) and a benefit (gratia). By definition (c. 59, §1), the rescript represents an exception to the law and therefore requires a strict interpretation (c. 36, §2). So a contrary law does not override the favor conceded, tantamount to an acquired right (c. 36, §1). Indeed, any subsequent law contrary to the rescript looks to the future, not to the past (c. 9). The present norm coheres with the burden of canon 20: a universal law does not derogate from a particular or a special law. How then do rescripts cease? They cease either by another administrative act formally rescinding the favor (c. 47) or by another law with an explicit revocatory clause (c. 20). Just as the legal system favors the stability of the law, it also upholds the permanence of its favors (CCEO 1513).

Canon 74 — Although one can use in the internal forum a favor granted orally, the person is bound to prove the favor in the external forum whenever someone legitimately requests it.

Although the code clearly allows for the oral act (c. 59, §2), it prefers the written document (cc. 37, 59, §1). Favors granted orally make sense in the internal forum, either sacramental or extrasacramental. Because "the forum of conscience" concerns matters at once private and personal, oral favors are used to best advantage there. Moreover, they can be extended lawfully in the external forum provided that some lawful authority does not challenge them. An ordinary, for example, can legitimately ask for some proof according to the principle Quod non est in actis, non est in mundo (CCEO 1527, §2). The Church ordinarily recognizes three modes of proof: the written document (c. 37), prescription (c. 197), and witnesses (c. 1547). Without adequate proof the beneficiary of an oral act cannot claim the protection of law.

Canon 75 — If a rescript contains a privilege or dispensation, the prescripts of the following canons are also to be observed.

From a rhetorical point of view, the canon sets up a division that accounts for the materials in chapter 4 (privileges) and chapter 5 (dispensations). Canonically speaking, it states that in addition to the common norms for administrative acts (cc. 35–47) and those concerning rescripts (cc. 59–75), both privileges and dispensations also (insuper) follow supplemental norms. The general principle of interpretation (c. 36, §1) becomes more precise relative to privileges (c. 77) and dispensations (c. 92). So the special norms will derogate from the common norms according to the principle that the specific takes priority over the generic (RI 34).

PRIVILEGES

Although the revision committee made an effort to clarify the different aspects of church governance—legislative, executive, judicial—they really did not succeed. Admittedly, they added two new titles to Book I, viz., titles III and IV. But the confusion begins early on with canons 30 and 31, which call for excessive refinement. The blurring between legislative and executive authority underlies this chapter as well. Just as the three munera—sanctifying, teaching, ruling—are inadequately distinct, so too the power of governance (c. 135, §1) remains imperfectly conceptualized.

Canonical Concept of Privilege

Canon 76 — §1. A privilege is a favor given through a particular act to the benefit of certain physical or juridic persons; it can be granted by the legislator as well as by an executive authority to whom the legislator has granted this power.

§2. Centenary or immemorial possession induces the presumption that a privilege has been granted.

This canon represents a considerable innovation compared with its predecessor, canon 63 in the 1917 code. By simplifying the previous norm, the canon stipulates the specific manner and the singular recipient (CCEO 1531). Although the privilege is still seen as a "favorable personal law," it requires the intervention of a legislator. Nevertheless, because it is ordinarily granted by a singular administrative act (per peculiarem actum), it may be delegated to one with executive authority (c. 134, §3). The appropriate relator indicated that privileges can also be acquired by prescription.[7] As a favor, the privilege acts either against the law (contra legem) or apart from the law (praeter legem), thereby retaining its legal character. Unlike other favors, however, the privilege constitutes an objective norm conferred on an individual person, either physical or juridic. So a group or a de facto association of the faithful is not really the proper subject of a privilege. In this somewhat debatable material, the canon indicates four elements: a definition, competence, the beneficiary, and the mode of acquisition.

The second paragraph sets up a presumption of law. Centennial privileges have been in existence for more than a hundred years. Immemorial privileges have existed as long as anyone can remember. The canon is concerned largely with "possession." Presumably the documentation does not exist, but it very well may. Consequently, the presumption may be overturned by contrary proof (c. 1585).

Canon 77 — A privilege must be interpreted according to the norm of can. 36, §1, but that interpretation must always be used by which the beneficiaries of a privilege actually obtain some favor.

The canon stipulates two norms relative to the interpretation of privileges. The first alludes to the common norm found in canon 36, §1, which, for all practical purposes, ensures a strict interpretation, especially in any case of doubt. To the extent that privileges go against (contra) or beyond (praeter) the law, they become offensive and even detrimental to the common good. Therefore, the narrow reading prevails. On the other hand, the canon recognizes the generosity of the grantor, which requires a liberal interpretation (CCEO 1512, §3). That is, as a lex favorabilis privata, a privilege should positively concede some benefit (RI 61). Nevertheless, following the provision of canon 36, §2, privileges are not to be multiplied.

Types of Privilege

Canon 78 — §1. A privilege is presumed to be perpetual unless the contrary is proved.

§2. A personal privilege, namely one which follows the person, is extinguished with that person's death.

§3. A real privilege ceases through the complete destruction of the thing or place; a local privilege, however, revives if the place is restored within fifty years.

Unless it is clear from the nature of the privilege itself, the law presumes that every privilege is perpetual (RI 16). In this respect, it imitates the stability of law (CCEO 1532, §1). Still, a privilege can be limited to a specific liturgical season, by the number of cases, or as a temporary expedient (c. 83, §1). The presumption of perpetuity here indicates that a privilege does not cease with the mere passing of time. If somebody has difficulty distinguishing whether certain privileges are personal or real, the following principle should prove helpful: if the privilege is hurtful, consider it personal; if the privilege is favorable, consider it real.[8]

A personal privilege attaches to an individual, whether physical or juridic. According to canonical tradition, the personal privilege so follows the person that it ceases with the death of that person (CCEO 1532, §2). According to Regulae Iuris 7, "A personal privilege follows the person; it ceases with the individual." This means that it is nontransferrable to family, to friends, or to heirs. The privilege ceases intrinsically when its subject no longer exists. It is equally possible that the competent authority could revoke the privilege so that it would cease extrinsically. In the case of a juridic person, privileges similarly cease either intrinsically (c. 120, §1) or extrinsically (c. 47).

A real privilege attaches to a thing (res), usually an office or a place. Generally, a real privilege concerns a dignity or an indulgence. For the privilege to cease, the canon requires the absolute destruction of the thing (e.g., a sacred image) or the place (e.g., a shrine). In principle, then, the nonexistence of the thing or place means the loss of all privileges. Consonant with the spirit of liberality, the canon allows for the principle of revivis-cence. If, after some disaster, a church, a shrine, or a basilica is rebuilt within fifty years (c. 201, §1), its privileges also revive (CCEO 1532, §3). Having treated in this canon the intrinsic cessation of privileges, the code addresses in the next six canons (cc. 79–84) the extrinsic cessation of privileges.

Cessation of Privileges

Canon 79 — A privilege ceases through revocation by the competent authority according to the norm of can. 47, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 81.

The canon illustrates the ordinary practice of the Church: it takes one administrative act to revoke another (c. 47). Administrative acts emanate from ecclesiastical offices. As the office endures, so too does its competence. The legal system calls for the intervention of the appropriate authority to manifest anew his will. This means that privileges do not cease with the passage of time (c. 78, §1), with the expiration of the competence of conceding authority (c. 81), or by any contrary law (c. 73). The legislator or his vicar, in effect, revokes a privilege per peculiarem actum (cf. c. 76, §1), by another administrative act, which includes a just and proportionate cause (c. 51) and lawful notification (c. 47). According to the norm, the privilege ceases with the proper notification.

Canon 80 — §1. No privilege ceases through renunciation unless the competent authority has accepted the renunciation.

§2. Any physical person can renounce a privilege granted only in that person's favor.

§3. Individual persons cannot renounce a privilege granted to some juridic person or granted in consideration of the dignity of a place or of a thing, nor is a juridic person free to renounce a privilege granted to it if the renunciation brings disadvantage to the Church or to others.

The canon speaks about the cessation of privileges through renunciation. As Mendonça points out, "Formal renunciation is not to be confused with non-use or contrary use" (cf. c. 82).[9] Like many other institutes in the Church, this provision requires two moments: a proposal and its acceptance. In other words, the hierarchical principle does not admit of any unilateral decisions (CCEO 1533). Until the competent authority has accepted the formal renunciation, the privilege endures. Since any privilege represents an objective, if personal, norm in itself (c. 76, §1), it cannot be renounced by somebody who does not have the competence to establish the norm. This means that a superior with the appropriate legislative or delegated power must by an administrative act derogate from the individual norm.

Without compromising the validity of the general principle just enunciated, the second paragraph allows an individual to renounce a personal favor. The individual in this case is a physical person, not a private juridic person. The canon requires that the privilege to be renounced has been conceded exclusively for one's personal benefit. This makes the individual the exclusive subject of the privilege. Even so, an individual is not free to renounce a privilege assigned to a place, an office, or a community because the physical person is not the proper subject of the privilege and because these privileges are conferred precisely to benefit others.

Accordingly, because the whole is greater than the part (RI 35), no individual can renounce on his or her own authority a privilege granted to a juridic person, either public or private (c. 116). Similarly, a physical person cannot renounce a privilege associated with either a place (e.g., a shrine) or a thing (e.g., a sacred image) because the privilege does not belong to his or her proper patrimony. For the most part, privileges assist the faithful in exercising their religious duties (c. 214); in their own way privileges facilitate the pastoral ministry of the Church. So while a juridic person may find a way to renounce a privilege (c. 119, 3°), the interests of the Church, understood broadly, must always be kept in view.

Canon 81 — A privilege is not extinguished when the authority of the one who granted it expires unless it has been given with the clause, at our good pleasure (ad beneplacitum nostrum), or some other equivalent expression.

This canon represents an exception to the general rule (c. 78, §1). The legislator can condition a privilege (c. 39). Otherwise, privileges derive their permanence from the stability of the offices which grant them. In this sense, the canon recognizes the common norm relative to singular administrative acts (c. 46). The dispositive part of the text will reveal whether or not the legislator has conditioned the privilege. He may very well use an expression like "at our good pleasure" or its equivalent. In this way he signifies his intention to limit the personal privilege to the extent of his own competence, at either the local or the supreme level. As soon as his authority ceases, so too does the privilege.

Canon 82 — A privilege which is not burdensome to others does not cease through non-use or contrary use. If it is to the disadvantage of others, however, it is lost if legitimate prescription takes place.

The canon distinguishes between those privileges that are burdensome to others and those that are not (CCEO 1534). This means that some privileges are affirmative and favorable while others are negative and unfavorable to third parties. In the former instance, the canon asserts the general rule that privileges remain permanently (c. 78, §1). A priest, for example, may have received a privilege of celebrating Mass at a portable altar. Still, he prefers saying Mass in a church. Because he acts contrary to his privilege does not mean that he has lost his privilege. The same principle applies to non-use. A priest who has received a commutation for the liturgy of the hours by way of privilege may in fact prefer to recite the breviary. These examples illustrate favorable privileges which do not harm a third party.

The canon goes on to speak of negative privileges. Urrutia cites as examples an exemption from a tax and the faculty of taxing others, clearly onerous to other people.[10] Given the objectivity of the privilege as a singular norm, others in the community must respect it, invoked or not. Nevertheless, this canon recognizes the force of liberative prescription (cc. 197–199). Through non-use of this unfavorable privilege, the beneficiary signifies, at least implicitly, his intention to renounce it (cc. 71, 80, §2); and the affected third parties can take advantage of prescription (CCEO 1534). The civil law of prescription must be in place (c. 197); all parties must act in good faith (c. 198); and the matter involved must actually be prescriptible. Privileges that emanate from the Apostolic See are not (c. 199, 2°). Nevertheless, a lesser privilege may very well cease through prescription.

Canon 83 — §1. A privilege ceases through the lapse of the time period or through the completion of the number of cases for which it had been granted, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 142, §2.

§2. It also ceases if, in the judgment of the competent authority, circumstances are so changed in the course of time that it becomes harmful or its use illicit.

The first paragraph refers to temporary privileges, otherwise known as indults. Privileged faculties expire when the time-frame ceases or when the number of cases is complete. Canon 142, §2 makes a provision for the internal forum only; canon 144 supplies in the external forum executive power in the case of common error. The diocesan bishop may prorogue a privilege granted by the Apostolic See once and for only three months (c. 72).

The second paragraph also concerns the intrinsic cessation of privileges. It mentions the disruptive change in circumstances which militates against the final cause of the privilege. Every privilege, after all, is meant to confer a benefit and not to work against a beneficiary (RI 61). An appropriate authority makes the determination that a particular privilege is either illicit in its use or detrimental to the Church. With this judgment confirmed, the privilege simply ceases.

Canon 84 — One who abuses the power given by a privilege deserves to be deprived of that privilege. Therefore, when the holder of a privilege has been warned in vain, an ordinary is to deprive the one who gravely abuses it of a privilege which he himself has granted. If the privilege was granted by the Apostolic See, however, an ordinary is bound to notify the Apostolic See.

An abuse of a personal privilege deserves privation. The canon takes notice of three elements: the grave abuse, the inefficacious warning, and the deprivation. A privilege can be abused by exceeding the intended limits, by acting contrary to its original purpose, and by making it an occasion of sin or a source of scandal. The canon speaks of grave abuse which presupposes a habitual intention to disregard the moral order. For this reason the Church lists the deprivation of "privileges previously granted" among the expiatory penalties (cc. 1331, §2, 3°; 1336, §1, 2°). Second, an ordinary, being advised of the abusive situation, must issue a warning lest he seem to give tacit approval to the abuse (CCEO 1535). Neither the abuse nor the warning removes the privilege. The privation occurs, finally, when the responsible superior revokes the power (potestatem) behind the privilege. Although an ordinary may do this at the local level for a local privilege, in case of an apostolic privilege, he must inform the Holy See.

By way of conclusion, this chapter recognizes six ways of losing a privilege: (1) revocation (c. 79), (2) renunciation (c. 80), (3) expiration (c. 81), (4) prescription (c. 82), (5) cessation (c. 83), and (6) privation (c. 84). However subtle or infrequent these distinctions, the matter bears upon canon 93, which concerns the cessation of dispensations. These supplement the common norm found in canon 47.

CHAPTER V
DISPENSATIONS

As the commentators like to remind us, this chapter reverses just about one thousand years of church history. So it represents a certain newness, not without its difficulties, that indicates just how successfully the 1983 code reflects the intent of the Second Vatican Council. In effect, it obrogates the materials found in canons 80–86 of the 1917 code.

Although Roman law recognizes the institute that we call dispensation, it applies largely to three areas: the law, penalties, and contracts. During the first millennium of the Church's history, this faculty appears only in the most dramatic instances, e.g., relative to the lapsi, the ordinations of heretical or schismatic bishops, the residence of bishops. According to Fournier, the first ecclesiastical tract on dispensations appears with the Prologus of Yves of Chartres (d. 1115), a very famous text still discussed by medievalists.[11] De Ghellinck speculates that it may very well have circulated as an independent text in the eleventh century under the title De consonantia canonum. Whatever its provenance, it illustrates quite forcefully the broad dispensing power of bishops.

Admittedly, Yves of Chartres was perhaps the best-known canonist of his day. But he was also very pastorally minded, so he thought that bishops should dispense their people whenever they could secure some spiritual good. Influenced largely by Alger of Liège, he taught that justice must be tempered by mercy. Indeed, his letters reveal just how often and liberally the bishop of Chartres dispensed in order to accommodate difficult situations. So Naz, following Brys, gives us a definition of a dispensation which he attributes to Yves of Chartres: "a temporary relaxation of the law's rigor on account of a necessity of circumstances or usefulness to the Church."[12]

[11] For this text, see PL 161:47–60.

With Gratian, we find another mind-set. Unlike the French canonist, he rallies to the centrist position of Rome. This became for him the surest way of realizing the goals of the Gregorian Reform (1075–1122). According to this model, the plenitudo potestatis resides in the Roman pontiff; he delegates jurisdiction as he sees fit. This includes the power of dispensation. For Yves of Chartres, dispensing authority came with episcopal consecration and office. For Gratian, it was delegated by the Holy Father. This situation prevailed in the Church through Vatican I and the 1917 code. With Vatican II, we find the breakthrough, the one that reversed one thousand years of legal history in the Church.

The primary text occurs in Christus Dominus:

> As successors of the apostles, bishops automatically enjoy in the dioceses entrusted to them all the ordinary, proper, and immediate authority required for the exercise of their pastoral office. But this authority never in any instance infringes upon the power which the Roman Pontiff has, by virtue of his office, of reserving cases to himself or to some other authority. (CD 8a; no. 586)

According to this text, diocesan bishops possess by reason of their episcopal order and their canonical mission all the power necessary to supervise that portion of the people of God confided to them. This means that they are no longer to be seen as vicars of the pope or emissaries of the Roman Curia. They have all the necessary authority in their own right. The text continues:

> Except when it is a question of matters reserved to the supreme authority of the Church, the general law of the Church gives each diocesan bishop the faculty to grant dispensations in particular cases to the faithful over whom he exercises authority according to the norm of law, provided he judges it helpful for their spiritual welfare. (CD 8b; no. 587)

These two paragraphs reflect the new ecclesiology of Vatican II, characterized by the principle of subsidiarity and the union of churches.

To prevent any misunderstanding of the bishop's proper authority, Lumen gentium speaks very clearly:

> Bishops govern the particular churches entrusted to them as the vicars and ambassadors of Christ.... This power which they personally exercise in Christ's name is proper, ordinary, and immediate, although its exercise is ultimately regulated by the supreme authority of the Church, and can be circumscribed by certain limits, for the advantage of the Church or of the faithful. In virtue of this power, bishops have the sacred right and the duty before the Lord to make laws for their subjects, to pass judgment on them, and to moderate everything pertaining to the ordering of worship and the apostolate. (LG 27; no. 351)

This important statement not only completes the work of Vatican I, but in many ways represents the precise achievement of Vatican II. We see its effects in the current code (e.g., c. 381, §1).

The first legislation to respond to this old/new recognition was Pope Paul VI's motu proprio Pastorale munus, issued on November 30, 1963.[13] According to Msgr. J. Denis, this document conceded to the bishops a number of faculties which they previously had had to request and renew periodically. He continues: "It consisted... of a concession of the Holy See, not a recognition of what devolved by reason of episcopal consecration as a number of Fathers had called for. The document granted to the bishops all at once forty faculties and eight privileges."[14] Although this motu proprio appeared in the midst of Vatican II, it could not satisfy the bishops, who at that time were working on Lumen gentium.

This dogmatic constitution clearly distinguishes the diocesan bishops from the Sovereign Pontiff:

> The pastoral office or the habitual and daily care of the sheep is entrusted to them completely. Nor are they to be regarded as vicars of the Roman Pontiff, for they exercise an authority which is proper to them, and are quite correctly called "prelates," heads of the people whom they govern. Their power, therefore, is not destroyed by the supreme and universal power. On the contrary, it is affirmed, strengthened, and vindicated thereby, since the Holy See unfailingly preserves the form of government established by Christ the Lord in his Church. (LG 27; no. 352)

In effect, this means that the papal system of "doling out" faculties to residential bishops had to cease. In his understanding of this development, K. Rahner says that we cannot claim "an absolutely one way real and logical relation of priority or posteriority between the two factors, which are in fact present in each of the two offices (pope and bishop)." So he is satisfied to assert "a reciprocal relationship" between them.[15] The apostolic constitution Pastor bonus (June 28, 1988) especially alludes to this aspect of hierarchical communion, a clear sign of the communio ecclesiology effected by Vatican II.

On June 15, 1966, Pope Paul VI promulgated his motu proprio De episcoporum muneribus.[16] Consonant with the teaching of Christus Dominus and Lumen gentium, the pope offers certain norms relative to the dispensing power of bishops. For Msgr. Denis, the document still looks very much like "pontifical law." For M. Bonnet, however, the text presents a list of those general laws of the Church whose dispensation the Holy Father reserves to himself. So it is not "a concession or a delegation of a papal power made to the bishops, but really a recognition of the bishops' power to dispense."[17] Canonists generally agree that these canons successfully codify the provisions of De episcoporum muneribus.

The principal change that occurs in this chapter contradicts canonical tradition. So say the fathers of the code commission.[18] According to the tradition, dispensing power is an expression of legislative power (e.g., CIC 80); the present code, however, makes it a species of executive power. Admittedly, this broadens its accessibility, largely because just as legislative authority is to be interpreted narrowly, so executive power is to be interpreted broadly (c. 138). Consequently, those who possess executive (or administrative) power —either by office, by law, or by delegation—exercise real dispensing power.

Does this mean that a lay person can validly dispense? At the present state of the question, there is no easy answer. Unlike J. Vernay in his Initiation, who has no difficulty acknowledging all the Christifideles as habiles for governance,[19] the contributors to the commentary prepared by the Canon Law Society of Great Britain and Ireland, Letter and Spirit, seem very reluctant to acknowledge this ecclesial fact.[20] Those canonists who attach the power of jurisdiction exclusively to the power of orders have simply misread the structure of governance in the Church today.[21] Remembering, moreover, what we have already said, that executive power depends on the will of the competent superior, the legislator may very well intend just that, i.e., "for a particular case." If the competent authority has in fact delegated executive power unconditionally, then that disposition also indicates the mind of the legislator.

Before proceeding to the individual canons, it might be helpful to offer a further reflection. This has to do with the language of dispensation itself. In Roman law, a dispensation referred to any release from the law, from penalties, and from contracts. Although all three institutes involve obligation, the dispensation suspends the obligation and leaves the law intact. To a certain extent, vestiges of this usage remain in the current code. In Christian usage, we find a language of stewardship, i.e., a good steward managing property. So dispensation has to do with both the administration and the distribution of goods. St. Paul echoes this usage in 1 Corinthians 4:1. Canon 992, for example, speaks of the Church dispensing the merits of Christ. Again, we find canons 276, §1; 387; and 1273 reflecting this Christian dimension. Later, a medicinal use entered the language, i.e., the dispensary. The priest, then, was said to be "dispensing" the sacraments. As Urrutia points out, the current code does not refer to this last usage at all.

If we look to dispensation beyond this particular chapter, we find it applied concretely to oaths and vows (cc. 1194, 1196, 1203). In marriage law, the canons speak of a "dispensation" from canonical form (c. 1127). Again, we notice canon 1697 which speaks of a "dispensation from a marriage ratum et non consummatum." Each of these instances presupposes a vinculum or an obligatory bond, which competent authority relaxes for a just cause. By combining dispensation with oikonomia, some contemporary canonists see this institute as a means for constructive innovation. It also provides a way of resolving intolerable marriage situations.

Canonical Concept of Dispensation

Canon 85 — A dispensation, or the relaxation of a merely ecclesiastical law in a particular case, can be granted by those who possess executive power within the limits of their competence, as well as by those who have the power to dispense explicitly or implicitly either by the law itself or by legitimate delegation.

In the literature, canonists refer to dispensation as a vulnus legis, that is, a "wounding of the law." If the law is given to ensure the common good, then dispensation looks very much like an exception to the law (CCEO 1536, §1). Not surprisingly, then, it requires a strict interpretation according to cc. 18; 36, §1; and 92. Still, the 1983 code uses the concept of dispensation more broadly than this canon would suggest. In addition to the examples mentioned above, canon 527, §2 indicates that a dispensation from certain procedural formalities in effect puts the pastor in possession of his parish.

In addition to the diocesan bishop, who else possesses ordinary executive power? Those equivalent to him in law (cc. 370; 371; 381 §2; 427, §1) and vicars general and episcopal vicars (cc. 134, §1; 479, §1, §2); also religious superiors of clerical institutes of pontifical right (cf. c. 968, §2). The canon also mentions "by the law itself." See, for example, canons 543, §1; 1079; 1086; 1196; 1203; and 1245. Finally, it speaks of "legitimate delegation."

According to canon 129, §1, the clergy are habiles of the "power of governance (cf. c. 274, §1). The laity also are habiles of being admitted to those ecclesiastical offices which they can assume (c. 228, §1). In short, all the Christifideles are capable of receiving executive power. Regulae Iuris 68 reminds us: "Someone can delegate another to do what he can do himself." In this instance, the rules of lawful delegation apply: cc. 137–142. This means that the power of dispensation, as an expression of executive power, really participates in the Church's power of governance. Even though the canon speaks of "a particular case," to the extent that competence allows, any dispensation really mitigates, relaxes, or suspends the law.

Exceptions

Canon 86 — Laws are not subject to dispensation to the extent that they define those things which are essentially constitutive of juridic institutes or acts.

This particular provision originates with De episcoporum muneribus iv (CLD 6, 396). Constitutive law defines elements that essentially comprise a juridic act (e.g., c. 124, §1) or an institute (e.g., c. 573, §1). According to Michiels, constitutive law refers to "an ecclesiastical law, which positively determines the intrinsic form or the essential elements making up . . . the determinate nature of the specific act; it takes its origin and complete [juridic] status from canon law."[22] Because both rights and responsibilities emanate from this juridic state, all the essential elements must be present. Otherwise, the missing element(s) invalidate either the act or the institute. Consequently, the diocesan bishop is not free, for example, to dispense any of his subjects thinking of entering consecrated life from taking the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Similarly, he cannot dispense spouses from giving marital consent. In order to receive any of the sacraments, one must be free. So, for the social sacraments, marriage and orders, freedom is constitutive of the juridic state. As we have seen earlier, administrative acts require proper competence, consultation, and reasons as constitutive elements of their validity. At the present state of theological and canonical reflection, canon 1024 also belongs to constitutive law. Other canonists would also include liturgical law. To the extent that sacred signs constitute the essence of the sacramental system, nobody in the Church is free to alter them, as the Holy Father has recently insisted in his celebrated letter, Ordinatio sacerdotalis (May 22, 1994). Still, one can distinguish ceremonies from rites, which means accidents from substances. More liberal canonists, then, allow bishops to dispense from accidental elements.

What emerges from this discussion of constitutive law? We see that any dispensation in the Church must be reasonable, in the sense of "proportionate reason." According to canons 87, §1 and 90, §1, a dispensation can be given only for the "spiritual good" of the faithful and "for a just and reasonable cause." The Church has not confided this faculty to bishops and others in order to damage or destroy those institutions which have served the Church so faithfully and so well over the centuries (CCEO 1537). Even though the canons give to the diocesan bishop the faculty to dispense from the constitutions of an institute of diocesan right (c. 595, §2), he is not really free to change the essential purpose or character of the religious group. After all, juridic acts and institutes witness to the Church and her holiness. And for that reason, they need to be protected.

Canon 87 — §1. A diocesan bishop, whenever he judges that it contributes to their spiritual good, is able to dispense the faithful from universal and particular disciplinary laws issued for his territory or his subjects by the supreme authority of the Church. He is not able to dispense, however, from procedural or penal laws nor from those whose dispensation is specially reserved to the Apostolic See or some other authority.

§2. If recourse to the Holy See is difficult and, at the same time, there is danger of grave harm in delay, any ordinary is able to dispense from these same laws even if dispensation is reserved to the Holy See, provided that it concerns a dispensation which the Holy See is accustomed to grant under the same circumstances, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 291.

This important canon obrogates from canon 81 in the 1917 code. That is, it completely reworks and rethinks the previous practice. Grounded in Christus Dominus 8 and De episcoporum muneribus iv–v, it recognizes the bishop's power of dispensation, not as a concession from the Holy See, but as intrinsic to his power of governance. The reference to "universal and particular disciplinary laws" reminds us that the diocese as a portion of the people of God "constitutes a particular church in which the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic Church of Christ is truly present and operative" (CD 11; no. 593). As the diocesan bishop is responsible for upholding the universal laws of the Church (c. 392, §1), so can he dispense from them in a particular instance. As the proper legislator for his people, the diocesan bishop not only makes laws, but he also applies laws (c. 392). Both the nature and the logic of the situation would seem to require broad dispensing power (CCEO 1538, §1). In effect, this canon supplies it.

While canonists remark on this advance, we must also note the limitations which the canon(s) impose. Already, we have seen that bishops cannot dispense from constitutive law (c. 86). In the first paragraph of this canon, both procedural and penal laws are excepted. That is, the bishop cannot dispense from procedural law (Book VII and passim) precisely because it assists in the protection of rights. By the same token, the bishop cannot dispense from penal law (Book VI) because penalties look to the spiritual conversion of the faithful. This means that the dispensing power of the bishop is restricted to laws that are either (a) universal or (b) particular but also (c) ecclesiastical and (d) disciplinary. The canon also makes it clear that the dispensation by definition pertains not to any general permission but to an individual case.

The canon goes on to speak about those laws "whose dispensation is specially reserved to the Apostolic See or some other authority." According to De episcoporum muneribus ix, the sovereign pontiff has reserved about twenty situations to himself. In his commentary, Lefèbvre groups these reserved laws under three headings: those relative to the clergy, to religious, and to the sacraments. Without compiling a taxative list, the current USCC publication Manual for Bishops (1992) catalogues the major reservations first for orders and then for matrimony.[23] For a current list, see the appendix at the end of this chapter on dispensations.

[23] See A Manual for Bishops, rev. ed. (Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1992) 8–11, 12–15.

As Mendonça points out, some of these reservations the Holy See is wont to dispense; others, not. The practical canonist must have an eye to Roman replies, current jurisprudence, and curial practice. Wrenn's commentary, however critical, seems most timely and useful. O'Reilly notes that in recent years certain authentic interpretations have placed a limit on what would otherwise seem to be the ordinary dispensing power of bishops.

He is referring first to the August 1, 1985 decision which does not allow the bishop to dispense two Catholics from canonical form; second, to the decision on canon 767 which prevents the bishop from dispensing the priest or deacon from giving the homily; third, to the interpretation of canon 705 which denies both active and passive voice to religious bishops. For the same reason, authors have noted that the Holy See has in place very clear guidelines about priests going into politics, so that while the bishops (theoretically) can dispense from c. 287, §2, in practice they seem to defer to the current policy of the Holy See. Finally, we can point to the Program for Priestly Formation (4th ed.), no. 263, concerning "the requirements of c. 250."

The second paragraph refers to what canonists call "the urgent case." In effect, it gives not only the diocesan bishop but any ordinary (c. 134, §1) and any other competent authority (c. 137) the power to dispense even from those laws usually reserved to the Holy See. In order to invoke this extraordinary faculty, the canon specifies three conditions—all three of which must be present simultaneously. In order of sequence they are (1) difficult recourse, (2) grave harm in delay, and (3) a dispensation that the Holy See usually does grant (CCEO 1538, §2).

The canon really presupposes ordinary mail as the usual means of communicating with either the Holy See or with any other ecclesiastical superior (cf. c. 1079, §4). For one reason or another, the mails will not arrive in time to take care of this "urgent case." The canon reads "difficult"; it does not say "impossible." In order to ensure both privacy and confidentiality, both matters of constitutive justice, the Apostolic See does not readily encourage "telecommunications." That is, we must not think ordinarily in terms of Telex, fax, satellite communication, or e-mail. The conservative stance reflects a very basic value, which the Church associates with confidentiality (protected by some twenty-three canons). This means that traditional thinking makes little or no allowance for the Internet. Admittedly, a papal legate may have the necessary dispensing authority as part of his diplomatic faculties, but the canon indicates no necessity of contacting him since he is not mentioned in the definition of "Apostolic See" given in canon 361. Consequently, the interpretation of "difficult recourse" depends very exactly on the prudent judgment of the ordinary involved.

The canon speaks of "grave harm in delay." While the phrase grave damnum comes from the moralists, it recalls Regulae Iuris 25, that sentence from Paulus to the effect that delay harms everyone. The canonists, however, who comment on this passage do not render the phrase any more specific.[24] It does occur elsewhere in the code: cc. 326, §1; 1328, §2; 1741, §5. It refers to a situation of moral seriousness and not just to an inconvenience. We do know that the first paragraph speaks of "spiritual good" (cf. c. 88) and that canon 90 requires "a just and reasonable cause" for validity. Although the canon itself requires a strict interpretation (c. 36, §1), the reason itself can be broad enough to account for the circumstances of the situation (c. 90). Therefore, the particular case requiring urgency should be able to balance those elements to achieve a practical credibility.

The canon assumes that normally the Holy See would grant the dispensation under the same circumstances. This condition nuances any reasonable application of this canon. The Holy See, for example, does not easily dispense from celibacy, from solemn profession, from apostasy. On the other hand, the ordinary may use this canon to dispense from the law of alienation (c. 1292), from the defect of age (c. 1031, §4), from retroactive validation (c. 1165, §1). The Holy See (apparently) never dispenses from episcopal orders, from the irregularity of abortion, and from the impediment of consanguinity in all degrees of the direct line (cc. 108, 1091, §1). Despite the broad dispensing power of this canon, it presupposes a capacity for better than average discrimination.

Competence

Canon 88 — A local ordinary is able to dispense from diocesan laws and, whenever he judges that it contributes to the good of the faithful, from laws issued by a plenary or provincial council or by the conference of bishops.

The canon reflects the gradual extension of Pastorale munus and its faculties to other diocesan officials. What began as a very restrictive concession to the local bishop in a short time applied even to chancellors in the United States. The definition of "local ordinary" here comes from De episcoporum muneribus ii, indicating the Church's broader concern to provide canonical answers to pastoral questions.

At this particular point, we may want to emphasize the singularity of the dispensation. That is, it applies by definition to a single case or instance, so this chapter does not envisage any dispensations understood generically (unrestricted) or broadly (unlimited). As we have seen, the individual case, however, may turn on either a physical person or a juridic person. So the local ordinary may dispense an individual or a community from participating, for example, in a diocesan day of penance (c. 1249).

Even though the law gives juridic personality to the ecclesiastical province (c. 432, §2), the competence of the provincial council seems relatively limited in law. In one area, however, the provincial council seems very important indeed: it sets the stipend for Mass offerings (c. 952, §1). If any local ordinary wished to dispense in a particular case, he might well find himself in difficulty with the larger community called diocese or province (cf. c. 1308, §1). In other words, he would have to have a proportionately just reason.

According to an authentic interpretation issued on August 1, 1985, the decrees issued by an episcopal conference fall under the category of general executory decrees (cc. 31–33). Although these look like laws, they really are not (c. 455, §1). In a number of places, the 1983 code enjoins on the national conference of bishops to establish norms in order to secure a certain uniform practice throughout the conference (cf., for example, c. 1127, §2). Nevertheless, before the norms take any effect, they must be sent to the Holy See for "review" (c. 456). This canon asserts the independence of the diocesan bishop relative to his own particular church (c. 455, §4). Nevertheless, like all of these canons, this one also presupposes hierarchical communion and canonical mission, which import a solicitude for all the churches.

A more delicate question arises with a consideration of liturgical law. Can the local ordinary dispense from liturgical law? Truth to tell, there does not seem to be any general or clear answer to the question today.[25] To the extent that liturgy comprises constitutive law, bishops cannot dispense (c. 86). To the extent that liturgical rubrics and other conditions belong to the Church's disciplinary laws, they can dispense (c. 87, §1).

Nevertheless, the area requires enormous caution. First of all, we are speaking about cult and worship, both of which pertain to the virtue of religion, which, as the highest form of justice, everyone must take very seriously. Second, any dispensation pertains to an individual case and not to any carte blanche (cf. c. 838, §4). Third, because the liturgical books require both recognition and approval from the Holy See (cc. 826, §1; 838, §2), they pertain to universal or pontifical law, which would seem to require a proportionately grave reason for any dispensation. While the liturgists may have helped their cause in some respects, they have hindered it in others. As the commentary on canon 2 makes clear, liturgical law is not entirely under their control. This means that they are also obliged to respect and to follow liturgical norms.

Canon 89 — A pastor and other presbyters or deacons are not able to dispense from universal and particular law unless this power has been expressly granted to them.

In addition to those faculties which the law expressly gives (e.g., cc. 1079, 1080), this canon provides for lawful delegation (c. 137, §1). Indeed, this seems to be the ordinary mode of extending this kind of pastoral care. Often enough, missionary priests and religious are given certain faculties by reason of their situation. So they too fall under the norm of lawful delegation. Where do we find this delegation? The priests customarily find it in the pagella which they receive usually at the beginning of their ministry or at the time of a new assignment. It contains explicitly all the ordinary faculties which the bishop is willing to concede to the clergy. In this way, the canon is able to protect two values: the pastoral dimension associated with dispensing power and the clear supervisory role attributed to the diocesan bishop.

Motivating Cause

Canon 90 — §1. One is not to be dispensed from an ecclesiastical law without a just and reasonable cause, after taking into account the circumstances of the case and the gravity of the law from which dispensation is given; otherwise the dispensation is illicit and, unless it is given by the legislator himself or his superior, also invalid.

§2. In a case of doubt concerning the sufficiency of the cause, a dispensation is granted validly and licitly.

This canon, substantially the same as canon 84, §1 in the 1917 code, is based on De episcoporum muneribus viii with a reference to Christus Dominus 8b. Paul VI writes: "As provided in canon 84, §1, there is required for granting a dispensation a just and reasonable cause, taking into account the gravity of the law from which the dispensation is given (CCEO 1536, §2). The spiritual good of the faithful is a legitimate cause for a dispensation."[26] The commentators speak of the proportion required between the law being dispensed and the particular case. A relatively minor law requires a lesser cause. Since the Church attaches validity (c. 10) to the reason given for the dispensation, it must be free from dolus (c. 63). In this way, the Church is able to prevent the discipline from being trivialized.

Recognizing that canon law really exists as a subalternated science, we can illustrate its dependence on moral theology in this canon. Moreover, we can cite St. Thomas Aquinas to make this case. Since he explains the institute in his "Treatise on Law," we can expect from him a lucid persuasion (c. 252, §3). The question concerns "whether rulers can dispense from human laws."[27] According to St. Thomas, the good householder must combine prudence with fidelity. Clearly, this article places dispensation within the original Christian context. The argument germane to our present canon turns on the double distinction between faithful and unfaithful, prudent and imprudent. An authentically ecclesial consciousness/ conscience makes it clear where the moral values reside.

The second paragraph resolves any positive doubt (c. 14). As J. Risk points out in his commentary, the doubt must be both positive and objective; otherwise we are not dealing with doubt at all.[28] As in other cases, the law itself resolves any ambiguity (CCEO 1536, §3). This means that the dispensation may be illicit but valid. Whether the law actually wishes to accommodate these nominal niceties remains to be seen.

Appropriate Subjects

Canon 91 — Even when outside his territory, one who possesses the power to dispense is able to exercise it with respect to his subjects even though they are absent from the territory, and, unless the contrary is expressly established, also with respect to travelers actually present in the territory, as well as with respect to himself.

This canon actually applies canon 136 on executive power to this particular institute called dispensation. It represents a broader extension than that found in the 1917 code, for it describes a competence at once personal and territorial. As such, it includes three different groups of the faithful: his own people, travelers, and the homeless; the canon also mentions "himself" (CCEO 1539). It looks like an application of Regulae Iuris 53: who can do "more" can surely do less. While the 1983 code grants to the ordinary this broad dispensing power, it is not entirely clear that Urrutia is correct when he refers to these recipients as "passive subjects." If the validity of any dispensation depends on a just and reasonable cause, we cannot reasonably consider this immanent activity as particularly passive.

Interpretation

Canon 92 — A dispensation is subject to a strict interpretation according to the norm of can. 36, §1, as is the very power to dispense granted for a particular case.

The canon refers to c. 36, §1 which limits administrative acts. To the extent, then, that dispensation represents an exception to the law (c. 18), it requires the restrictive norm (CCEO 1512, §4). By narrowing the exceptions to law, the Church is emphasizing the precise value of the law meant to enhance the common good. Once again, we are able to see the coherence of the system at work.

Cessation

Canon 93 — A dispensation which has successive application ceases in the same ways as a privilege as well as by the certain and total cessation of the motivating cause.

[26] CLD 6, 397.

[27] For St. Thomas's treatment of dispensation, see STh 1–2.97.4.

[28] CLSA Com, 67.

In general, one administrative act revokes another (cc. 47, 79). But, as we have also seen, the principle of cessation can be written into the rescript. So the canon refers to canon 83 which specifies the causes for cessation of privileges, e.g., the number of cases for which the dispensation was given has expired, or the time-period (e.g., during Advent or Lent) has lapsed, or the circumstances have so changed that the just and reasonable cause no longer applies (CCEO 1513, §4). In these ways, the Church implements the strict interpretation associated with dispensation.

The canon mentions privileges explicitly. This recalls a caution which Pope Paul VI made in De episcoporum muneribus iv: "The grant of a permission, a faculty, an indult, or an absolution, is not contained in the notion of a dispensation."[29] So by way of concluding this discussion, we offer the following definitions by way of distinguishing dispensation from other juridic acts.

Permission (licentia) is the faculty of doing or omitting something which is permitted not in an absolute manner but conditioned by the consent of the lawful authority. Thus, permission is not something done against the law.

[29] CLD 6, 396.

A faculty is the extension of a power given by a superior enjoying jurisdiction in the external forum to an inferior so that he/she can do validly, licitly, or without risk something which by its nature or by some positive reservation belongs to a higher superior. For example, the power to confirm can be given to a priest.

The term "indult" designates a special favor given for a determinate period of time; it is distinguished from a privilege which is a special favor granted in perpetuity. Both indult and privilege comprise a positive and objective juridic norm. It is necessary to remark that the term "indult" is applied also to the document granting the concession of the favor, as in the indult of a marriage dispensation.

Outside of sacramental absolution or the acquittal of an accused (a judicial absolution), absolution is the act whereby a superior releases a believer from the medicinal penalties or censures incurred by him (CIC 2236). These distinctions make it clear that dispensation is a specific juridic act defined in law and limited in practice.

APPENDIX – DISPENSATIONS AND OTHER MATTERS RESERVED TO THE HOLY SEE

1. Dispensation from the obligation of celibacy as a marriage impediment (cc. 291, 1078, §2, 1°).
2. The grant of a favor of returning to the lay state for deacons and presbyters (c. 290, 3°).
3. Dispensation of the required age in excess of one year for ordination of both deacons and presbyters (cc. 1031, §1, §2, §4).
4. Dispensation from all irregularities to orders if the "fact on which they are based has been brought to the judicial forum" (c. 1047 §1).
5. Dispensation from certain specially reserved irregularities and impediments to receive orders (c. 1047, §2). These include:
   (a) the public delict mentioned in canon 1041, 2° of apostasy, heresy, or schism (c. 1047, §2, 1°);
   (b) the public delict mentioned in canon 1041, 3° of attempted marriage when impeded by a prior bond, orders, or a public perpetual vow of chastity (c. 1047, §2, 1°);

- (c) the public or occult delict mentioned in canon 1041, 4° of a person who has committed voluntary homicide or procured an abortion and those who positively cooperated in either (c. 1047, §2, 2°);
- (d) the impediment of having a wife as mentioned in canon 1042, 1° (n.b., the impediment does not apply to married men destined for the permanent diaconate); see c. 1047, §2, 3°.

6. Dispensation from specially reserved irregularities which preclude the exercise of orders already received (c. 1047, §3). These include:
   - (a) only public cases mentioned in canon 1041, 3° of attempted marriage when impeded by a prior bond, orders, or a public perpetual vow of chastity (c. 1047, §3);
   - (b) both public and occult cases mentioned in canon 1041, 4° of a person who has committed voluntary homicide or procured an abortion and those who positively cooperated in either (c. 1047, §3).
7. Dispensation from the minimum number of bishops at an episcopal ordination (c. 1014).
8. Dispensation from the impediment of crime as defined in canon 1090 (c. 1078, §2, 2°).
9. Dispensation from canonical form between two Catholics (c. 1127). See the authentic interpretation of July 5, 1985; AAS 77 (1985) 771.
10. Dispensation/dissolution of a non-consummated marriage (cc. 1142, 1698).
11. Dissolution of a marriage "in favor of the faith," where one of the parties was already baptized before or during the marriage to be dissolved.
12. Certain radical sanations (c. 1165). The diocesan bishop is able to grant radical sanations except in two situations (c. 1165, §2):
   - (a) where an impediment reserved to the Apostolic See by canon 1078, §2 (sacred orders, vow of chastity, coniugicide) is involved; and
   - (b) where there was an impediment of the natural law or of divine positive law (e.g., prior bond) which has ceased to exist.
13. Suspension, dispensation, or commutation of a promissory oath which would tend to harm others (c. 1203)
14. Excommunication incurred from the desecration of the consecrated eucharistic species (c. 1367).
15. Excommunication incurred from using physical force against the Roman Pontiff (c. 1370).
16. The excommunication of a priest who violated canon 977 by attempting to absolve an accomplice of a sin against the sixth commandment except in periculo mortis (c. 1378).
17. The excommunication of a bishop who ordains someone a bishop without a pontifical mandate and the person who was ordained (c. 1382).
18. The excommunication incurred from the direct violation of the seal of confession (c. 1388, §1).
19. The reduction of Mass stipends "for a just and necessary cause" (c. 1308, §1).
20. A dispensation exempting the deacon or priest from giving the homily (c. 767). An authentic interpretation was given on June 20, 1987; see AAS 79 (1987) 1249.
21. A dispensation from the academic requirements for tribunal personnel relative to canons 1420, §4; 1421, §3; and 1435 "without doubt reserved to the Apostolic See, and more specifically to the Apostolic Signatura" (PB 124, no. 2). See Roman Replies (1994) 22–24.

Title V
Statutes and Rules of Order
[cc. 94–95]

This new title indicates the place of statutes and rules of order in the ordinary life of the Church. As such, it marks an advance over the 1917 code which made no such provision. Given the freedom of association, however, which the Church has only recently recognized for both the laity and even (though more reluctantly) for the clergy, the code commission decided to add this new chapter. Admittedly, it pertains to what we might call formal associations and formal meetings. But the 1983 code indicates in many places that statutes are clearly in order. So these norms act as guidelines. Rules of order (as in the Roberts' Rules) govern individual meetings. Indeed, often enough the success of these meetings depends quite exactly on these procedural norms. The Church also recognizes their usefulness. As Bonnet and David observe, statutes describe the nature of an association, whereas the rules govern its internal governance. To the extent that the Church officially recognizes the statutes of a given organization or group, these statutes become a true source of law. We might note by way of an introductory conclusion that both statutes and rules reflect an aspect of church that we may very well associate with the principle of subsidiarity.

Statutes

Canon 94 — §1. Statutes in the proper sense are ordinances which are established according to the norm of law in aggregates of persons (universitas personarum) or of things (universitas rerum) and which define their purpose, constitution, government, and methods of operation.

§2. The statutes of an aggregate of persons bind only the persons who are its legitimate members; the statutes of an aggregate of things, those who direct it.

§3. Those prescripts of statutes established and promulgated by virtue of legislative power are governed by the prescripts of the canons on laws.

While the first paragraph looks explicitly to juridic persons (Book I, title VI) in the Church, it pertains equally to other associations of the faithful (Book II, part one, title V) as well. "Juridic person" is the name which the Church gives to an ecclesiastical corporation (c. 115). A corporation may be made up of individual persons who constitute the membership (e.g., a religious congregation). This is known in law as universitas personarum. On the other hand, a corporation may be made up of things such as property, investments, or monies administered by a board of directors or trustees (e.g., a pious foundation). The code refers to this entity as universitas rerum. By definition, an ecclesiastical corporation or juridic person must not only have statutes, but the statutes must also be approved (c. 117).

Other organizations encouraged by the new code may also seek legal personality in the Church. This means that they will have to prepare statutes. The first paragraph presents in outline form the various matters that must be treated. The canon gives us four different titles or chapters that should enable any group to indicate its relevance to the Church (c. 298, §1). The organization's purpose, then, must be compatible with the Church's mission understood in a very broad sense. The constitution would indicate the various ways in which the organization expects to realize its purpose. Governance refers to personnel, what we might recognize as the legal officers of the group. Procedure would include both internal and external operations. The next canon on rules would take care of the internal ordering of business; in all likelihood, a supplementary set of rules would be required to cover outside activities. This outline provides a spine, if you will. Depending on the nature of the organization, the constitutions can be greatly expanded (as, for example, with religious institutes); or they may be kept to a minimum (as, for example, with the college of diocesan consultors). At any rate, the canon indicates the principal points that must be addressed.

In the second paragraph, we see once again how the canon indicates a moral dimension implied by either membership (universitas personarum) or responsibility (universitas rerum). That is, individuals freely assent to belonging to these different juridic persons. Consequently, any obligations which the canon asserts arise from free choice. No one, for example, can be forced to join a religious community. By the same analogy, an individual should not accept the responsibility for a directorship of a foundation if he/she cannot or will not abide by its statutes. Because juridic persons act in nomine Ecclesiae, external behavior must be perceived as compatible with the Church's moral position (c. 209, §1). For this reason, the statutes include a section on members: admission and separation.

The third paragraph indicates that statutes, once established and promulgated, acquire the force of law. If they are approved by competent ecclesiastical authority, they pertain to ecclesiastical law (e.g., c. 587). To this extent, then, statutes can be seen as an authentic source of law. In effect, however, the 1983 code does not indicate just who this "competent authority" might be. If we look to canon 312, §1, however, we find a legal analogue (c. 19) appropriate for this situation: (1) the Holy See for international groups, (2) the conference of bishops for national associations, and (3) the diocesan bishop for local organizations (cf. c. 352, §2).

So far, we have suggested that various associations make up their statutes and present them to competent authority for ecclesiastical approval (c. 322). Indeed, this seems to be the normal procedure, especially for those associations seeking status as private juridic persons (e.g., hospitals). On the other hand, the law recognizes other groupings where the competent ecclesiastical authority in effect imposes statutes on the organizations.

The diocesan bishop, for example, presides over the presbyteral council so that it cannot act apart from the bishop (c. 500, §3). Presumably, this means that he is responsible for its statutes (c. 496) in much the same way that he is responsible for those of the seminary (c. 239, §3). The code also refers to diocesan statutes (cc. 548, §1; 562) and to those for a diocesan pastoral council (c. 513, §1). There are associations of the clergy whose statutes recommend holiness (c. 278, §2). Admittedly, the code does not tell us explicitly who actually writes these statutes; despite this lacuna (c. 19), it seems perfectly clear that the diocesan bishop is responsible for approving them. So too with the different chapters, either cathedral or collegiate (c. 505). In this way, the Church ensures that various groups cannot call themselves "Catholic" until she says that they are (cc. 216, 300).

In the same way, the Apostolic See provides the statutes for a personal prelature (c. 295, §1); it approves those of the episcopal conference (c. 451) and the conference of major superiors (c. 709). Each ecclesiastical university and faculty must have its statutes approved by the Holy See (c. 816, §2). The code also provides statutes for shrines at every level: local, national, and international (c. 1232). All of this, then, emphasizes the obvious: the Church prefers the written over the unwritten.

Rules of Order

Canon 95 — §1. Rules of order (ordines) are rules or norms, which must be observed in meetings, whether convened by ecclesiastical authority or freely convoked by the Christian faithful, as well as in other celebrations. They define those things which pertain to the constitution, direction, and ways of proceeding.

§2. These rules of order bind those who participate in these assemblies or celebrations.

Rules of order govern meetings. As such, they facilitate whatever participation the statutes provide for the membership. Moreover, these rules may work at different levels. That is, although they must direct the business at a general meeting, they should be flexible enough to handle a smaller group of directors as well. As we have seen, certain administrative acts require a measure of consultation (c. 50) for their validity (c. 127). Meetings offer an ordinary means of securing this requirement. In order to ensure that these meetings bear fruit, experience (even in the secular sphere) shows that rules of order help.

Once again, the canon points to consensus as a practical norm for ensuring the validity of subsidiarity. Administrators do not really have to listen to every demagogue or dissident as if only the disruptive had access to information or answers. If people wish to participate in a consultative process, they freely accept the rules of order. If the rules of order were not obligatory, then legitimate disruption might seem to be a possible way of proceeding. Such rules, then, would oblige those who participate, for example, in diocesan synods, parish councils, and various chapter meetings. As the more experienced can testify, without such rules all too often these meetings can degenerate into something considerably less than Christian. The canon, therefore, looks very much like a prudential caution.

TITLE VI
PHYSICAL AND JURIDIC PERSONS
[cc. 96–123]

CHAPTER I
THE CANONICAL CONDITION OF PHYSICAL PERSONS
[cc. 96–112]

The Incarnational Principle

According to the incarnational principle, the concrete fact is more important than the abstract thought, the historical datum more significant than the theoretical explanation. The incarnation lends transcendence to the enfleshed immanence.

In this chapter, we learn that baptism produces two primary effects: (1) it incorporates a person into the Church of Christ and (2) it makes the individual a subject of duties and rights. Concretely, these depend on the person's state in life (cc. 207, 219). For all practical purposes, we find these duties and rights articulated in Book II. There we find the duties and rights proper to all Christians (cc. 208–223), those proper to the laity (cc. 224–231), those proper to the clergy (cc. 273–289), and those proper to religious (cc. 662–672). The responsibilities associated with the state in life render the individual person ever more physical in the Church. The complex and sensitive issue regarding the precise juridic effects of baptism on those who belong to the separated and reformed churches is a matter of dispute among canonists and remains unresolved.

Juridic Effects of Baptism

Canon 96 — By baptism one is incorporated into the Church of Christ and is constituted a person in it with the duties and rights which are proper to Christians in keeping with their condition, insofar as they are in ecclesiastical communion and unless a legitimately issued sanction stands in the way.

As a correlative to canon 204, which describes the spiritual effects of baptism, this canon defines the juridic effects of baptism. The sacrament of baptism grounds the complete incorporation of the individual in the Church and constitutes him/her a person.[1] Given the theological context of canon 204 and the spiritual imperative of canon 210, we are not talking about a naturalistic definition of "person," as found (for example) in Boethius, but a supernatural one, as found in St. Thomas Aquinas (STh 1.29.3). That is, the definition moves from substantia ("substance") to subsistens ("subsistent"). In this way, canon 96 marks an advance over canon 87 of the 1917 code. The baptized is not only incorporated into Christ but also invested with rights and obligations. This means that the individual must move from any passive stance to a position of active responsibility.[2] For all practical purposes, this is how the Church understands "person" today.

In order to emphasize the supernatural dimension of the person, the canon mentions three precise points: full communion in the Church (c. 205), a concrete state of life (cc. 207, 219), and the obligations and rights proper to that state of life. By definition, full communion excludes the catechumen (c. 206) and those baptized in the separated and reformed churches (c. 11). As for the state in life, the Church recognizes four: the single, the married, the religious, and the clerical. In effect, every baptized person has a concrete means by which to cooperate in achieving a personal salvation. The current code specifies various responsibilities appropriate to the different states of life. By living out the duties and rights proper to his or her state, the individual cooperates with grace and realizes his or her supernatural destiny. In this way, the canon relativizes the status and condition of the individual Christian. Nevertheless, baptism in the Catholic Church grounds the intelligibility of the Christian vocation.[3]

Baptism constitutes the juridic basis for making one a person in the Catholic Church. Even if the present code principally concerns relations between Catholics and different institutes within the Latin church, it also makes certain provisions for and concessions to non-Catholics. We can cite four separate instances. Relative to non-Catholics, canons 844; 1127, §1; 1142; 1183, §3; 1476; and 1549 surely apply. On the other hand, lack of ecclesial communion imposes certain restrictions, found, for example, in canons 874, §2 and 908. Moreover, non-Catholics are exempt from observing "merely ecclesiastical law" (cc. 11, 85). In addressing certain ecclesial concerns, the code consistently evinces an awareness of the pluralistic nature of contemporary culture (see, for example, cc. 748, §1; 383, §3; 463, §3; 844; 883, 2°; and 1124).

Finally, the present canon speaks to "a legitimately issued sanction." By definition, penalties are either expiatory or medicinal. Therefore, they may well limit the exercise of certain rights within the Church (c. 1312). Sanctions, in other words, militate against full communion.[4]

Does the Church specify the duties and rights of all of Christ's faithful? According to canons 208–223, it would seem so. That is, by reason of baptism, the faithful participate in the preaching, governing, and sanctifying office of Christ (c. 204, §1). So Book II, by delineating the duties and rights "proper to Christians," emphasizes those spiritual elements that describe the specifically Christian personality. It sets forth fairly systematically the effects of baptism. In addition to ecclesial communion in fact and in behavior (c. 209, §2), we find the call to personal holiness (c. 210). A need for spirituality (c. 214) underlies a concern for Christian education (c. 217) and a specific state of life (c. 219). While these responsibilities inhere in the sacrament of baptism, the Church does condition their exercise according to the norms of full communion and the common good (cc. 209, §1; 223). This provision pertains largely to those members who belong to the separated and reformed churches by reason of an "imperfect communion" (UR 3-a).

By referring to baptism as the sacrament which incorporates one "into the Church of Christ," the canon acknowledges the achievement of Vatican II. There, the conciliar fathers distinguished between "the Church of Christ" and the Catholic

[2] For this reading, see L. Örsy, "Interpretation in View of Action: A Quest for Clarity and Simplicity (Canon 96)," J 52 (1992) 587–597.

[3] The canon presupposes sacramental baptism with water as normative. It envisages neither martyrdom nor baptism by desire.

[4] On the other hand, J. Faris discusses the case of an excommunicate from the Orthodox Church received into full communion with the Catholic Church. See CLSA Advisory Opinions, 1984–1993, ed. P. Cogan (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1995) 15–17.

Church (LG 8-b). They went on to say that the Church of Christ subsists visibly in the Catholic Church (c. 204, §2). In this way they were able to concede to the separated and reformed churches genuine elements of sanctification and truth that promote both religion and devotion. This awareness grounds the seriousness which characterizes the ecumenical movement. In addition, these various gifts impart a dynamism which presses for the unity of the churches, the unity for which Christ himself prayed (Jn 17:21).

Age

Canon 97 — §1. A person who has completed the eighteenth year of age has reached majority; below this age, a person is a minor.

§2. A minor before the completion of the seventh year is called an infant and is considered not responsible for oneself (non sui compos). With the completion of the seventh year, however, a minor is presumed to have the use of reason.

Successive canons in this chapter will render our understanding of "physical person" more precise. The code presents five elements which qualify the status of persons in the Church: age, mental condition, residence, legal relationship, and rite. The first paragraph of this canon distinguishes the ages of majority and minority at eighteen; that is, eighteen years completed, putting the adult into his or her nineteenth year (c. 203). The second paragraph defines infants as those who have yet to reach seven years.[5] It also contains two presumptions of law: infants are incapable of acting responsibly, and minors are presumed to have the use of reason. As presumptions of law, they can be overturned by professional evaluations and other evidence. Nevertheless, the intent of the canon is to harmonize the provisions of ecclesiastical law with those of civil law (c. 22).

While Book I contains canons that make certain determinations regarding age, we find other provisions concerning age scattered throughout the code. For the most part, these concern certain responsibilities attached to states in life and various offices. The operative principle seems reasonable: the more difficult the undertaking, the greater the maturity required. The bishop, for example, must be thirty-five years of age (c. 378, §1, 3°), as also the married deacon (c. 1031, §2), and the diocesan administrator (c. 425, §1). According to law, the vicar general, the episcopal vicar (c. 478, §1), and the judicial vicar (c. 1420, §4) must be at least thirty years of age. A priest may be ordained at twenty-five (c. 1031, §1), and religious may make final profession at twenty-one (c. 658, 1°). The age of retirement usually follows local norms, but the code also makes its own recommendations (cc. 354; 401, §1; 538, §3). Most church provisions on age reflect a concern for the experience and maturity that should inform new responsibilities.[6]

Because the current code understands responsibility as essentially developmental, it provides great latitude to the minor. Ordinarily minors live with their parents or guardians (c. 98, §2) and remain subject to their authority. But the code also allows for the emancipated adolescent in the choice of domicile (c. 105, §1). We might think of a college student, for example, or a work situation. A minor can be admitted as a postulant or even as a novice (c. 643, §1, 1°) at seventeen years of age. And while the code avoids the use of "puberty" (except for c. 1096, §2) as a norm, it does permit marriage for a man at sixteen and a woman at fourteen (c. 1083, §1); still, canon 1072 advises customary law as a local norm, and canon 1071, §1, 6° cautions against the marriage of minors. At sixteen, minors can act as sponsors (c. 874, §1, 2°); they are also subject to ecclesiastical penalties (c. 1323, 1°). Again, at fourteen, under certain circumstances, minors can elect baptism in either the Eastern or Western church (c. 111, §2). They are also obliged to observe the law of fasting (c. 1252). Minors under fourteen can act as witnesses, provided that the judge deems it appropriate (c. 1550, §1). In these ways, the Church extends the areas of public accountability, enabling adolescent Christians to take responsibility for their actions within the Church.[7] Ecclesiastical law, therefore, recognizing the flexibility that accords to a developing Christian personality, makes responsibility relative to age.

[5] In his commentary on this canon, A. de Fuenmayor (following Michiels) calls this provision a presumption iuris et de iure, necessitated "for reasons of juridical certainty." See Pamplona ComEng, 123–124.

[6] For this developmental model, see St. Thomas Aquinas, STh. Supp. 43.2.

Majority

Canon 98 — §1. A person who has reached majority has the full exercise of his or her rights.

The first paragraph of this canon seems clear enough: on reaching their majority, adults in the Church are subject to duties and can exercise rights. Even if in the Church duties and rights are limited by one's state in life (e.g., sacred ministers and professed religious have voluntarily renounced certain rights), adult persons are free to exercise their Christian responsibilities by acting in their own name. One's precise status and condition in the Church will render these duties and rights increasingly concrete according to the incarnational principle.

Minority

§2. A minor, in the exercise of his or her rights, remains subject to the authority of parents or guardians except in those matters in which minors are exempted from their authority by divine law or canon law. In what pertains to the appointment of guardians and their authority, the prescripts of civil law are to be observed unless canon law provides otherwise or unless in certain cases the diocesan bishop, for a just cause, has decided to provide for the matter through the appointment of another guardian.

The second paragraph concerns minors, those persons between seven and eighteen years of age. Because they live with their parents, minors obey their parents' wishes. The canon, however, recognizes that both divine and canon law restrict parental authority. That is, minors can exercise provisions of both divine law (e.g., cc. 219; 852, §1; 1101, §2) and of canon law (e.g., cc. 851, 1072, 1550, §1). In effect, this norm encourages parents to form their children in the faith (c. 793, §1). Although the family as an institution seems to be challenged in so many ways today, we recall that the Church celebrates every year the Feast of the Holy Family, which suggests that our understanding of the Christian family belongs to revelation.

This canon also speaks of guardians. This provision originates in Roman law. As Gauthier remarks in his text on Roman law, "In classical law, guardianship of those children without a paterfamilias but below the age of puberty was an institution for the protection of such (boys under fourteen years old and girls under twelve)."[8] Even though the canon recognizes the priority of civil law, it assumes that the diocesan bishop can make another determination in specific cases and for a just reason by appointing another guardian. In fact and in law, this assumption seems to be false, despite the assertions of canons 1478 and 1479. Nevertheless, the bishop is to provide for guardianship insofar as he can, as a responsibility in faith, just as canons 1481, §3 and 1646, §3 make special provisions for minors in procedural matters. In other words, minors according to the provisions of law can place juridic acts through others who act on their behalf.

Mental Condition

Canon 99 — Whoever habitually lacks the use of reason is considered not responsible for oneself (non sui compos) and is equated with infants.

[7] For a commentary on this perception, see V. D'Souza, The Juridic Condition and Status of Minors according to the Code of Canon Law, unpublished dissertation (Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1992).

[8] A. Gauthier, Roman Law and Its Contribution to the Development of Canon Law (Ottawa: St. Paul University, 1996) 34.

This canon concerns insanity. It really has to do with natural law. That is, in order to perform a juridic act, the individual person must be rational (c. 11). As a matter of fact, it also pertains to divine law (c. 852, §2). To the extent that one habitually lacks the use of reason, he or she is considered incapable of exercising personal responsibility; this means that he or she cannot place either a moral or a juridic act such as orders (c. 1041, 1°) or marriage (c. 1095). Natural law requires the use of reason in order to assure imputability (cc. 1323, 6°; 1324, §1, 1°).[9]

Except for canon 777, 4°, the code does not usually refer to the physically or mentally handicapped. Nevertheless, those who are mentally handicapped have limited standing at law. Two consequences follow: (1) they cannot place a valid juridic act (c. 124, §1), and (2) they cannot commit a canonical crime (c. 1322). If they have occasion to appear in court, they do so through their curator (c. 1478, §1). It is possible that such individuals do have moments of lucidity. But because the law presumes as norms self-governance (cc. 187, 852, §2), full possession of faculties (cc. 922, 1006), and personal responsibility (c. 97, §2), those who do not meet these provisions are considered legally as infants.

The code recognizes insanity as a legal fact. Like its predecessor, the 1917 code, it refers to amentia (cc. 689, §3; 1044, §2, 2°; 1105, §4) as well as senility (c. 1004, §1). Although the law is not principally concerned with pathology, it respects a psychological continuum which moves from the insane to the sane. Modern treatments and more accurate diagnoses considerably improve the state of the mentally handicapped today. Even here, then, the presumption of law yields to contrary proof.

After having considered age and mental capacity, the code addresses residence or domicile in the following canons (cc. 100–107).

Residence

Canon 100 — A person is said to be: a resident (incola) in the place where the person has a domicile; a temporary resident (advena) in the place where the person has a quasi-domicile; a traveler (peregrinus) if the person is outside the place of a domicile or quasi-domicile which is still retained; a transient (vagus) if the person does not have a domicile or quasi-domicile anywhere.

This terminological canon defines persons in the Church in terms of domicile (ius domicilii). That is, it specifies the relationship between an individual person and a geographical place, thereby rendering the principle of territoriality (cc. 12, 13) very concrete. Following Roman law, the code recognizes four possibilities: the resident (incola), the newcomer (advena), the traveler (peregrinus), and the homeless (vagus). In other words, the kind of residence qualifies the exercise of duties and rights.

Realistically enough, the code accepts the fact of modern mobility, with possibilities ranging from second homes to refugee camps. For canonical purposes, the code is concerned largely with domicile and quasi-domicile. Domicile refers to the place of permanent residence. Classical canonists define this as the place where one spends most of his or her nights. Quasi-domicile refers to a second home, a place for business purposes or for recreation. Since people may very well have a plurality of domiciles, the canon asserts a juridic relationship between the person and a place—any place.

For the most part, domicile and quasi-domicile pertain to matters of both procedural law and substantive law. Relative to procedural law, for example, residence is relevant to such issues as entering a plea (cc. 1408; 1409, §2; 1504, 4°), witnesses in a trial (c. 1552, §1), competence for marriage cases (c. 1673), competence for the separation of spouses (c. 1694), and cases of a marriage ratum sed non consummatum (c. 1699, §1).

Residence also plays a part in substantive law. Domicile and quasi-domicile pertain not only to ecclesiastical laws (cc. 12, 13), but also to such matters as membership on the presbyteral council (c. 498, §2), the place of baptism (c. 857, §2), and the sacraments of penance (cc. 967, §2; 971), orders (c. 1016), and marriage (c. 1115).

Residence, therefore, understood either as domicile or quasi-domicile, clearly has juridic effects. As another manifestation of the incarnational principle, it concretizes our understanding of "person" in the Church.

Residence of Children and Neophytes

Canon 101 — §1. The place of origin of a child, even of a neophyte, is that in which the parents had a domicile or, lacking that, a quasi-domicile when the child was born or, if the parents did not have the same domicile or quasi-domicile, that of the mother.

§2. In the case of a child of transients, the place of origin is the actual place of birth; in the case of an abandoned child, it is the place where the child was found.

This canon is concerned with exceptional cases. Like its predecessor, canon 90 of the 1917 code, the first paragraph mentions "the place of origin." The revision committee included this phrase in order to indicate a proper bishop in the case of ordination.[10] But both Urrutia and Mendonça, commenting on canon 1016, find this determination irrelevant. Canonists generally agree that the concept has little juridical significance today.[11] We might say, then, that "the place of origin" does not mean the place of birth; it really refers to the parents' domicile or quasi-domicile.

A neophyte is a convert, a person baptized as an adult, somebody recently baptized. According to canon 1042, §3, a neophyte is simply impeded from orders. That is, the neophyte has to practice the faith for some years before being admitted to ordination. Three years seems to be a prudential norm.

The second paragraph concerns the children of homeless persons and children who are foundlings. In both instances, the law determines the place of origin. Should the parents or guardians later acquire a domicile or quasi-domicile, the child's place of origin does not change.

Unlike canon 93, §1 of the 1917 code, this canon distinguishes the residences of the two parents and acknowledges the possibility of separate domiciles for estranged spouses. Moreover, the canon favors the mother, thus establishing the basis for distinguishing between the actual place of residence and the legal domicile.

Domicile

Canon 102 — §1. Domicile is acquired by that residence within the territory of a certain parish or at least of a diocese, which either is joined with the intention of remaining there permanently unless called away or has been protracted for five complete years.

After having defined some effects of domicile and quasi-domicile, this canon states their immediate causes. Domicile involves two elements: (1) actual residence for five years or (2) residence with the intention of remaining permanently. While the institute looks backwards to the fundus, or an estate of a largely agrarian community, canonists today generally associate it with property and with business interests. These activities have a way of legitimating intent. Nevertheless, the canon states that both elements necessary for permanent residence have been adequately fulfilled after five full years of actual residence, which means that the law itself concedes domicile.[12]

[11] See, for example, J. García Martín, Le Norme Generali del Codex Iuris Canonici (Rome: Edizioni Istituto Giuridico Claretiano, 1996) 351.

[12] According to the Pio-Benedictine code (c. 92.1), the law granted domicile after a residence of ten years. See F. Cappello, Summa Iuris Canonici (Rome: Apud Aedes Universitatis Gregorianae, 1946) 1:156.

The canon allows for a certain flexibility, increasingly necessary in a mobile society. For this reason, the canon mentions "unless called away." Extrinsic circumstances, whether familial or economic, may qualify an original intent. Still, because the territorial principle is involved here (cc. 12, 13), intention is understood as both voluntary and actual. Consequently, an individual may have two permanent residences wherein he or she resides continuously and morally. For example, people may have real domicile in both the city and the country.

The formal intention to reside personally and permanently in a given place is determinative here. In effect, this means that domicile puts the individual in relationship to the local church, both to the parish and the diocese.[13] Accordingly, domicile signifies a communitarian context. That is, it represents the place wherein the individual Catholic is going to work out his or her salvation both historically and personally according to the responsibilities associated with the individual's proper state in life. For this reason, canonists see in these laws the value of stability. In ecclesiastical matters, residence also defines the place of competence (cc. 967, §2; 1115; 1408; 1413; 1673, 2°, 3°). Residence, then, clearly acts as a juridic determinant of "person" in the Church.

§2. Quasi-domicile is acquired by residence within the territory of a certain parish or at least of a diocese, which either is joined with the intention of remaining there for at least three months unless called away or has in fact been protracted for three months.

Quasi-domicile by definition means a temporary residence. Quasi-domicile depends on actual residence in a parish or diocese for three months or on residence with the intention of remaining at least three months. This situation affects (among others) students, civil servants, consultants, and even business executives. According to their individual situation, they can adapt their intention, which means that people today can also multiply quasi-domiciles. The institute, however, presupposes domicile, thereby setting up a dialectic between the stable and the transitional.

§3. A domicile or quasi-domicile within the territory of a parish is called parochial; within the territory of a diocese, even though not within a parish, diocesan.

Domicile and quasi-domicile place the individual in relationship to the particular church, whether it be the life of the Catholic campus, the local parish, or the diocese. This third paragraph distinguishes between parochial and diocesan domiciles. As a general rule, we say that the specific derogates from the generic (RI 34). While in practice the parish affiliation is more effective than the diocesan, the canon actually prefers the diocese. It also envisages those territories, equivalent to dioceses, which have not yet established parishes; these include a territorial prelature, an apostolic vicariate, and an apostolic prefecture (cf. c. 368). According to Cappello, however, in early law the notion of diocesan domicile or quasi-domicile was practically unknown.[14]

Domicile of Religious

Canon 103 — Members of religious institutes and societies of apostolic life acquire a domicile in the place where the house to which they are attached is located; they acquire a quasi-domicile in the house where they are residing, according to the norm of can. 102, §2.

Religious acquire legal domicile by the law itself. That is, according to the law itself as well as their own proper law, those in consecrated life and members of societies of apostolic life are expected to live in properly constituted houses (see [13] In his historical overview of domicile and quasi-domicile, G. Michiels relates these institutes to the sacramental life of the Church. See his Principia Generalia de Personis in Ecclesia (Tournai: Desclée, 1955) 107–116.

cc. 608; 665, §1; 740). The assignment itself, given by the appropriate superior, determines legal domicile. In fact, the person assigned to a house may be working elsewhere. Nevertheless, the assignment to a house of the institute constitutes domicile for the religious and for the member of a society of apostolic life. It does not require a time frame.

Moreover, the canon provides that religious and members of societies of apostolic life can acquire quasi-domicile according to the provision of canon 102, §2. They may, for example, attend university or require medical attention. Or they may help out in a missionary area. If they reside there for three full months, the law itself gives them quasi-domicile.

This provision can occasion a difficulty for religious priests. If they lack confessional faculties in the place of their assigned house, they must secure faculties for hearing confessions (c. 967, §2) in the diocese of quasi-domicile. That is, new faculties must be obtained from a local ordinary (c. 969, §1).[15] Otherwise, they may exercise the sacrament of reconciliation only within their own houses according to the provision of proper law (cc. 967, §3; 968, §2; 969, §2). Moreover, because members of societies of apostolic life are incardinated into their own society (unless their constitutions provide otherwise), they too are subject to this same procedure (c. 736, §1). This provision, however, does not apply to any clerical members of secular institutes because their priests are already incardinated in a particular church (c. 715, §1). In this way, the Church regulates the relationship between the pontifical institute and the local community, between the universal and the local church.

Domicile of Marriage Partners

Canon 104 — Spouses are to have a common domicile or quasi-domicile; by reason of legitimate separation or some other just cause, both can have their own domicile or quasi-domicile.

This canon makes a new provision for the current law of the Church. Unlike its predecessor (CIC 93, §1), this stipulation allows each of the spouses in marriage to have separate domiciles or quasi-domiciles. Undoubtedly, it derives from the new understanding of marriage as a partnership of life (c. 1055, §1). The partners share equally in establishing this community (c. 1135), which obliges them to a common life (c. 1151). Under normal circumstances, this entails a common domicile, which the canon acknowledges and mandates. What the canon abrogates is the notion of the necessary domicile, which previously obliged the wife to the domicile of the husband. Accordingly, for a just reason (including, but not necessarily, separation) either partner can establish his or her own domicile or quasi-domicile. In the case of a partner's abuse, adultery, or divorce (c. 1153, §1), the other partner may lawfully claim another residence. As a matter of fact, it may be practical to do so simply for economic or business reasons. This canon indicates a certain gender equality (e.g., cc. 208, 606) evident today in the universal law of the Church.

Domicile of Minors

Canon 105 — §1. A minor necessarily retains the domicile and quasi-domicile of the one to whose power the minor is subject. A minor who is no longer an infant can also acquire a quasi-domicile of one's own; a minor who is legitimately emancipated according to the norm of civil law can also acquire a domicile of one's own.

This canon speaks to the necessary domicile of minors. Consonant with the provisions of canon 98, §2, this canon provides that minors derive their legal residence from their parents or guardians. Depending on circumstances, however, it allows for a plurality of domiciles and quasi-domiciles. It acknowledges that a minor over seven can acquire quasi-domicile, by going away to school, for example. Moreover, once he or she has left home, that is, has become emancipated according to the norms of civil law, then the minor acquires domicile according to the provisions of canon 102.

§2. Whoever for some other reason than minority has been placed legitimately under the guardianship or care of another has the domicile and quasi-domicile of the guardian or curator.

Those who habitually lack the use of reason (c. 99) also retain the necessary or involuntary domicile of their curators. As guardians look to the welfare of minors, so curators defend the rights of the mentally impaired. This provision, established by the law itself, represents another form of legal domicile, one which easily accords with both natural and moral law and reflects the potestas dominativa associated with the earlier code (cf. CIC 501, §1).

Loss of Domicile

Canon 106 — Domicile and quasi-domicile are lost by departure from a place with the intention of not returning, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 105.

This canon simply reverses the provisions of canon 102, §1. That is, it includes two elements: (1) the actual departure from a place and (2) the intention not to return. In other words, mere departure does not mean the loss of domicile. Why not? As an acquired right (ius domicilii), domicile requires a strict interpretation according to canon 36, §1. Moreover, since the departure is physically evident, e.g., when one moves the whole household, it points to a permanent arrangement; we are not talking therefore of a tourist or a visitor. The loss of domicile thus includes both actual departure and an actual intention not to return, placed simultaneously.

On the other hand, the law also protects necessary domicile. But this status is also relative, subject to change. That is, the minor attains his majority, the insane gain the use of reason, and the religious transfers to another house.

Pastor and Ordinary

Canon 107 — §1. Through both domicile and quasi-domicile, each person acquires his or her pastor and ordinary.

§2. The proper pastor or ordinary of a transient is the pastor or local ordinary where the transient is actually residing.

§3. The proper pastor of one who has only a diocesan domicile or quasi-domicile is the pastor of the place where the person is actually residing.

This canon explains the juridic effects of domicile. It places the individual person in relationship to the pastor of a specific parish and to a diocesan bishop. As ecclesiastical superiors, they have responsibility for assuring the teaching, sanctifying, and governing offices of the particular church.

Although the canon mentions transients (c. 107, §2), it also mentions quasi-domicile, which includes travelers (c. 107, §1). In effect, every one of the Christifideles without exception has both a parish priest and an ordinary. Since this relationship belongs to the constitutive law of the Church, it is not liable to dispensation (c. 86).

After having presented the canons on domicile and its juridical effects, the code turns next to relationships, the fourth determinant of what it means to be a physical person in the Church. It speaks to parentage, whether by kinship or by adoption; to relatives, either by marriage or quasi-affinity; and to rite, either by baptism or by choice. These legal relationships render the person ever more concretely so within the communion that we recognize as Church.

Blood Relationships

Canon 108 — §1. Consanguinity is computed through lines and degrees.

§2. In the direct line there are as many degrees as there are generations or persons, not counting the common ancestor.

§3. In the collateral line there are as many degrees as there are persons in both the lines together, not counting the common ancestor.

Consanguinity, as the etymology suggests, involves a blood relationship between two persons, effected by sexual intercourse or copula perfecta. It does not occur by any blood transfusion. In general, when children have the same parents, we have bilateral consanguinity, which establishes a bond between persons descending from the same parents through carnal generation. The canon, therefore, grounds consanguinity not in marriage but in generation, whether the parents are married or not. So the principle of perfect carnal copula prescinds from any moral considerations. It recognizes only the act, licit or not, by which the bloodline flows from one person to another.

According to this canon, the current code computes consanguinity by lines and degrees. There are two lines: the direct (e.g., father and son, grandmother and granddaughter) and the collateral (brother and sister, aunt and nephew, cousins). In both, individual persons are related to one another through a common ancestor (stipes). Degree measures the closeness or distance of these relationships. In the direct line, the computation of degree is made by counting the acts of generation between the persons or counting the number of persons, then subtracting the common ancestor (e.g., father and son are related in the first degree, grandmother and granddaughter in the second). In the collateral line, degree is computed by counting all the persons on both sides from the common ancestor and subtracting the ancestor (e.g., brother and sister are related in the second degree, aunt and nephew in the third degree, and first cousins in the fourth degree). These mathematics become important in any consideration of the matrimonial impediment (c. 1091).[16]

[16] Important considerations are also raised in connection with dispensations from the impediment. See the instruction of the Congregation of Sacraments of August 1, 1931 (CLD 1, 514–516) and more recently the rescript of Pope Paul VI to the CDF of January 21, 1977 (Leges Ecclesiae 5:7288).

The previous code depended on the Germanic mode of calculation, introduced by Alexander II (1065) and confirmed by Gregory IX (1230). For the sake of clarity, the revision committee reversed this in favor of the Roman method of computation,[17] which accords more easily with the provisions of civil law and those of the Eastern churches (e.g., CCEO 918).

As a juridic fact, consanguinity effects certain limitations evident throughout the code: (1) it excludes from specific ecclesiastical offices (cc. 478, §2; 492, §3); (2) it acts as an impediment to marriage (cc. 1091, 1092); (3) it prohibits the sale or lease of ecclesiastical property to certain persons (c. 1298); (4) it prevents the judge, the promoter of justice, the defender of the bond, the assessor, and the auditor from undertaking certain cases (c. 1448); and (5) it exempts one from testifying under certain circumstances (c. 1548, §2, 2°). For most practical purposes, the fourth degree of consanguinity in the collateral line remains normative.

Relationships Resulting from Marriage

Canon 109 — §1. Affinity arises from a valid marriage, even if not consummated, and exists between a man and the blood relatives of the woman and between the woman and the blood relatives of the man.

Affinity describes the relationship that arises from a canonically valid marriage, whether natural or sacramental, whether consummated or not. The relationship is only between the husband and the blood relatives of the wife, and between the wife and the blood relatives of the husband. For example, there is no relationship of affinity between the husband's brother and the wife's sister.

As a juridic bond, with roots in Roman law, affinity is perceived as perpetual. That is, it does not cease with the death of one spouse. Since it pertains only to the blood relations of each of the spouses, it acts as a limited concept in law. In other words, despite the concept of the extended family, relatives do not really become related to relatives. This is the meaning behind the adage Affinitas non gignit affinitatem.

§2. It is so computed that those who are blood relatives of the man are related in the same line and degree by affinity to the woman, and vice versa.

Because they do not have lines and degrees of themselves, relationships of affinity are computed like those of consanguinity. The principle, however, remains the same: count the persons. So, in the direct line and first degree, we find a mother-in-law and sons-in-law, a stepfather and a step-daughter. In the collateral line, the second degree includes brothers- and sisters-in-law. Only affinity in the direct line is a matrimonial impediment (c. 1092).

As in the case of consanguinity, so in the case of affinity, the following canons apply: canons 478, §2; 492, §3; 1091; 1092; 1298; 1448; 1548 §2, 2°. The question arises as to whether the impediment of affinity is of divine and natural law, or of merely ecclesiastical law. Current canonical opinion agrees that the impediment of affinity really belongs to ecclesiastical law, which the Church takes very seriously indeed. We see this in the reply of the Holy Office on January 31, 1957, which makes the impediment retroactive (CLD 4, 89). On the other hand, we also find an exception in granting a dispensation from canon 1092 by the Sacred Congregation for the Sacraments (CLD 11, 265–266). Still, these decisions seem to confirm the opinion that affinity involves a merely legal relationship between people, reflected equally in canon 919 of the Eastern code. Admittedly, a quasi-affinity gives rise to the impediment of public propriety (c. 1093). Yet, on the other hand, the sponsor at baptism (c. 872) accepts de facto and de iure a spiritual relationship (CIC 1079) which is no longer an impediment to marriage.

Adoption

Canon 110 — Children who have been adopted according to the norm of civil law are considered the children of the person or persons who have adopted them.

Since the code really has no mechanism or procedure in place to secure the institute of adoption, the Church defers to civil legislation (c. 22). In the previous code, the canons on adoption (CIC 1059, 1080) are found among the canons concerned with marriage impediments. In this respect, the code was following the provisions of civil law (cf. CLD 8, 634–635). While the code commission wanted to follow civil law procedures in order to secure the fact of adoption, it did not want to canonize the merely civil effects of adoption. Consequently, we find two canons on adoption: canon 110 on the fact of adoption and canon 1094 on its consequence for marriage.

Adoption arises from a legal bond whereby one takes the child (or adult) as one's own with all the rights and duties which would have existed had the child (or adult) been one's own originally. Hence, canon 1094 speaks of "a legal relationship." By mentioning "person or persons," canon 110 allows for single-parent adoptions and same-sex adoptions. It does not specify any age limit. Because the Church acknowledges that adopted children belong to the person or persons who legally adopted them, the juridic effects parallel those of the natural family.

According to canon 877, §3, the episcopal conference is to set norms concerning the baptismal registration of adopted children. How are their baptisms to be recorded (cf. c. 535, §2)? On July 22, 1988 the National Conference of Catholic Bishops promulgated a complementary norm on this.[18] The legislation of other conferences is also available (cf. CLD 11, 193–199).

For the most part, the juridic consequences of adoption fall to the adopting parent or parents: (1) relative to status (cc. 98, §2;, 105, §1); (2) to Catholic formation (cc. 774, §2; 793; 796–798; 868, §1, 2°); (3) to the sacramental life of the Church (cc. 851, 2°; 855; 867; 890; 914; 1071, §1, 6°; 1136; 1183, §2); and (4) to church discipline (cc. 1252, 1366).

Rite

Canon 111 — §1. Through the reception of baptism, the child of parents who belong to the Latin Church is enrolled in it, or, if one or the other does not belong to it, both parents have chosen by mutual agreement to have the offspring baptized in the Latin Church. If there is no mutual agreement, however, the child is enrolled in the ritual Church to which the father belongs.

§2. Anyone to be baptized who has completed the fourteenth year of age can freely choose to be baptized in the Latin Church or in another ritual Church sui iuris; in that case, the person belongs to the Church which he or she has chosen.

Through the reception of baptism (cc. 96, 204), an individual becomes a member of the Latin church (c. 1), provided that the parents belong to the Western church. The Latin church constitutes a ritual church sui iuris, and affiliation with it does not occur by free choice but by means of the norms stipulated in these canons. Although the Latin church acknowledges rites other than the Roman, such as the Ambrosian in Milan (dating from approximately 537) and the Mozarabic in Toledo (dating from approximately 808), neither of these constitutes a ritual church sui iuris. So, for all practical purposes, the canon is concerned with the Eastern Catholic churches.

Canon 111 deals with three situations: (1) the child under fourteen years of age who is baptized, (2) the person over fourteen who receives baptism, and (3) transfer from one rite to another after baptism.

In the first situation, if both parents belong to the Latin rite, so too does the child. If only one parent belongs to the Latin rite, so too does the child, provided that both parents agree. If they do not agree, then the child follows the father's rite, according to long-standing tradition. (Canon 29 of the Eastern code also favors the rite of the father, but permits the child to be enrolled in the mother's ritual church if both parents agree. In the case of an unwed mother, the Eastern code allows the child to follow the mother's rite.)

Hence, ritual enrollment and membership normally conform to the rite of baptism, so that the rite of baptism determines ritual affiliation; baptism acts as a practical norm.[19] However, Eastern rite Catholics have sometimes accepted Latin rite baptism for their children out of necessity (e.g., when no church of their rite is anywhere around) or by mistake (e.g., having lost contact with their ritual heritage) or based on their own preference. In such cases, the child actually belongs to the rite in which it should have been baptized in accord with this canon. In other words, neither practical necessities nor natural assimilation effects a transfer from one rite to another. A de facto baptism, when it takes place contrary to the canon, does not create a de iure ritual membership.[20] Consequently, the baptismal rites by themselves do not constitute an absolute norm of ritual membership.

The first paragraph of the canon presents a restrictive norm. Suppose we find a Latin father and an Eastern mother. If both parents agree, can the child be baptized in the Eastern rite? The canon does not permit this. If they both agree, it must be in the Latin church. In no case can parents ascribe their children to a ritual church sui iuris other than that to which at least one of them belongs.

The second paragraph allows any candidate for baptism who has completed his or her fourteenth year (c. 203) the freedom to choose his or her own ritual church. We find the same provision in canon 30 of the Eastern code. Admittedly, paragraph two of canon 111 suggests that the baptismal rite also identifies the ritual church sui iuris. As a universal norm, this provision admits of no exception. That is, it prevails also in missionary countries. It applies equally to those invalidly or doubtfully baptized. Baptized non-Catholics who wish to convert to Catholicism enjoy the same freedom.

[19] See F. Urrutia, De normis generalibus: Adnotationes in Codicem: Liber I (Rome: Pontificia Universitas Gregoriana, 1983) 69.

[20] This position is expressed in CLD 1, 85, confirmed in CLD 3, 302, and repeated in RR 1993, 11–14.

A family may wish to support a variety of rites. For example, in the Ukrainian tradition, the girls follow the mother's rite, and the boys follow that of the father. While this arrangement may prove acceptable theoretically, others dispute its practical wisdom. Since the family, according to Pope Paul VI, acts as "the domestic church," there is much to be said for unity of rite. In other words, multiple rites can act as a source of familial discord.

Change of Rite

Canon 112 — §1. After the reception of baptism, the following are enrolled in another ritual Church sui iuris:

1° a person who has obtained permission from the Apostolic See;

2° a spouse who, at the time of or during marriage, has declared that he or she is transferring to the ritual Church sui iuris of the other spouse; when the marriage has ended, however, the person can freely return to the Latin Church;

3° before the completion of the fourteenth year of age, the children of those mentioned in nn. 1 and 2 as well as, in a mixed marriage, the children of the Catholic party who has legitimately transferred to another ritual Church; on completion of their fourteenth year, however, they can return to the Latin Church.

This canon concerns the transfer of rite. It can be accomplished in one of three ways. First, the Apostolic See can grant permission (licentia) for Latin Catholics to be enrolled in another autonomous ritual church. However, the transfer of an Eastern Catholic to the Latin rite requires for validity consent (consensus) of both the eparchial bishop and the diocesan bishop (CCEO 32, §2).[21] In such a case, the canon presumes the consent of the Apostolic See.[22] Nevertheless, the burden of this canon falls on the Latin Catholic who wishes to transfer to another autonomous church. This norm derives quite exactly from Orientalium Ecclesiarum (no. 460).

Second, a Latin spouse before or during marriage to an Eastern Catholic may declare his or her intention to transfer to the spouse's rite. While this canon treats both spouses as equals, canon 33 of the Eastern code reflects the older discipline, which allows only the woman to transfer. This difference in discipline makes inter-ritual marriage a fairly sensitive issue.[23] The intention to affiliate to one's spouse's rite requires a public declaration. Using canon 1126 by way of analogy, we understand that this declaration must be made before an appropriate pastor and put in writing. Pius XII would insist on two witnesses as well. Moreover, according to canon 526, §2, the baptismal register must be so annotated. Once the marriage is dissolved, however, either by death or annulment, the spouse is free to return to the Latin church. Nevertheless, the perception here is quite clear: because ascription to a ritual church is definitive, it belongs to the status of persons. Consequently, affiliation is understood as belonging to constitutive law and not merely to disciplinary law (cf. CLD 9, 51). According to Pastor bonus 58 the Congregation for the Eastern Churches is competent to judge the status of persons relative to rite. In practice, it is easier for a Latin Catholic to affiliate with an Eastern church than for an Eastern Catholic to transfer to the Latin rite (cf. RR 1995, 28–31).

[22] See, for example, J. Abbass, Two Codes in Comparison (Rome: Pontificio Istituto Orientale, 1997) 287.

[23] For the disparity between the different disciplines, see V. Pospishil, Eastern Catholic Church Law, 2nd rev. ed. (New York: St. Maron Publications, 1996) 118–119.

Third, children who are born into an inter-ritual marriage generally follow the rite of their parents (CLD 5, 7–8). Children of mixed marriages follow the rite of the Catholic party. When the children have completed their fourteenth birthday, they are free to choose a proper rite. Since the law does not specify any time frame, they can exercise this option at any time (cf. RR 1994, 155–157). The provision is compatible with canon 111, §2; we find a correlative in canon 34 of the Eastern code. Any transfer, however, requires an appropriate declaration and annotation (c. 535, §2).

§2. The practice, however prolonged, of receiving the sacraments according to the rite of another ritual Church sui iuris does not entail enrollment in that Church.

Ascription to an autonomous ritual church requires a formal recognition and declaration. It does not occur by osmosis, by custom, or by regular attendance at liturgical events. Even prolonged practice does not effect a change in membership (cf. CCEO 38). Nevertheless, the code is flexible enough to provide for the spiritual needs of the faithful. So the Christifideles are free to receive most of the sacraments fruitfully in any Catholic rite: baptism (c. 861, §2), confirmation (cc. 882, 887), Eucharist (cc. 923, 1248, §1), reconciliation (c. 991), and anointing (cc. 1003, §2; 1004, §1). In effect, the canon distinguishes membership from liturgical practice.[24] This means that change of ritual church membership occurs in one of the three ways provided for in paragraph one.

Finally, the code provides additional norms relating to the faithful of other rites. The diocesan bishop, in the first place, is directly charged with their pastoral care (c. 383, §2). We also find the possibility of erecting a personal parish based on rite (c. 518). The bishop is free to appoint an episcopal vicar to supervise different rites (cc. 383, §2; 476). The law distinguishes dimissorial letters according to rite (c. 1021). Priests validly assist at local marriages in which one of the parties is of the Latin rite (c. 1109). Canon 846, §2 obliges ministers to celebrate the sacraments according to their own rite. An instruction from the Congregation of Bishops urges diocesan bishops to provide for the spiritual needs of emigrants of different rites (CLD 7: 198, 207, 210). These provisions acknowledge that the Church is a vital communion with a rich diversity of traditions, as was taught by the fathers in the Vatican II Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches.

In general, this chapter treats the physical person in terms of substance (i.e., subsistens). Later canons in Book II will relate the individual to appropriate activities in the Church. By putting the person in motion, as it were, the code discloses a fairly complete Christian anthropology.[25]

JURIDIC PERSONS
[cc. 113–123]

Apostolic undertakings often transcend the abilities and life span of individual natural persons and require the combined efforts of many persons continuing over long periods of time. To afford continuity and stability, the legal system of the Church, like other legal systems, creates artificial entities known as juridic persons on which the law confers certain rights, such as the right to own property, the right to enter into contracts, and the right to sue, and imposes certain obligations, such as regard for the common good, accountability to ecclesiastical authority, and liability for debts and for the faithful fulfillment of the intentions of donors. Such entities include dioceses, episcopal conferences, parishes, institutes of consecrated life, societies of apostolic life, seminaries, and some colleges, universities, hospitals, and other educational, charitable, or apostolic endeavors. To aid in adequately understanding the nature and functioning of such entities, the code offers general norms regarding the creation of juridic persons (cc. 114, 117), the major classifications among them (cc. 115, 116), the natural persons who are to represent and act in the name of a juridic person (c. 118), decision-making in juridic persons (c. 119), the termination of juridic persons (c. 120), and the distribution of the assets and liabilities of a juridic person upon its consolidation (c. 121), its division (c. 122), and its extinction (c. 123).

Moral and Juridic Persons

Canon 113 — §1. The Catholic Church and the Apostolic See have the character of a moral person by divine ordinance itself.

§2. In the Church, besides physical persons, there are also juridic persons, that is, subjects in canon law of obligations and rights which correspond to their nature.

This canon acknowledges the existence of three categories of persons in the Church: natural (physical), moral, and juridic. While the notion of a natural person may be considered self-evident, the notions of moral and juridic persons are not. As so often is the case with technical terminology, however, the code offers no definitions, leaving the matter of definition to canonical jurisprudence.

A moral person is a group or succession of natural persons who are united by a common purpose and, hence, who have a particular relationship to each other and who, because of that relationship, may be conceived of as a single entity. A moral person is what we refer to when we speak of a team, a university class, an association. It is a mental construct, a collectivity thought of as a single entity, but an entity which does not exist, and cannot be conceived of, apart from the people who compose it. One can speak of a moral person having rights and obligations, but they are the cumulative rights and obligations of the members of the group.[1] Since a moral person is a group or collectivity, it may properly be referred to in the plural: "they," "them," "theirs." A moral person precedes, logically and usually chronologically, the establishment of a corresponding juridic person.

Analogously, a moral person may also be understood as an accumulation or mass of material goods or assets which have been set aside for a common purpose and which, therefore, can be conceived of as a single entity, as, for example, a fund, such as a pension, building, or other restricted fund. A fund is a mental construct, a collectivity thought of as a single entity but an entity which does not exist, even in the mind, apart from the assets which compose it. Since such a moral person is a collectivity, it may properly be referred to in the plural: "those." Such a moral person precedes, logically and usually chronologically, the establishment of a corresponding juridic person (known as a foundation).

A juridic person, on the other hand, is an artificial person, distinct from all natural persons or material goods, constituted by competent ecclesiastical authority for an apostolic purpose, with a capacity for continuous existence and with canonical rights and duties like those of a natural person (e.g., to own property, enter into contracts, sue or be sued) conferred upon it by law or by the authority which constitutes it.[2] Like a civil-law corporation, it is a legal construct which can and must be conceived of apart from the natural persons who constitute it, administer it, or for whose benefit it exists.[3] It is not a group or collectivity and may properly be referred to only in the impersonal singular: "it." The establishment of a juridic person follows, logically and usually chronologically, the formation of an underlying moral person, either a group of natural persons or an accumulation of material goods, which serves as the substratum or basis in reality of the juridic person. Of its nature, a juridic person is perpetual and, once established, it can outlast all natural persons or material goods which formed its substratum (see c. 120, §1).

In canon 113, §1, the Catholic Church and the Apostolic See are each said to have the nature of a moral person by divine institution. Affirmation of divine origin makes clear that here the Apostolic See refers only to the papacy, not to the conglomerate of congregations, secretariats, councils, tribunals, and other offices that constitute the Roman Curia (see c. 361). By divine institution the Catholic Church is a group, and the papacy a succession, of natural persons united by a common purpose and conceived of as a single entity. Classification as moral persons distinguishes the Catholic Church and Apostolic See from juridic persons, which are creations of ecclesiastical authority, and affirmation of the divine origin of the Catholic Church and Apostolic See distinguishes them from other moral persons, such as associations of the faithful or funds, which are of human origin.[4]

Canon 113, §2, while affirming the existence of natural (physical) and juridic persons, makes no further mention of moral persons, such as those of human origin of which there are a great number in the Church. This is regrettable, because it leaves Book I of the code without an explicit synthesis of all categories of persons in the Church. The existence of moral persons of human institution is, of course, implied in paragraph one, as it is in other canons of this chapter,[5] in the canons on private associations of the faithful which have not been erected as juridic persons,[6] and in various other canons.[7] There are also numerous de facto groups of natural persons which have been formed, without official recognition, to pursue various apostolic works pursuant to the right of the Christian faithful to associate for apostolic purposes;[8] these de facto groups or associations also come within the meaning of moral person.

Canonists trained under the 1917 code may find this terminology unfamiliar and perhaps confusing. While in canon 113 the 1983 code acknowledges three categories of persons, the parallel canon in the 1917 code spoke of only two, natural (physical) and moral.[9] The 1917 code used the term "moral person" not only of the Catholic Church and Apostolic See, as does the present code, but also to signify what the present code more precisely calls "juridic persons," namely, entities constituted by ecclesiastical authority.[10] The 1917 code did use the term "juridic person," but only three times,[11] and in each instance the context made it clear that "juridic person" was being used synonymously with "moral person."[12] The 1983 code more clearly distinguishes artificial persons (juridic persons constituted by ecclesiastical authority) from groups of persons or accumulations of assets not brought into existence by ecclesiastical authority (moral persons), and among the latter distinguishes moral persons of divine institution (the Catholic Church and Apostolic See) from moral persons of human origin, such as various de facto associations or funds.[13]

Creation of Juridic Persons

Canon 114 — §1. Juridic persons are constituted either by the prescript of law or by special grant of competent authority given through a decree. They are aggregates of persons (universitates personarum) or of things (universitates rerum) ordered for a purpose which is in keeping with the mission of the Church and which transcends the purpose of the individuals.

§2. The purposes mentioned in §1 are understood as those which pertain to works of piety, of the apostolate, or of charity, whether spiritual or temporal.

§3. The competent authority of the Church is not to confer juridic personality except on those aggregates of persons (universitates personarum) or things (universitates rerum) which pursue a truly useful purpose and, all things considered, possess the means which are foreseen to be sufficient to achieve their designated purpose.

The primary focus of this canon is on the creation of juridic persons. Paragraph one provides for two alternative modes of creation: by operation of law (a iure) and by decree of competent authority (ab homine). Paragraph two sets forth the proper purposes for which juridic persons can be created. Paragraph three requires of ecclesiastical authority an informed judgment of the usefulness of the purpose of a proposed juridic person in the light of other endeavors addressing the same or similar needs in the area, and also an informed judgment of the adequacy of resources available to the proposed juridic person for the fulfillment of its purpose.

Although neither this nor any other canon uses the term "creation" in regard to the origin of a juridic person, the term, at least in English, would seem best to describe what is happening, namely, bringing into existence something (an artificial person) that has not existed before and that is not comprised of previously existing components. Some canons, like paragraph one of canon 114, speak of juridic persons being "constituted," while others speak of their being "erected."[14] Each of these terms connotes bringing an entity into existence. Paragraph three of canon 114, however, speaks of juridic personality being "conferred," and other canons speak of it being "given,"[15] "granted,"[16] "obtained,"[17] "acquired,"[18] "possessed,"[19] all of which suggest that juridic personality is not the creation of something new, but simply a juridic enhancement of something already existing. Reconciliation of these apparently conflicting notions is afforded by the realization of the relationship that exists between a juridic person, which is an artificial person, and the moral person which precedes it and serves as its substratum or basis in reality.

Prior to (or, rarely, simultaneous with) the creation of a juridic person, it is necessary that there exist a moral person—either a group of natural persons committed to some apostolic purpose, or an accumulation of material goods set aside for an apostolic purpose—to serve as the substratum or basis in reality for the artificial personality of the juridic person. Some authors refer to such a group of persons or assemblage of goods as the material constitutive element of a juridic person (to which must be joined the formal constitutive element of authoritative conferral of juridic personality).[20] Referring to a group of persons or assemblage of goods as a constitutive element of a juridic person, however, ignores the fact that, once established, a juridic person can continue in existence (for as long as one hundred years) without any natural persons or material assets being associated with it (see c. 120, §1). For that reason, it seems less confusing and more accurate to forego the language of constitutive elements when speaking of the group of natural persons or assemblage of material goods which must logically (and usually chronologically) precede the creation of a juridic person, and refer to them instead as the basis in reality or substratum of the newly created juridic person.[21]

Also prior to the creation of a juridic person is the need to draft and obtain approval of the statutes that are to serve as its internal governing document, much like the articles of incorporation and by-laws of a civil-law corporation. In most instances, many of the provisions of such statutes will already have been drafted for the internal governance of the moral person which has preceded and which is to be the substratum of the juridic person; some changes may be necessary, but most provisions should be readily transferable to statutes for the juridic person. No juridic person is to be created without prior approval of its statutes (c. 117). Regrettably, this law of the Church seems not always to be followed by those responsible for the coming into existence of such juridic persons as parishes, which often appear to be lacking statutes altogether.

As noted above, the actual conferral of juridic personality, which always requires the action of competent ecclesiastical authority (see commentary on c. 113), can be either a iure or ab homine. With only one exception, the 1983 code is consistently explicit in its a iure conferral of juridic personality upon such entities as dioceses (c. 373), parishes (c. 515, §3), religious institutes and each of their provinces and individual houses (c. 634, §1), societies of apostolic life and, unless their constitutions provide otherwise, their parts and houses (c. 741, §1), seminaries (c. 238, §1), ecclesiastical provinces (c. 432, §2), episcopal conferences (c. 449, §2), and public associations of the faithful (c. 313). The one exception occurs in regard to secular institutes. No canon explicitly confers juridic personality upon secular institutes. In providing that the administration of the temporal goods of a secular institute is governed by the norms of Book V of the code, however, canon 718 implicitly confers juridic personality upon secular institutes for, while a few canons in Book V govern the goods of natural persons (see, e.g., cc. 1269, 1300), the vast majority of canons in Book V govern the temporal goods only of juridic persons (see c. 1257).

Entities in the Church such as colleges, universities, hospitals, and other apostolically oriented institutions can also serve as the substrata of juridic persons, but juridic personality is not conferred upon such institutions a iure. It can be conferred only by decree of competent ecclesiastical authority. While the 1917 code designated local ordinaries as the authorities competent to grant such a decree,[22] the present code contains no explicit designation of competent authority in this regard. Recourse may be had, however, to canon 312, the immediate purpose of which is to designate authorities competent to establish public associations of the faithful but which, in conjunction with canons 313 and 322, affords a solid basis for identifying authorities competent to create all juridic persons as well. Canon 313 provides that all public associations of the faithful are ipso facto juridic persons; canon 322 states that a private association of the faithful can acquire juridic personality by decree of the same competent authority mentioned in canon 312 for public associations. Thus, juridic persons which have an association of the faithful, public or private, as their underlying substratum can, according to canon 312, be created by decree of the Holy See, or an episcopal conference, or a diocesan bishop, or, with consent of the diocesan bishop, by others acting pursuant to apostolic privilege.

In the absence of any other canon indicating competence for the issuance of a decree conferring juridic personality, it would seem appropriate to look to canon 312, by analogy, for the designation of authorities competent to issue decrees conferring juridic personality upon any entity, including those which do not have officially recognized associations of the faithful as their substrata, such as foundations, the substrata of which are accumulations of material goods, or de facto associations of the faithful which, prior to seeking juridic personality, have not sought or received official recognition by ecclesiastical authority.

Confining competence for the creation of juridic persons to the Holy See, episcopal conference, and diocesan bishop is in keeping with canonical tradition which has required episcopal power for the conferral of juridic personality, since such conferral affects the public order of the Church by creating new subjects of canonical rights and obligations.[23] The requirement of a decree, the issuance of which is an act of executive power of governance,[24] is also strongly indicative of episcopal or at least quasi-episcopal power.

While the principal focus of canon 114 is on the creation of juridic persons, a subordinate clause in paragraph one introduces the first of the major distinctions among categories of juridic persons, the distinction between an universitas personarum (translated as "aggregate of persons") and an universitas rerum (translated as "aggregate of things"). Since this distinction becomes the principal focus of canon 115, commentary on the distinction and on its translation into English is deferred to the commentary on canon 115.

Paragraph one of canon 114 also draws attention to the necessary congruity between the purpose of any ecclesial juridic person and the mission of the Church, which is given added

Many Catholic colleges, universities, hospitals, and other institutions have been founded by religious institutes, clerical and non-clerical. Without an apostolic privilege, however, no major superior of a religious institute could have created such an institution as a juridic person while the 1917 code was in effect, for erection as a juridic person was reserved to local ordinaries (CIC 1489, §1; 686, §2; 687). Though some major superiors were ordinaries (CIC 198, §1), none were local ordinaries (CIC 198, §2).

Competency for the creation of such institutions as juridic persons under the 1983 code would appear to be even more limited. There is no general grant of competency to local ordinaries as there was in the 1917 code. Rather, as noted in the text above, competency would appear to be limited to the Holy See, episcopal conferences, and diocesan bishops, in the absence of an apostolic privilege conferring competency on others, with the consent of the diocesan bishop required for the valid exercise even of such an apostolic privilege (c. 312, §2). Not even the diocesan administrator is accorded such competency (c. 312, §1, 3°). This would appear to preclude the creation of juridic persons by major superiors of religious institutes in the absence of an apostolic privilege.

For a discussion of the canonical status of church-related institutions in the United States, see the "Note" on that topic following the commentary on c. 123.

specificity in paragraph two.[25] The practical wisdom of the requirements in paragraph three regarding informed judgments of usefulness and adequacy of resources is self-evident.

Universitas Personarum, Universitas Rerum

Canon 115 — §1. Juridic persons in the Church are either aggregates of persons (universitates personarum) or aggregates of things (universitates rerum).

§2. An aggregate of persons (universitas personarum), which can be constituted only with at least three persons, is collegial if the members determine its action through participation in rendering decisions, whether by equal right or not, according to the norm of law and the statutes; otherwise it is non-collegial.

§3. An aggregate of things (universitas rerum), or an autonomous foundation, consists of goods or things, whether spiritual or material, and either one or more physical persons or a college directs it according to the norm of law and the statutes.

The distinction, introduced in canon 114, §1, between juridic persons which in English translation are said to be aggregates of persons and those which are said to be aggregates of things, is the focus of canon 115. The distinction is fundamental and important; it is regrettable that the translation jeopardizes a true understanding both of the distinction and of the nature of a juridic person. It is not that a better translation is available, but simply that the absence of an accurate English word or phrase for the Latin word universitas when applied to a juridic person argues strongly for leaving untranslated the terms universitas personarum and universitas rerum when applied to juridic persons, as is done with some other technical terminology in the code (see, e.g., cc. 1299, 1445, §1, 1°).

As indicated in the commentary on canon 113, a juridic person is not a group or collectivity, either of natural persons or of material goods. It is not an aggregate. It is an artificial person, an impersonal singular subject of rights and obligations similar to, but totally distinct from, the rights and obligations of natural persons. A juridic person is an "it," not a "they" or "those." The difference is not merely theoretical; it has enormous practical importance.

To speak of a parish, for example, as a community of persons is entirely appropriate from an ecclesiological point of view; canon 515, §1 speaks of a parish in such a sense. From a juridical point of view, however, such a manner of speaking invites canonical misunderstanding and error. Canonically, a parish is a juridic person (c. 515, §3). As such it has a canonical personality of its own distinct from the natural personalities that make up the theological community of the faithful. The temporal goods of a parish are owned by a single legal construct known as the parish; they are not co-owned by an aggregate of persons as are the temporal goods of an association of the faithful which has not been erected as a juridic person (see c. 310). Debts of the parish are not joint liabilities of the parishioners. Actions taken by pastors or others involved in administering the assets of a parish are not subject to challenge in ecclesiastical or civil tribunals on the ground that the actions were contrary to the wishes of the "true owners," the parishioners. A great deal of ill-conceived and unsuccessful but nonetheless expensive litigation, ecclesiastical and civil, has resulted from attempts to vindicate the rights of parishioners to "their" parochial funds or properties, or to compel parishioners, especially wealthy ones, to pay "their" parochial debts. Much of this kind of confusion is traceable to the imprecise speaking of juridic persons, such as parishes, as aggregates of persons.

Paragraph two of canon 115 requires at least three natural persons for the constitution of an universitas personarum, thereby seeming to vindicate the use of the plural "aggregate of persons" when referring to such a juridic person. In this regard, however, canon 115, §2 is speaking only of the moment in which a juridic person is constituted; canon 120, §2 envisions the possibility of such a juridic person continuing in existence even after the number of natural persons associated with it has diminished to one. Difficult as it is to conceptualize an "aggregate" of one, it seems even more incongruous to use the term "aggregate of persons" to designate an existing juridic person which has been inactive for nearly one hundred years and, hence, in all likelihood would have no natural persons associated with it, as envisioned in canon 120, §1.

[25] The code contains a variety of expressions for purposes in keeping with the mission of the Church. See, e.g., in addition to c. 114, §2, cc. 215, 298, 1254, §2. In view of the conciliar definition of the apostolate, however, as all activity of the Church dedicated to bringing the world to Christ (AA 2), it would be difficult to conceive of any ecclesial purpose not included in "works of the apostolate."

For both theoretical and practical reasons, therefore, it is suggested that the terms universitas personarum and universitas rerum, when used to designate categories of juridic persons, be untranslated, with the understanding that an universitas personarum is a juridic person the substratum or basis in reality of which is persons, and an universitas rerum is a juridic person the substratum or basis in reality of which is things.

The potential for confusion, and hence the need for care, in the use of terminology in this area is heightened by the fact that the code also employs the same terminology—universitas personarum and universitas rerum—when referring, not to juridic persons, but to moral persons, groups of natural persons (associations) or accumulations of material goods (funds) which precede the creation of juridic persons and serve as their substrata (see cc. 114, §3 and 117). In these instances, and these alone, it is appropriate to translate universitas personarum as an aggregate of persons, and universitas rerum as an aggregate of things.

Collegial and Non-collegial Juridic Persons

Canon 115, §2 introduces another major distinction among juridic persons, namely, the distinction between a collegial and non-collegial juridic person. As paragraph two makes clear, this distinction is applicable only to universitates personarum, namely, to juridic persons which have as their substrata groups or communities of persons. Such a juridic person is said to be collegial when, according to law or the statutes of the juridic person, all its members (i.e., the members of the underlying moral person which serves as the substratum of the universitas personarum) participate in the making of decisions determining the actions of the juridic person. Examples of collegial juridic persons include episcopal conferences and religious institutes. Participation need not be direct; it can be indirect through elected representatives, as in many religious institutes. Moreover, paragraph two makes clear that participation in decision-making need not be by equal right for a juridic person to be classified as collegial; participation by unequal right, as in the case of participation by auxiliary bishops in the decision-making of episcopal conferences (see c. 454), suffices. Examples of non-collegial juridic persons are dioceses and parishes.

Many canonists trained under the 1917 code will find the 1983 code's use of "collegial" and "non-collegial" unfamiliar and perhaps confusing. The terms were used in the 1917 code (CIC 99), but without definition. Though not all canonists agreed,[26] the distinction was generally understood in terms similar to the present distinction between an universitas personarum and an universitas rerum; a collegial (often translated collegiate) juridic person was understood to be one whose basis in reality or substratum was a group of persons, while a non-collegial (non-collegiate) juridic person was understood to have as its substratum a collection of material assets.[27] The present code confines the distinction between collegial and non-collegial juridic persons to universitates personarum, and roots the distinction in differing approaches to decision-making.

Canon 115, §3 addresses the universitas rerum. As noted above, the term universitas rerum, when used of a juridic person, signifies a juridic person the underlying reality or substratum of which is a collection of goods or things (e.g., real estate, securities, cash) which have been set aside for a particular apostolic purpose (e.g., worship, education, justice, charity) and which, prior to the conferral of juridic personality, are often referred to as funds, such as education, building, or retirement funds.[28] The affairs of an universitas rerum are managed in accord with the norms of law and the juridic person's own statutes by one or more natural persons or by a college or group of natural persons. Paragraph three of canon 115 equates such an universitas rerum with an autonomous foundation, one of two types of canonical foundations (see c. 1303).

Public and Private Juridic Persons

Canon 116 — §1. Public juridic persons are aggregates of persons (universitates personarum) or of things (universitates rerum) which are constituted by competent ecclesiastical authority so that, within the purposes set out for them, they fulfill in the name of the Church, according to the norm of the prescripts of the law, the proper function entrusted to them in view of the public good; other juridic persons are private.

§2. Public juridic persons are given this personality either by the law itself or by a special decree of competent authority expressly granting it. Private juridic persons are given this personality only through a special decree of competent authority expressly granting it.

To the distinctions between an universitas personarum and an universitas rerum, and between a collegial and non-collegial juridic person, this canon adds the distinction between a public and private juridic person. The distinction is new and is an attempt, along with the 1983 code's division of associations of the faithful into public and private, to give effect to the teaching of the Second Vatican Council that all members of the faithful have the right to engage in apostolic action not only by giving assistance to works appropriately founded and governed by the hierarchy but also by founding and governing other apostolically oriented associations and organizations on their own initiative.[29] The codification of this teaching (see cc. 215, 216) required the creation of expanded canonical structures to afford opportunity for the teaching to be put into practice. Thus, private as well as public associations of the faithful (see cc. 298–329), and private as well as public juridic persons, came into being.

The distinction between a public and a private juridic person is essentially the distinction between a juridic person that is closely governed by ecclesiastical authority (public juridic person) and one that, although subject to authority in certain respects,[30] enjoys more autonomy and is governed primarily by its own statutes (private juridic person). The distinction is essentially a difference in relationship to the hierarchy.[31] This is cryptically [28] As noted above, the term universitas rerum is also used in the code to designate the fund which precedes the creation of a juridic person and serves as its substratum (see cc. 114, §3; 117).

[29] See AA 18, 19, 24, 25; PO 8–9.

[30] Within the Church, all persons, natural and juridic, are subject to hierarchical authority in the area of doctrinal and moral integrity (see, e.g., cc. 209; 305; 323; 386, §2; 397); it is also each diocesan bishop's responsibility to urge the observance of all relevant ecclesiastical laws and to guard against abuses (see cc. 392, 305).

[31] The root of the distinction finds expression in the conciliar decree on the apostolate of the laity:

> Depending on its various forms and goals, the lay apostolate admits of different types of relationships with the hierarchy. (AA 24)

These words are followed by a tracing of different levels of relationship between various apostolic undertakings of the laity and the hierarchy. The 1983 code attempts, with inevitable loss of nuance, to codify complex ecclesiologiexpressed in canon 116, §1 which speaks of a public juridic person fulfilling entrusted functions "in the name of the Church," a phrase which is generally understood to mean acting pursuant to a mission received from hierarchical authority and under the close supervision and direction of the hierarchy.[32]

A private juridic person, though its statutes require approval by the ecclesiastical authority that creates it (see cc. 117, 114, §1), is understood to act in its own name, not in the name of the Church, that is, not in close relationship to the hierarchy. This general expression of the distinction between public and private juridic persons is given more detailed expression in the specific differences between them indicated in subsequent canons (see, e.g., cc. 118, 120–123, 1257).

A private juridic person is no less Catholic than a public juridic person; it simply enjoys more autonomy, in service to the right of association which belongs to all members of the faithful. Illustrative of that greater autonomy is the provision in Book V of the code according to which the temporal goods of a private juridic person, though clearly dedicated to the work of the Church, are not classified as ecclesiastical goods (bona ecclesiastica) or church property and, hence, are not subject to most of the canons in Book V (see cc. 1257, 1258), including the invalidating laws governing acts of extraordinary administration, acts of alienation, and some other transactions.[33]

Canon 116, §2 affords alternative ways of conferring public juridic personality: by law or by special decree of competent authority expressly granting such personality. Conferral of private juridic personality can take place only by decree; no private juridic personality is conferred by law. In the several instances, therefore, where juridic personality is conferred by law (see commentary on c. 114) it is always public juridic personality that is conferred; it is unnecessary for the canons dealing with conferral of juridic personality to state that the personality conferred is public.

No law confers juridic personality on Catholic colleges, universities, hospitals, or similar institutions; they can be constituted juridic persons, either public or private, only by decree of competent authority. The decree need not be separate from the decree creating the juridic person; one and the same decree can confer juridic personality and indicate whether it is public or private.

The distinction between public and private juridic persons is not found in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.

Statutes

Canon 117 — No aggregate of persons (universitas personarum) or of things (universitas rerum), intending to obtain juridic personality, is able to acquire it unless competent authority has approved its statutes.

The statutes of juridic persons are the internal governing documents of such persons in the Church. They are ordinances, analogous to the bylaws of civil-law corporations in many nations including the United States, which set forth the pur-cal notions, involving not just the laity but all members of the faithful, into the succinct juridical categories of private association of the faithful (see cc. 321–326), public association of the faithful (see cc. 312–320), private juridic person, and public juridic person.

[32] See c. 313; Gauthier, 90–91. The phrase is used with the same meaning in cc. 301, §1; 313; 675, §3; 834, §2; 1108, §2; 1192, §1; and 1282. The seeming identification of the Church with the hierarchy, which is implicit in the phrase, unfortunately echoes just such an identification frequently found in the 1917 code, as in CIC 684–686 where establishment of associations of the faithful by hierarchical authority was called establishment "by the Church" (ab Ecclesia), an identification difficult to reconcile with the people-of-God ecclesiology of Vatican II.

[33] See commentary on cc. 1281, 1291, 1295. Not to be subject to such laws is a factor to consider when selecting a canonical status for a hospital, college, or other church-related institution. See the discussion of the canonical status of church-related institutions in the United States following the commentary on c. 123.

pose, basic organization, structures of authority, governing principles, forms of decision-making, and mode of operation of the juridic person (see cc. 94, 304, 451). It is their function to afford organizational stability.[34] They also serve as instruments for the implementation of the principle of subsidiarity, as many canons remit to statutes the specification of general norms.[35] This is particularly true in regard to private juridic persons (see, e.g., cc. 118; 120, §1; 123). Among many matters remitted to the statutes of public juridic persons are the determination of which types of financial transaction are to be considered acts of extraordinary administration for the particular juridic person[36] and, hence, are to be subject to the invalidating laws which regulate such acts,[37] and the determination of the manner in which the mandated finance council or financial advisors are to assist in the administration of temporal goods.[38] It is the responsibility of the authority competent to approve the statutes to see that they address the matters remitted to them by the law of the Church.[39]

As noted in the commentary on canon 115, the terms universitas personarum and universitas rerum, inappropriately translated as "aggregates" when referring to juridic persons, are appropriately translated as "aggregates" in canon 117, because in this canon they refer to groups of persons or collections of things prior to the conferral of juridic personality. Canon 117 makes no distinction between juridic personality that is to be conferred by operation of law (a iure) and that which is to be conferred by decree of competent authority (ab homine); it would seem, therefore, that all juridic persons, public or private, whether their juridic personality is conferred a iure or ab homine, should have their statutes approved as a prerequisite to the conferral of juridic personality.[40] The implication is clear that all parishes and all dioceses, as juridic persons, should have statutes though, as a matter of fact, many do not. The absence of statutes is no doubt largely due to the absence in the 1917 code, under which most presently existing dioceses and parishes were established, of any general norm requiring statutes.[41] While, strictly speaking, canon 117 can be said to be binding only on juridic persons constituted after the promulgation of the 1983 code (see c. 9) and, hence, only on newly created dioceses and parishes, good governance would seem to call for the enactment and approval of statutes for all existing dioceses and parishes as well.[42] Nor does there seem to be any compelling ecclesiological reason why the statutes of all parishes or all dioceses need to contain identical provisions; diversity, within the parameters of the law, especially in financial matters, would seem to be entirely compatible with Catholic unity (see commentary on c. 1281).[43]

Acts of a Juridic Person

Canon 118 — Representing a public juridic person and acting in its name are those whose competence is acknowledged by universal or particular law or by its own statutes. Representing a private juridic person are those whose competence is granted by statute.

[39] While statutes cannot be approved if they contain provisions contrary to the law, it is sometimes required that statutes contain provisions positively conforming to certain canons of the code. See, e.g., c. 1295 which requires statutes (of public juridic persons) to be in conformity with canons 1291–1294. Such a requirement is designed to provide notice, usually to people engaging in financial transactions with a juridic person, that if certain canonical requirements are not fulfilled, the transaction will be canonically invalid. [42] See Chiappetta Com 1996, 1:175.
[43] The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches confines the explicit requirement of having approved statutes to juridic persons erected by decree (CCEO 922, §1).

Juridic persons have rights to be exercised and obligations to be fulfilled (c. 113, §2); they are capable of acquiring, retaining, administering, and alienating temporal goods (c. 1255); they can sue and be sued in ecclesiastical tribunals (c. 1400, §1, 1°). Being artificial persons,[44] however, juridic persons can act only through natural persons, either as individuals or as groups. Those competent to represent and act on behalf of a public juridic person are often designated by law, especially where public juridic personality has been conferred by law (see, e.g., c. 393 for a diocese, cc. 532, 543, §2, 3° for a parish, c. 238, §2 for a seminary); when not designated by law, they are to be designated in the statutes of the public juridic person. Those who represent and act on behalf of a private juridic person are to be designated in the statutes.

The apparent simplicity of canon 118 masks a source of tension between diocesan bishops and pastors or others who, by law of the Church or by statutes, are said to represent and act in the name of a juridic person in places where the civil-law structure of a diocese does not mirror the canonical structure. Where a diocese is civilly structured as a corporation sole, for example, as in many dioceses in the United States, all, or nearly all, church-related assets are considered to belong to a single corporation whose sole representative is the diocesan bishop. He, and he alone, acts for the corporation. Incompatible with the law of the Church, this method of holding title to church property was long ago disapproved by the Holy See[45] but continues in some places, often giving rise to internal ecclesial disputes and raising other problems for the Church (see commentary on c. 1256). Whatever the civil structure, every effort should be made to see that the laws of the Church regarding the official representation of parishes and other juridic persons in all juridic affairs are faithfully fulfilled.

Canon 119 — With regard to collegial acts, unless the law or statutes provide otherwise:

1° if it concerns elections, when the majority of those who must be convoked are present, that which is approved by the absolute majority of those present has the force of law; after two indecisive ballots, a vote is to be taken on the two candidates who have obtained the greater number of votes or, if there are several, on the two senior in age; after the third ballot, if a tie remains, the one who is senior in age is considered elected;

2° if it concerns other affairs, when an absolute majority of those who must be convoked are present, that which is approved by the absolute majority of those present has the force of law; if after two ballots the votes are equal, the one presiding can break the tie by his or her vote;

3° what touches all as individuals, however, must be approved by all.

Given the location of this canon in a chapter of canons entitled "Juridic Persons," its norms should be understood as applicable only to acts of collegial juridic persons; application to colleges or groups, such as a college of consultors or presbyteral council, which are not themselves juridic persons or do not constitute the total membership of a collegial juridic person, can only be by way of suggested analogy, not direct obligation. Even in regard to collegial juridic persons, the provisions of canon 119 are suppletory; they apply only in the absence of different norms found in law, universal or particular, or in the statutes of a particular juridic person. Viewing the content of canon 119 in the light of contemporary approaches to decision-making, it would seem likely that many collegial juridic persons would incorporate into their statutes provisions governing the conduct of elections and other affairs that differ markedly from the provisions in the canon.

Number one concerns elections and requires, first of all, a quorum composed of a majority of those entitled to be convoked.[46] Given the presence of a quorum, one or, if necessary, two ballots are to be taken in search of an absolute majority (i.e., one more than half) of those present (not merely of valid votes cast[47]) in favor of one candidate. If no candidate has received an absolute majority after the second ballot, a third ballot is to be taken between the two candidates who received the most votes on the second ballot or, if two or more received an equal number of votes, between the two of them who are oldest in age. The canon does not say that an absolute majority is needed on the third ballot, and an official interpretation by the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts has stated that on the third ballot a relative majority (i.e., more votes than any other candidate) suffices.[48] If the third ballot results in a tie, the candidate oldest in age is considered elected. The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches provides that, unless otherwise specified in law, in the event of a tie vote on the third ballot the senior in sacred ordination is to be considered elected in elections between clergy, and the senior in first profession in elections between religious; in other elections, the senior in age is considered elected when the third ballot results in a tie.[49]

Number two deals with matters other than elections, and again provides for decision-making by a quorum composed of a majority of those entitled to be convoked. Given the presence of a quorum, an absolute majority of those present (not merely of valid votes cast) determines the outcome. Unlike elections, the resolution of other matters is not limited to three ballots; discussion and voting can continue until an absolute majority of those present resolves the matter, regardless of how many ballots it may take. The canon provides, however, that if, after two ballots, the voting should result in a tie,[50] the one presiding (over the meeting, not necessarily over the juridic person, although in most cases they would be identical[51]) can break the tie. This is an option, not an obligation, for the one presiding.

As noted above, the provisions of canon 119 are suppletory; they apply only in the absence of other provisions contained in universal or particular law or in the statutes of a particular juridic person. Universal law, for example, requires a two-thirds vote (of members having a deliberative vote) for the passage of general decrees by an episcopal conference (c. 455, §2), and remits to proper law the ordering of elections and other matters handled in chapters of religious institutes (cc. 631, §2; 632). Particular law governing collegial juridic persons in a diocese, or the proper law in institutes of consecrated life, or the statutes of [46] While it is of the essence of a collegial juridic person that all its members participate in decision-making, participation can be direct or indirect through representatives as, for example, through a chapter of a religious institute (see commentary on c. 115, §2). Those who must be convoked to an election or other meeting, therefore, need not comprise the full membership, but only those entitled to vote in a representative capacity.

[47] The parallel canon in the 1917 code required an absolute majority only of valid votes cast (CIC 101, §1, 1°); abstentions or votes invalid for any reason were not counted. Under c. 119, 1° of the 1983 code, however, since an absolute majority of those present is required, an abstention or invalid vote is significant and can preclude the reaching of an absolute majority.

[48] AAS 82 (1990) 845. The parallel canon in the 1917 code explicitly stated that a relative majority sufficed on the third ballot (CIC 101, §1, 1°). Omission of that language in c. 119 of the 1983 code gave rise to a doubt and led to the request for an official interpretation by PCILT. See L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993) 59–61. The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches restores the explicit mention of the sufficiency of a relative majority on the third ballot. CCEO 924, 3°; 956, §1.

[50] Since the canon does not so require, the tie need not represent a fifty-fifty split of those present; even when some of those present do not vote or vote invalidly, if a tie results, the one presiding may choose (so long as at least two ballots have been taken) to break the tie. individual collegial juridic persons, public or private, may well and perhaps should contain provisions different from those found in canon 119 to govern elections and other areas of decision-making.

Number three restates an ancient canonical principle, derived from Roman law[52] and included among the Regulae Iuris at the end of the Decretals of Boniface VIII.[53] The location of the principle in the code, in a chapter entitled "Juridic Persons" and in a canon dealing with the acts of a collegial juridic person, assists in its proper interpretation. It is a fundamental postulate of decision-making in a collegial juridic person that whatever touches all as individuals, that is, as individual members of a collegial juridic person, must be approved by all. Matters affecting the juridic person as such are to be decided in accord with the norms in numbers one and two (unless otherwise provided in law or statutes), but matters affecting the rights of individual members of the decision-making body itself (namely, the moral person which serves as substratum for the juridic person) must be decided unanimously. Such matters are nearly always procedural, such as a proposal to allow a vacancy in an elected office to be filled by vote of only a committee rather than by the whole body; such a proposal would require unanimous consent of all members, since it touches upon the procedural right of each member of a collegial juridic person to participate in the decision-making (see c. 174, §1). Similarly, where neither universal law nor a special mandate has granted power to an episcopal conference to issue a general decree, neither the episcopal conference nor its president may act in the name of all the bishops unless each and every bishop has given his consent (c. 455, §4).

The suppletory character of canon 119 is stated at its outset ("unless the law or statutes provide otherwise") and is therefore applicable to all three sub-sections, including the last which restates the regula iuris requiring unanimity in matters touching all as individuals. Even in regard to this provision of ancient origin, then, particular or proper law or statutes can provide exceptions. Thus, for example, statutes could provide for elections under certain circumstances to be handled by a committee rather than by all members without first obtaining the unanimous consent of all members. This was not the case prior to the 1983 code. Canonical tradition codified in the 1917 code, while allowing exceptions to the provisions regulating elections and the making of other decisions affecting a collegial juridic person as such, did not allow exceptions to the regula iuris requiring unanimity in matters affecting all as individuals.[54]

Decision-making in non-collegial juridic persons (e.g., dioceses, parishes), a matter not mentioned in canon 119, is governed by other universal laws, by particular law, and by statutes.[55]

Termination of a Juridic Person

Canon 120 — §1. A juridic person is perpetual by its nature; nevertheless, it is extinguished if it is legitimately suppressed by competent authority or has ceased to act for a hundred years. A private juridic person, furthermore, is extinguished if the association is dissolved according to the norm of its statutes or if, in the judgment of competent authority, the foundation has ceased to exist according to the norm of its statutes.

§2. If even one of the members of a collegial juridic person survives, and the aggregate of persons (universitas personarum) has not ceased to exist according to its statutes, that member has the exercise of all the rights of the aggregate (universitas).

Essential to an understanding of the nature of a juridic person is an appreciation of its inherent perpetuity, its capacity for continuous existence. As an artificial person (see commentary on c. 113), a juridic person transcends the lives and works of natural persons associated with it at any given time, and continues in existence until terminated in one or another of the ways indicated in this canon.

A public juridic person can be terminated in one of two ways: by legitimate suppression by competent authority or by ceasing to act for a period of one hundred years. The authority competent to suppress a juridic person is usually, but not always, the authority that created it (or established its underlying substratum in instances where juridic personality is conferred a iure); some suppressions are reserved to higher authority. The suppression of an institute of consecrated life or a society of apostolic life, even one of diocesan right, for example, is reserved to the Holy See (cc. 584, 732), as is the suppression of the only house of a religious institute (c. 616, §2). At times, even though the authority competent to suppress is the same as the authority to create (or establish the substratum), the law requires consultation of others prior to suppression (see, e.g., cc. 320, §3; 616, §1; 733, §1); failure to consult would negate the legitimacy of the suppression which, in turn, would invalidate the termination.

A public juridic person which has ceased to act for a period of one hundred years would certainly have outlasted the lives of all natural persons ever associated with it, either as members of an universitas personarum or as administrators of an universitas rerum, and in all likelihood would also have outlasted all the assets which formed any part of the substratum underlying an universitas rerum.[56] During the inactive one hundred years the rights and obligations of the juridic person are considered to be dormant; they would revive if someone were to acquire membership in the dormant universitas personarum or if material goods were restored to the dormant foundation. If not revived, the juridic person terminates automatically by operation of law upon the expiration of one hundred years from the day on which the inactivity originated.

A private juridic person can also be terminated by legitimate suppression or by ceasing to act for a period of one hundred years. A private juridic person, however, in accord with its greater autonomy, can also be terminated in other ways provided for in its statutes, such as the reduction below a designated number of members in the association that serves as substratum for an universitas personarum, or reduction below a designated value in the assets that serve as substratum for an universitas rerum (foundation).

Canon 120, §2 provides that if only one member of a collegial juridic person survives, and the juridic person has not been terminated according to its statutes, all the rights of the juridic person can be exercised (on its behalf) by the surviving member. This provision applies to all public collegial juridic persons because no public juridic person can be terminated according to its statutes; only private juridic persons have the option of providing in their statutes for methods of termination other than the two prescribed in canon 120. So all public, and some private (those whose statutes have not provided for termination prior to or concurrently with the survival of only one member) collegial juridic persons are subject to paragraph two of canon 120.

Consolidation of Juridic Persons

Canon 121 — If aggregates of persons (universitates personarum) or of things (universitates rerum), which are public juridic persons, are so joined that from them one aggregate (universitas) is constituted which also possesses juridic personality, this new juridic person obtains the goods and patrimonial rights proper to the prior ones and assumes the obligations with which they were burdened. With regard to the allocation of goods in particular and to the fulfillment of obligations, however, the intention of the founders and donors as well as acquired rights must be respected.

[56] This, alone, would seem to make clear the inappropriateness of speaking of a juridic person as an "aggregate." See commentary on c. 115.

Juridic persons can be combined or united in a variety of ways. There can be federations or confederations of juridic persons (e.g., among religious institutes), each of which retains its juridical identity but seeks limited union with others in sharing talents, experiences, and vision. There can be what, in the United States, are known as mergers of juridic persons, in which one juridic person is absorbed by another (e.g., one parish being absorbed by another) with only one of the previously existing juridic persons retaining its juridical identity.[57]

Canon 121 deals with neither of these kinds of union. Rather, it focuses on what, in the United States, is called a consolidation, in which two or more juridic persons are so joined that each of them loses its own juridical identity and in their stead a new juridic person is constituted.[58] A consolidation involves both the suppression and creation of juridic persons; as such, the intervention of competent authority is necessary, both authority competent to create the new juridic person (see c. 312 and commentary on c. 114) and authority competent to suppress the previously existing juridic persons (see commentary on c. 120). Often, but not always, the same authority is competent both to suppress and to create.[59] The scope of canon 121 is limited to consolidations of public juridic persons; in accord with the greater autonomy of private juridic persons, norms governing consolidations, mergers, or other forms of union among them are to be found in their statutes.

Temporal goods, property rights, and financial obligations of the two or more consolidating public juridic persons are transferred a iure (by the operation of canon 121) to the new juridic person. Although transfer of ownership (known canonically as alienation) of church property (that which belongs to a public juridic person in the Church[60]) is often subject to a number of regulatory norms,[61] such norms do not apply to transfers which are a part of canon 121 consolidations for a number of reasons. As just noted, such transfers occur a iure, not pursuant to voluntary decisions made by church administrators (the object of the laws regulating alienation). Moreover, higher ecclesiastical authorities are already involved in the suppression and creation of the juridic persons involved in the consolidation (obviating the need for supervisory involvement of the authorities competent to approve voluntary acts of alienation); and safeguarding the economic viability and stability of public juridic persons whose property is to be alienated, which is the purpose of the laws regulating acts of alienation, is not relevant in a canon 121 consolidation because, by hypothesis, the public juridic persons whose property is being transferred are, simultaneously with the transfer, going out of existence.

Canon 121 does require, however, that in the use of goods and in the fulfillment of obligations transferred to the new juridic person, the intentions of founders and donors be faithfully fulfilled. This is a fundamental principle of canon [57] References to federations, confederations, and other forms of union may be found in cc. 582; 684, §3; and 1274, §4.

[58] For American usage, see Black's Law Dictionary, 6th ed., s.v. "consolidation of corporations"; Bouvier's Law Dictionary, 3rd rev. (F. Rawle), 8th ed., s.v. "merger: of corporations." American courts and authors generally distinguish a consolidation from a merger on the ground that in a consolidation all the combining entities are dissolved and lose their identities as a single new entity is created, whereas in a merger one of the combining entities (corporations) continues in existence and absorbs the others. While this is the general usage in the United States, the terms "consolidation" and "merger" have occasionally been used interchangeably. See Ballentine's Law Dictionary, 3rd ed., s.v. "merger of corporations."

[59] Although the view has been expressed that in a canon 121 type of union there is no suppression or extinction of the component juridic persons and that they may be said to continue, since their patrimonial rights and liabilities have been acquired by the new juridic person (McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 70), the wording of the canon would seem to make it clear that the previous juridic persons no longer exist and that the goods, rights, and obligations that were once theirs are no longer so, but belong to the new juridic person. See Chiappetta Com 1996, 1:182.

law, given expression frequently throughout the code.[62] The Church's concern for justice also finds expression in the requirement that all acquired rights are to be honored notwithstanding the consolidation.

Division of Juridic Persons

Canon 122 — If an aggregate (universitas) which possesses public juridic personality is so divided either that a part of it is united with another juridic person or that a distinct public juridic person is erected from the separated part, the ecclesiastical authority competent to make the division, having observed before all else the intention of the founders and donors, the acquired rights, and the approved statutes, must take care personally or through an executor:

1° that common, divisible, patrimonial goods and rights as well as debts and other obligations are divided among the juridic persons concerned, with due proportion in equity and justice, after all the circumstances and needs of each have been taken into account;

2° that the use and usufruct of common goods which are not divisible accrue to each juridic person and that the obligations proper to them are imposed upon each, in due proportion determined in equity and justice.

Commentaries on the 1917 code often stated that a juridic person could not be divided; its territory could be divided, but not the person.[63] This was in accord with the wording of the 1917 code which spoke of the division, not of a juridic person, but of the territory of a juridic person (CIC 1500), and in accord also with the theoretical view that a person, juridic no less than natural, is indivisible.

The 1983 code adopts a more practical approach. While the division of a diocese or parish usually involves a concomitant change in territorial boundaries, the division of other juridic persons, such as a province of a religious institute or a public association of the faithful or a foundation, need not be based on or involve a division of territory. Accordingly, the present code speaks more broadly (and more abstractly) of the division of the juridic person itself.[64]

In accord with the greater autonomy of private juridic persons, the norms of canon 122 are made applicable only to public juridic persons, leaving to the statutes of private juridic persons the regulation of their division. Several of the principles expressed in canon 122, however, such as equity and justice and faithful observance of the intentions of donors, could well be incorporated into the statutes of private juridic persons.

Canon 122 makes clear that the act of dividing a juridic person and the act of dividing its assets and liabilities are distinct juridic acts. There is no automatic division of assets and liabilities in mathematical proportion, for example, to the number of Catholics or parishes or counties in each diocese in the case of a divided diocese, or in proportion to the size of the territory or number of families in each parish in the case of a divided parish. Rather, divisible assets and liabilities are to be divided in due proportion as dictated by equity and justice in the light of all relevant circumstances, including size of territory and total[65] population, demographic projections, presently available resources, the potential for future resources, personnel needs unique to each juridic person, and a host of other factors. Not even canonical ownership of land passes automatically from the present diocese or parish to a newly created one; at times, it is appropriate for the parent diocese or parish to retain ownership of land (e.g., a cemetery) that is situated within the territorial boundaries of the new diocese or parish. Considerations of equity and justice require that there be observed before all else the intentions of founders and donors,[66] acquired rights, and the applicable provisions of the statutes of the juridic person being divided.

[63] Cappello, 2:551; Bouscaren-Ellis-Korth, 811. The 1917 code and its commentators rarely used the term "juridic person"; the term "moral person" was used to signify what the present code more precisely calls a "juridic person" (see commentary on c. 113).

[64] The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches retains the approach of the 1917 code and speaks of the division, not of a juridic person, but of the territory of a juridic person (CCEO 929).

[65] The mission of the Church to evangelize and to serve all people precludes any planning that is limited to presently existing Catholic populations.

The use and enjoyment of the benefits of indivisible assets such as a seminary, for example, and the attendant liabilities and obligations, are to be shared according to a plan similarly characterized by due proportion based on equity and justice in the light of all relevant circumstances.

Assets which serve the needs of a diocese or other public juridic person are not always canonically or civilly owned by the diocese or other public juridic person served by them. Independent foundations (see c. 1303, §1, 1°), for example, are often established to provide funds for various educational, health-care, or social service endeavors within a diocese; the assets of such a foundation, since they are not canonically owned by the public juridic person known as the diocese, are not subject to division if the diocese should be divided. The existence of such a foundation, however, is a circumstance relevant to any division of diocesan assets based on equity and justice, for the relative abilities of the parent and newly created dioceses to meet their needs are clearly affected by the existence of the foundation. Equity and justice demand disclosure of such a foundation and its being taken into account when determining the due proportion according to which assets owned by the parent diocese are to be divided between the parent and newly created dioceses. Similar circumstances may be present in the division of a religious institute or one of its provinces, or in the division of other public juridic persons.

Canon 122 provides that the competent authority to divide assets and liabilities, and to impose the terms of shared use of indivisible assets, is the same authority as that which is competent to divide the juridic person. Ordinarily, this would be the authority competent to create the juridic person (or establish the underlying moral person upon which the law confers juridic personality), such as the Holy See for a diocese (c. 373) or the diocesan bishop for a parish (c. 515, §2). Where not determined by universal law, the designation of competent authority is to be found in proper law (see, e.g., c. 581) or in the statutes of a public juridic person.

The division of assets and liabilities and the imposition of the terms of shared use of indivisible assets is to be carried out by the competent authority personally or through an executor. While the term "executor" is used in a variety of contexts throughout the code, it commonly refers to one who carries out the directives of another, either with or without the exercise of discretion having been committed to the executor.[67] In the context of canon 122 an executor would be given considerable discretion, but always within the parameters set forth in the canon.

When a diocese is divided by the Holy See, it is customary for the Holy See to instruct the diocesan bishops involved to develop a plan for the division and sharing of assets and liabilities. Such an instruction is not tantamount to naming the bishops co-executors to determine by their mutual agreement the final disposition of the assets and liabilities; final decision-making authority rests with the Holy See, or with a third party executor designated by the Holy See to make the final determination in the name of the Holy See. Until any agreement reached by the involved diocesan bishops has been confirmed by the Holy

[67] For varied contexts in which the term is used see cc. 40–45, 54, §1, 62, 63, §3, 70 (executor of an administrative act); c. 1301 (executor of a pious will); cc. 1654, 1655, §2 (executor of a judicial sentence).

See, or by an executor designated by the Holy See, the canonical division is not completed and, hence, can be reopened for further negotiation at a future time. This is the import of canon 122; it seems not always to be understood by diocesan bishops who sometimes, with their financial advisors and attorneys, think they have definitively settled the division of assets and liabilities by their mutual agreement. Similar misunderstandings can arise in connection with the division of any public juridic person.

Extinction of Juridic Persons

Canon 123 — Upon the extinction of a public juridic person, the allocation of its goods, patrimonial rights, and obligations is governed by law and its statutes; if these give no indication, they go to the juridic person immediately superior, always without prejudice to the intention of the founders and donors and acquired rights. Upon the extinction of a private juridic person, the allocation of its goods and obligations is governed by its own statutes.

Public juridic persons are extinguished only by suppression by competent authority or by being inactive for a period of one hundred years; private juridic persons are extinguished in either of these ways or in any other way specified in their statutes (c. 120, §1). Both public and private juridic persons, however, can provide in their statutes for the allocation of their assets and liabilities upon extinction, unless, in regard to public juridic persons, provision has been made in universal or particular law. Universal law contains such provisions in connection with the suppression of an institute of consecrated life (c. 584), a society of apostolic life (c. 732), and the only house of a religious institute (c. 616, §2), in each case reserving to the Apostolic See the determination of what is to be done with the temporal goods. Universal law directs that provision for the distribution of the goods of a suppressed house (other than the only house) of a religious institute be made in the proper law of each institute (c. 616, §1), and that provision for the distribution of the goods of a suppressed autonomous monastery of nuns be included in the constitutions of the monastery (c. 616, §4).

Canon 123 prescribes that when provision is not made in universal or particular law, and is not made in the statutes of a public juridic person, the assets and liabilities of an extinguished public juridic person go to the immediately superior public juridic person. A relationship of superiority, however, exists only among hierarchically ordered juridic persons, such as a parish, diocese, and the Holy See, or a religious house, province, and institute; other public juridic persons, such as a public association of the faithful, or a university or hospital erected as a public juridic person, or an autonomous foundation, do not have immediately superior juridic persons. Canon 123 is silent as to what happens in such cases.

The 1917 code similarly directed that goods of an extinct juridic person be distributed to the immediately superior juridic person, and was similarly silent as to the goods of juridic persons which were not hierarchically related to other juridic persons (CIC 1501). Commentators on the 1917 code concluded that, in such circumstances, the goods should go to the juridic person presided over by the ecclesiastical authority who issued the decree erecting or suppressing the extinct juridic person,[68] or to whom the extinct juridic person was otherwise immediately subject, namely, to either the diocese or the Holy See.[69] Since canon 123 of the present code essentially restates the prior law, and remains silent where the prior law was silent, the norms of canonical interpretation dictate that the jurisprudence developed under the prior law should be followed (see c. 6, §2). This means that, absent relevant provisions in law or in the statutes of a public juridic person, the goods of a public juridic person which has no immediately superior juridic person will, upon extinction, go to the diocese, the episcopal conference, or the Holy See, the juridic persons presided over by the authorities competent to erect a juridic person or to which a juridic person would otherwise be subject (if juridic personality were conferred a iure).[70] While in many cases such a disposition would be unobjectionable, in some cases it would be incompatible with the justifiable expectations of the sponsors of a hospital, college, or other institution erected as a public juridic person in its own right by a diocesan bishop but sponsored, staffed, and administered by a religious institute. If the expectation of such a religious institute is that, upon extinction, the assets would revert to the sponsoring religious institute, but such an expectation is not embodied in the statutes of the juridic person, the assets, according to canonical tradition, would go to the diocese. This argues for careful consideration, at the time of drafting the statutes, of what distribution is to be made of assets and liabilities upon the extinction of a public juridic person.

As in canons 121 and 122, and frequently throughout the code,[71] so also in canon 123 the Church's commitment to faithful fulfillment of the intentions of founders and donors finds expression. Acquired rights must also be respected in the allocation of goods and obligations upon the extinction of a public juridic person. Although the wording of canon 123 leaves entirely to the statutes of a private juridic person the allocation of goods and obligations upon extinction, without mention of acquired rights or intentions of donors, such considerations, since they are matters of justice, should not be ignored. In this connection it should be noted that canon 326, §2, in remitting to the statutes of a private association of the faithful (which may or may not have received juridic personality) the allocation of goods upon extinction, explicitly requires the honoring of acquired rights and the intentions of donors.

[70] See c. 312 and commentary on c. 114. Chiappetta, without mention of the jurisprudence developed under the 1917 code, appears to be of the same opinion. Chiappetta Com 1996, 1:184.

NOTE ON THE CANONICAL STATUS OF CHURCH-RELATED INSTITUTIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

A study of the general norms on juridic persons, coupled with a study of the canons on associations of the Christian faithful (cc. 298–329), leads to the realization that the law of the Church affords a number of options for the canonical status of Catholic colleges, universities, hospitals, and other educational, health-care, and social service institutions. Any endeavor or any person claiming to be Catholic is subject, at least to some degree, to the governance of ecclesiastical authority; it is one of the defining characteristics of being Catholic (see c. 205). Not all Catholic institutions, however, any more than all Catholic individuals, are subject to ecclesiastical authority in the same way or to the same extent; not all are subject to all of the same laws of the Church. Which laws are applicable to a particular church-related institution depends upon the canonical status of the institution.

Apostolic Work of Sponsor. A Catholic institution may simply be the apostolic work of a sponsoring public juridic person, such as a diocese or religious institute; as such, the institution shares in the canonical status of its sponsor. Canonically, the college, hospital, or other entity is simply the institutionalized apostolate of a public juridic person; those who administer the affairs of the public juridic person are, canonically, ultimately responsible for the affairs of the college, hospital, or other institution, and the assets and liabilities of the institution are, canonically, assets and liabilities of the sponsoring public juridic person. This would seem to have been the original canonical status of many Catholic educational and healthcare institutions in the United States, the vast majority of which were founded by religious institutes, and most likely continues to be the canonical status of many such institutions.

This category of canonical status affords a number of advantages. Since the institution is understood to belong to its sponsor (most often a religious institute or diocese), the level of perceived Catholicity is high, as is the level of sponsor involvement in the work of the institution. Clarity of mission is well served by the close relationship between the institution and its sponsor, and the closeness of relationship yields the sponsor a high degree of control over the Catholic identity of the institution, a control that, in many states of the United States, is civilly protected through the mechanism of reserved powers retained by the sponsor over some of the affairs of a separately incorporated institution.

Notwithstanding the advantages, there are also a number of disadvantages to this canonical status. The close relationship between the institution and its sponsor exposes the sponsor to the risks of liability, canonical and civil, for financial transactions or injury-causing malfeasance or culpable negligence on the part of trustees, employees, or other agents of the institution.[72] Moreover, where the sponsor is a public juridic person, the assets of an institution that canonically belongs to the sponsor are ecclesiastical goods (see c. 1257, §1) and, as such, are subject to virtually all of the property laws of the Church, including invalidating laws governing acts of extraordinary administration (see cc. 1277, 1281), acts of alienation (see cc. 1291–1294), and some other transactions (see c. 1295). Subjection to these laws often results in Church-State conflicts arising from transactions that are valid at civil law but invalid canonically, or vice versa. A close relationship between an educational institution and its religious sponsor can also endanger the eligibility of the institution for various forms of governmental aid in the United States where state and federal constitutions place limitations on governmental aid to religious endeavors, especially educational ones. These and other disadvantages often argue against the advisability of a Catholic institution seeking or retaining such a canonical status, and in favor of seeking an alternative canonical status.

Public Juridic Person. A church-related institution can be constituted a public juridic person in its own right. While retaining many of the advantages of sharing in the canonical status of a sponsoring public juridic person, this category affords canonical separateness between the institution and its sponsor, thereby reducing the risks of sponsor liability for acts of the institution. Since the institution is a public juridic person, however, its assets are ecclesiastical goods subject to all canon laws governing church property, including the invalidating laws, and resulting Church-State conflicts mentioned above. As a public juridic person, the institution remains closely governed by ecclesiastical authority (see commentary on c. 116) and, as such, remains vulnerable to characterization by governmental authorities as pervasively sectarian for purposes of determining constitutional eligibility for governmental aid.

Private Juridic Person. A Catholic institution can be constituted a private juridic person in its own right. As such, the institution, although subject to some degree to the ecclesiastical authority that confers juridic personality upon it, enjoys more autonomy than a public juridic person (see commentary on c. 116). Just as the extent of sponsor control, and that of other ecclesiastical authorities, over the institution is less than in the previously mentioned categories of canonical status, so too is the extent of canonical regulation of the financial aspects of the institution. The assets of a private juridic person are not ecclesiastical goods and, therefore, are not subject to most of the laws of the Church governing temporal goods, including the invalidating laws mentioned above (see c. 1257, §2). The lessened extent of ecclesiastical control over the institution also serves to mitigate the institution's vulnerability to characterization as pervasively sectarian for constitutional purposes relating to governmental aid.

Private Association of the Faithful. A church-related institution may be neither the apostolic work of a sponsoring public juridic person, such as a diocese or religious institute, nor a juridic person, public or private, in its own right. It may be the work of a recognized private association of the faithful (see cc. 298–311, 321–326). Though recognized by ecclesiastical authority as truly Catholic, such an association enjoys even more autonomy than a private juridic person. While the assets of a private association of the faithful are not ecclesiastical goods and, hence, are not subject to the canons governing the administration and alienation of church property and certain other financial transactions, the private association of the faithful affords no corporate or institutional ownership of assets; the individual members of the association are understood to be co-owners of the assets of the institution and are individually and jointly liable for the debts of the institution (see c. 310).[73]

De Facto Catholic Institution. Options for canonical status of a church-related educational, health-care, or other charitable institution include the de facto Catholic institution. This is simply an apostolically oriented institution run by a group of members of the Church who have not sought official recognition by ecclesiastical authority. The institution is Catholic in fact (reapse[74]) but juridically the institution as such is only minimally subject to ecclesiastical authority and is bound by only a few laws of the Church,[75] though the individual members of the faithful associated with the institution are, of course, bound by all the laws which govern their relationship as individuals to the hierarchical authority of the Church.[76] Such an institution enjoys a high degree of autonomy but often a lower degree of perceived Catholicity and sponsor involvement, and virtually no degree of sponsor control, if a sponsor is involved at all. This is more likely to be the initial canonical status of a new institutionalized apostolic work than a later status chosen to replace one of the other categories of canonical status.

In the United States, Catholic institutions exist in each of the canonical categories summarized [73] The code also provides for public associations of the faithful, but such associations are, by law, public juridic persons (see c. 313) and, hence, are included in the category of public juridic persons discussed above.

above.[77] No one canonical status is always preferable to the others; each has its advantages and disadvantages. The most desirable status for a particular institution will depend on a number of factors. What is important for each presently existing institution (college, university, hospital, nursing home, hospice, and others) is to ascertain, through careful research in the archives both of the institution and of its sponsor, the present canonical status of the institution. Only then should a determination be made as to which of the available options would be the most desirable, in the light of all relevant circumstances.[78] Once that determination is made, the appropriate canonical steps could be taken to effect whatever change in canonical status is desired. These steps may include the creation of a new juridic person and the alienation of assets.[79]

The view has been expressed, criticized, rejected by the Holy See, and yet repeatedly expressed, that civil incorporation has the effect not only of conferring civil-law status upon an institution but also of negating any canonical status whatsoever.[80] Such a view ignores the fact that Roman Catholic persons and endeavors are subject to two independent legal systems, canonical and civil, and juridic acts under one system have no necessary juridic effects under the other. Just as the creation of a juridic person under canon law is given no automatic recognition under civil laws in the United States, so too, an act of civil incorporation has no necessary effect upon a previously acquired canonical status, nor upon previously acquired canonical ownership of the property of the institution. Just as civil incorporation of a parish or diocese does nothing to alter the canonical status of the parish or diocese, neither does civil incorporation alter the canonical status of an educational or health-care institution that already enjoys canonical status as the institutionalized apostolate of a sponsoring diocese or religious institute.

Nor is any change in canonical status effected by a change in the composition of the governing board of trustees or directors of a Catholic institution. An institution is not owned by its board. Whoever serves on such a board, whether lay, religious, or cleric, member or non-member of a sponsoring religious institute or diocese, is bound to administer the affairs of the institution in accord with the laws, canonical and civil, which govern it and in accord with the institution's internal governing documents, canonical as well as civil. Competent lay persons, no less than competent religious or clerics, are capable of administering church property (see cc. 1282, 1287, §1) and otherwise administering apostolic works sponsored by dioceses or religious institutes. A change in board membership from a majority of clerical or religious members of the sponsor to a majority of lay persons does not necessarily signify a change in the canonical status of a Catholic institution, nor constitute an alienation of its property; canonically, the property continues to be owned by the sponsor, not by the members of the board.

[78] Relevant considerations include the preferences of a sponsor as to how closely involved with the governance and finances of an institution the sponsor wishes to be, the preferences of likely benefactors and constituents as to how much autonomy they would want the institution to have, and civil-law implications of one or another canonical status in various states.

[79] For canonical norms governing the alienation of church property, see cc. 638, §§3, 4; 1291–1294.

[80] This view is often attributed to a monograph authored by John J. McGrath, Catholic Institutions in the United States: Canonical and Civil Law Status (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1968). For an analysis and evaluation of what became known as "the McGrath thesis," along with evaluative analyses of the views of Adam J. Maida written in response to McGrath and the position of Gommarus Michiels upon which Maida relied, see R. Kennedy, "McGrath, Maida, Michiels: Introduction to a Study of the Canonical and Civil-Law Status of Church-Related Institutions in the United States," J 50 (1990) 351–401. The article includes a detailed account of the rejection of the McGrath view by the Holy See.

Nor does the transfer of title to real estate from the sponsor to a newly incorporated institution necessarily effect a change in canonical status or in canonical ownership of the property. Such a transfer could be intended as a true conveyance from the sponsor to the institution, but it need not be so intended. Administrators of church property are obliged to take appropriate steps to safeguard the ownership of ecclesiastical goods "by civilly valid methods" (c. 1284, §2, 2°). Accordingly, placing title to real estate in the name of a civilly incorporated institution is often intended to do no more than gain civil-law separateness to insulate the sponsor from civil-law liability for the actions of the sponsored institution, with no intention to alter the canonical ownership of the property or the canonical status of the institution. For this reason, such transfers of title are frequently not accompanied by efforts to comply with canonical requirements for the valid alienation of church property; no such alienation is intended.[81]

Efforts to ascertain the present canonical status of a Catholic institution in the United States, therefore, should avoid misleading assumptions about the supposed canonical effects of civil incorporation (or other civil-law structuring) of the institution, or changes in the composition of the institution's board of trustees, or transfers of civil title to real estate. Efforts should concentrate on careful research to determine the original canonical status of the institution and whether or not valid canonical steps were ever taken to alter that original status. Once the present status has been definitively ascertained, a choice of desirable status can be made and steps taken to modify[82] or alter the canonical status accordingly.

[81] For a more extensive discussion of the canonical implications of transferring title to real estate, see Kennedy, 371–375.

[82] Canonical status of an institution can be modified without being replaced by an entirely different category of canonical status. The first status mentioned above, for example—according to which the institution is understood simply to be the apostolic work of a sponsoring public juridic person such as a diocese or religious institute—can be modified (partially altered) by the sponsor relinquishing canonical ownership and control of the finances of the institution (and relinquishing the corresponding civil-law mechanisms employed to protect the sponsor's canonical role in major financial transactions) while retaining control of matters relating to Catholic identity and mission and to the particular charism of the sponsor.

JURIDIC ACTS
[cc. 124–128]

For the first time in the history of canon law, the 1983 code contains the norms concerning "juridic acts" under a separate heading. It is only relatively recently that "juridic acts" have been the object of study and systematic treatment in canon law. Although Roman law did not have a technical expression for a juridic act, it did provide the material from which later studies would draw. Jurists in nineteenth century Germany, in particular the Pandectists who studied Roman law, developed a theory of juridic acts which focused on the will of the individual which is necessary for a juridic act. This doctrine had an impact on canon law and is reflected in the 1917 code which regulated different aspects of juridic acts in the beginning of Book II on "Persons" (CIC 103–104) and in Book IV on "Processes" (CIC 1680, §1 and 1681). In the years that followed, canonists devoted increasing attention to the theory of juridic acts. This led to the decision to treat juridic acts under a separate heading in the 1983 code.

This section in the 1983 code does not contain a definition of a juridic act, but the description by O. Robleda seems to dominate the canonical literature. He writes that it is "an externally manifested act of the will by which a certain juridical effect is intended."[1]

Juridic acts are to be distinguished from other acts (c. 128), i.e., acts which have no legal character because the law does not attach juridic consequences to them or because such consequences are not intended. Examples of other acts would be cooking or walking. Juridic acts are furthermore to be distinguished from juridic facts which are facts or actions that have legal consequences by the law itself and for which no will is required. Examples of juridic facts are birth, death, gender, age, mental capacity. In contrast to other acts and juridic facts, a juridic act entails two essential aspects: (a) the person acting has a will to do so, i.e., there must be a decision in which all rational faculties are engaged, and (b) the intention of the action is to bring about a certain juridic effect. A juridic act requires a decision to cause a certain consequence which the law attaches to it. Such a consequence can affect oneself or, when the person placing the act has the authority to do so, it can bind others. Examples of juridic acts are the sale of property, contracting marriage, religious profession, conferral of an office, resigning from an office, promulgating a law, and issuing a judicial sentence.

Juridic acts may be unilateral, bilateral, or multilateral. Unilateral acts are those which are issued by one person only and may or may not require notification.[2] A removal from office is an example of a juridic act which becomes effective only when the person who is to be removed has received notification about it. The making of a will, on the other hand, is an example of a juridic act which does not require notification of another party. Bilateral or multilateral acts are those in which two or more persons are involved in the juridic act as is the case in, for example, a contract.

Onclin: "De requisitis ad actus iuridici exsistentiam et validitatem," in Studi in onore di Pietro Agostino d'Avack (Milan: Giuffrè, 1976) III: 399–419. Both Robleda and Onclin personally participated in the commission for the revision of these norms of the 1917 code.

[2] Notification or the reception of notice is not the same as acceptance, because acceptance implies that an action requires someone else's confirmation or approval, thus resulting in a bilateral act. For example: most resignations of office require acceptance (e.g., parish priest, c. 538, §1; bishop, cc. 401 and 411); however, the resignation of the Roman Pontiff needs only to be manifested (c. 332, §2) and thus does not require acceptance.

The five canons in this section begin with an identification of the requirements for a valid juridic act (c. 124, §1). Canon 124, §2 establishes what is required for a juridic act to be presumed valid. The succeeding canons 125–127 list things or causes which might affect the validity of the act. Finally, canon 128 concerns compensation for damage which an external act might have caused. From a systematic point of view, one might question why canon 119 on collegial acts has not been included in this section, since that canon deals with juridic acts and not with physical or juridic persons.

A Valid Juridic Act

Canon 124 — §1. For the validity of a juridic act it is required that the act is placed by a qualified person and includes those things which essentially constitute the act itself as well as the formalities and requirements imposed by law for the validity of the act.

§2. A juridic act placed correctly with respect to its external elements is presumed valid.

Whereas the 1917 code had only a canon determining what would invalidate an act (CIC 1680, §1), the 1983 code contains in this canon a positive description of the necessary elements required for a valid juridic act. They concern (1) the person placing the act, (2) the intrinsic nature of the act itself, (3) extrinsic formalities, and (4) other elements which the law requires for validity.

The person placing the act can be a physical person, a juridic person, or a college. The acting subject needs to be qualified—habilis—which in canon law means that the person has a right to act in the matter in the broad sense.[3] This means not only that the person is generally able to place acts (see cc. 96–98), but also that the person is qualified for a specific act. Thus, anyone who is non sui compos cannot place a juridic act (see cc. 97, §2 and 99) because such a person cannot place an act of the will. A sentence rendered by a person who lacks the power of judging in the tribunal in which a case is decided is irremediably null (c. 1620, 2°), because that person is not qualified for this specific act.

Not only the acting person, but also the object of the act is relevant. In a juridic act the two go together because the object relates the will to the juridic order. The canon speaks of "things which essentially constitute the act itself." An objection that this phrase was too general was rejected during the revision process with the argument that the phrase could be found in the juridic tradition and would be sufficiently clear.[4] It means that which essentially constitutes an act. When any of the elements that essentially constitute an act are lacking, there is no juridic act and there are no juridic consequences. Thus, a contract implies at least two parties and an exchange of rights, and its object must be possible.[5]

Furthermore, formalities imposed by the law must be fulfilled. Canon law generally allows for freedom regarding the form of an act, but at times requires formalities for legitimacy or validity. Examples of such formalities include that an act be in writing (c. 1524, §3), the signature of the one acting (c. 474), acting in person and not through a representative (c. 833), and the canonical form for marriage (c. 1108). When no formalities are required, the preferred form may be chosen as long as it is somehow communicated and manifest and thus provable.

Other requirements imposed by law need to be fulfilled as well, such as consultations or the obtaining of consent (c. 127).

The second paragraph of the canon establishes a presumption: when the external elements have been placed correctly, the juridic act is presumed to be valid; its invalidity must be proven, i.e., the burden of proof rests with the person alleging invalidity. In this context it is important to note that canon law differentiates between the intended will and the manifested will: although the manifested will is presumed to be in congruence with the intended will, that presumption may be rescinded. This is what happens in marriage nullity cases which concern the so-called ground of "simulation" (c. 1101, §2).

Canon law, furthermore, recognizes a presumption for a manifestation of the will when the law determines that under certain circumstances the manifested will can be assumed. Thus, a libellus is considered as having been accepted when the judge has not accepted or rejected it in the prescribed time (c. 1506). A presumed or interpreted will is allowed only when the law has provided for it, as in the case of the presumed permission from the local ordinary for another diocesan bishop to perform pontifical functions in the former's diocese (c. 390).

Deficient Juridic Acts

Although the external criteria for a valid juridic act might be fulfilled, the act might nevertheless be defective for other reasons. Since juridic acts are human acts, they must be placed knowingly and freely. Canons 125 and 126 consider factors which influence the will or the knowledge of the one placing the act: canon 125 speaks of external reasons, i.e., external force, fear, and malice, and canon 126 speaks of internal reasons, i.e., ignorance and error. These factors do not constitute a taxative list, since other factors derived from the natural law can apply as well.[6]

Force and Fear

Canon 125 — §1. An act placed out of force inflicted on a person from without, which the person was not able to resist in any way, is considered as never to have taken place.

§2. An act placed out of grave fear, unjustly inflicted, or out of malice is valid unless the law provides otherwise. It can be rescinded, however, through the sentence of a judge, either at the instance of the injured party or of the party's successors in law, or ex officio.

When, in placing a juridic act, someone is compelled by force to the extent that the will is totally absent because resistance is not possible, that act is not a human act. Since such an act is externally verifiable, the law itself declares that, as a human act, it is non-existent (infectus; CCEO 932, §1 speaks of nullus, null); hence, no juridic action in the form of a contestation or complaint of nullity need be taken.

The canon speaks of force inflicted from outside the person. This is also called a direct force and is exercised by a person other than the one acting. Some authors equate external force with physical force (cf. c. 1323, 3°); others include the use of psychic and chemical means as force.

Connected to force is fear. The latter is an indirectly exercised force: the will is influenced by the threat of a severe evil. In contrast with direct force, fear is one of many possible reasons for placing a juridic act; therefore, an act placed under fear is valid, but rescindable. Rescission requires that the fear have been severe, external, unjust, and a cause for the manifestation of the will. What is decisive is that the juridic act was placed in order to avoid the threatened evil.

Malice (dolus) is a deliberate concealment of facts or deliberate assertion of what is untrue in order to persuade someone to act in a certain manner. A juridic act is invalid when malice leads to an essential error on the part of the one acting concerning the juridic act; the act must be the result of the malice.

In the case of grave fear or malice, the act placed is valid, but rescindable. There are two reasons for this. First, the person acting is presumed to possess sufficient knowledge and will to place a human act; if that act resulted from grave fear or malice, it can be rescinded through the sentence of a judge. Second, there was an attempt to limit the number of acts which are invalid by the law itself; hence the law itself determines the specific exceptions to this rule.[7]

Since canon law incorporates the civil law of a territory for contracts (c. 1290), rules in civil law might affect the applicability of canon 125 to contracts when it states, "unless the law provides otherwise."

Ignorance and Error

Canon 126 — An act placed out of ignorance or out of error concerning something which constitutes its substance or which amounts to a condition sine qua non is invalid. Otherwise it is valid unless the law makes other provision. An act entered into out of ignorance or error, however, can give rise to a rescissory action according to the norm of law.

A person placing a juridic act needs to know what he or she is doing. Ignorance and error with regard to elements that concern the substance of the act or are sine qua non conditions cause the act to be invalid. Ignorance is the absence of knowledge, and error is a positive judgment which is objectively false. The juridical effects of ignorance and error are the same because no one can want what is not known. When the ignorance or error concerns a substantive element of the juridic act, that act is invalid. When the ignorance or error concerns an accidental or incidental element, however, the act is valid unless that particular element was the reason for placing the juridic act. Thus, canon 1097, §2 determines that error about a quality of a person does not invalidate a marriage "unless this quality is directly and principally intended."

Less serious acts which were placed based upon ignorance or error may be rescinded. The 1917 code allowed this only for contracts.

[7] The law determines that an act is invalid due to fear or fraud in cc. 172, §1, 1°; 188; 643, §1, 4°; 656, 4°; 735, §2; 1098; 1103; 1191, §3; 1200, §2.

Deficiencies in Collegial Juridic Acts

Canons 125–126 apply not only to the acts placed by individuals, but also to those placed by a college. The 1977 and 1980 schemas had a canon addressing in particular what should be done when a member of a college was affected by the deficiencies mentioned in canons 125–126. The canon was omitted, because a collegial act is an act placed by a majority of the members. Hence, with regard to force or fear, as long as the vote is given freely (c. 172, §1, 1°)[8] by a majority of the members, the collegial act is valid.

Obtaining Consent or Counsel

Canon 127 — §1. When it is established by law that in order to place acts a superior needs the consent or counsel of some college or group of persons, the college or group must be convoked according to the norm of can. 166 unless, when it concerns seeking counsel only, particular or proper law provides otherwise. For such acts to be valid, however, it is required that the consent of an absolute majority of those present is obtained or that the counsel of all is sought.

§2. When it is established by law that in order to place acts a superior needs the consent or counsel of certain persons as individuals:

1° if consent is required, the act of a superior who does not seek the consent of those persons or who acts contrary to the opinion of all or any of them is invalid;

2° if counsel is required, the act of a superior who does not hear those persons is invalid; although not obliged to accept their opinion even if unanimous, a superior is nonetheless not to act contrary to that opinion, especially if unanimous, without a reason which is overriding in the superior's judgment.

§3. All whose consent or counsel is required are obliged to offer their opinion sincerely and, if the gravity of the affair requires it, to observe secrecy diligently; moreover, the superior can insist upon this obligation.

In order to place a juridic act validly, a superior at times needs the consent (consensus) or counsel (consilium) of a third party.[9] Such a third party is, therefore, someone who is hierarchically subordinate[10] to the one who needs the consent or advice. The code does not provide a general norm for obtaining consent or advice from a third party who is hierarchically equal or superior.[11]

Consent or counsel may be obtained from a college or group of persons (§1), or from individuals (§2). All those who give consent or counsel are obliged to offer their opinion sincerely and, when the seriousness of the matter requires it, are asked to observe secrecy (§3). In contrast with the Latin code, the Eastern code has an important additional paragraph indicating that the authority which requires the consent or counsel must provide the necessary information and see to it that the persons answering have freedom to speak their mind (CCEO 934, §3). Indeed, giving consent or counsel is not considered a mere formality, but is rather the exercise of a responsibility by the one who is being consulted or asked for counsel; it ought to be based on all the data possible.

The canon addresses the superior who has an obligation to obtain consent or counsel. With this obligation goes the right of others to give consent or counsel. The right or obligation to give or obtain advice (consilium) is in the law often expressed through the verb "to hear" (audire) and not through the noun consilium.[12]

When the law requires the consent or consultation of a college or group of persons, those belonging to it are to be convoked according to canon 166. In the case of a consultation, particular or proper law may provide that a meeting in person is not necessary.

When consent is necessary, an absolute majority of those present is required. A vote ending in a tie may not be interpreted as giving consent. Such a vote implies that consent is not given. Since a superior asks for consent from others, this superior cannot participate in the voting nor break a tie.[13]

The canon states that for consultation the counsel of all ought to be sought. The syntax of this phrase could imply that indeed the opinion of all, whether present or not, is to be obtained. Four arguments, however, militate against this broad interpretation. First, the schemas of 1977, 1980, and 1982 clearly state that all members of the group ought to be convoked. Only with the 1982 schema does the possible exception of particular or proper law appear.[14] Second, the exception would make no sense in those cases for which particular or proper law did not foresee that those present would have to be heard. Third, it would seem somewhat illogical to require a consultation of all—including those not present—for counsel, whereas consent, which is of greater importance, need be obtained only from those present. Fourth, when all persons must be consulted, whether or not they convene, the need to convene in itself di-

[9] See, for a detailed analysis of this canon, Elmar Güthoff, "Consensus" und "consilium" in c. 127 CIC/1983 und c. 934 CCEO (Würzburg: Echter, 1994).

[10] This is not to be confused with c. 208 according to which all persons are equal in the Church. From an ecclesiological perspective, the word superior is therefore not the best. The Eastern code speaks of auctoritas (CCEO 934).

[11] Two examples: For the alienation of property whose value exceeds the maximum amount, the permission of the Holy See is necessary (c. 1292, §2). A diocesan bishop needs the favorable opinion of the bishop's conference and the permission of the Holy See to delegate a lay person to assist at weddings (c. 1112, §1).

[12] The noun consilium usually refers to an advisory body, such as a presbyteral council (consilium presbyterale). The use of the verb audire, however, does not always imply a right to be heard in the sense of c. 127, as is the case when the subject to be consulted is not clearly identified (e.g., cc. 377, §3 and 1064), when it is left to the discretion of the superior to obtain advice (e.g., cc. 50; 317, §1; 524; 547; 553, §2; 971; 1064) or when those to be heard are not "subordinate" (e.g., cc. 459, §2; 796, §2; 1479).

minishes tremendously. The purpose of convening is, however, to discuss the matter and exchange thoughts before advice is given. In conclusion, when counsel is asked for, all must be convoked in accord with canon 166, unless particular or proper law provides otherwise. Those who do not respond to the notice of convocation lose the right to be heard. Nevertheless, the superior could ask those not present at the meeting for their counsel, but could not "add" their advice to that given by those who were present.[15] This interpretation implies that superiors have fulfilled their duty when they have heard those present.

Could the superior act validly against the counsel given by a college or group of persons? The canon does not answer this question, but in light of number two of the next paragraph, which considers this situation in relation to counsel given by individuals, it seems that the superior is not bound by the counsel, but would need an overriding reason, at least in the superior's judgment, not to follow it.

The canon speaks of a college (collegium) and a group of persons (coetus). Since the latter always includes the former, Eastern code canon 934 is correct and less confusing when it speaks solely about a group of persons (coetus). For the sake of clarity: the difference between a collegial act and giving consent or advice as a group of persons or as a college is that in the latter the superior alone places the act; giving consent is only a prerequisite for the validity of that act. In a collegial act, however, the superior is primus inter pares and dependent on the majority vote; the superior must act according to the majority decision. Hence, in a collegial act the superior may vote and even break a tie. When simply obtaining consent though, the superior may not vote. In a case where the law determines that the superior is to act together with the council, therefore, canon 127 does not apply, because such a case involves a collegial act.[16]

The second paragraph concerns the obtaining of consent or counsel from individuals. For the validity of the act, all of the individuals need to be asked. Furthermore, when they need to give consent, every single individual must give consent. Even when only one person does not do so, the act placed by the superior is invalid.[17] In the case of counsel, the superior is not to act contrary to the advice given, especially when it is given unanimously, unless the superior has a reason which is overriding, at least subjectively.

The third paragraph contains two obligations for those who are to give consent or counsel. (1) They should give their opinion sincerely. (2) They are to observe secrecy when the gravity of the affair requires it. At times, the superior may even insist on this. The first obligation implies that consent or counsel should be given in virtue of the knowledge, competence, and position that these persons have.[18] Those who are to give consent or counsel must have full information, as Eastern code canon 934, §3 indicates.[19]

Repair of Damage

Canon 128 — Whoever illegitimately inflicts damage upon someone by a juridic act or by any other act placed with malice or negligence is obliged to repair the damage inflicted.

A juridic act or any other act might cause damage to another juridic or physical person.[20] Only [15] See Güthoff, 127–129.

[16] E.g., c. 699 determines that the supreme moderator together with at least four council members is to decide about a dismissal. Because this is a collegial act, the supreme moderator has to execute the decision made by the majority even if the superior him- or herself voted against it. See also c. 119 above.

[17] Not every consent to be given by an individual is to be understood in the sense of c. 127. For example, the consent given by the wife of a candidate for the deaconate is not to be seen in the sense of c. 127. For other examples, see cc. 1177, §2; 764; and 1003, §2.

[19] Canon 1292, §4 determines that those who are to give advice or consent for alienation are first to be fully informed.

when such a juridic act is placed unlawfully or when an act is placed with malice or culpability is there an obligation for the one who placed the act to compensate for the damage inflicted. This applies to physical and juridic persons. The damage not only concerns property, but might also refer to other "goods" like health, freedom, reputation, or spiritual goods (e.g., sacraments). Furthermore, negligence in performing an act which causes damage might be a reason for reparation, e.g., when a competent authority does not issue an obligatory decree (c. 57, §3). This example shows that canon 128 not only is directed to individuals who might cause damage, but includes damage caused by ecclesiastical officials.[21]

The restoration of damage might require restitution and reparation. Restitution is restoration to the situation which existed before the damage was caused. For example, an object that was illegitimately possessed is returned, or a right or duty that was denied is acknowledged. Reparation is satisfaction. This could be financial or moral. Often restitution and reparation are connected.

Requests for compensation should be made through the legitimate means offered by the Church itself. Canon 221 states that Christian faithful can legitimately vindicate and defend their rights. In fact, procedural law provides a forum in which physical and juridic persons can vindicate their rights (c. 1400, §1). A person who has been damaged through an administrative illegal act can seek hierarchical recourse (c. 1732–1739) and, when necessary, even have recourse to the Apostolic Signatura.[22] Procedural law provides norms concerning actions for repair of damages (cc. 1729–1731), but such norms presume a delict. When no other means are available, an action in virtue of canon 1491 seems possible.

Title VIII
The Power of Governance

One of the major achievements of Vatican II was certainly that of considering ecclesiologically the position of all faithful. The second chapter of the Constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium, thus discusses first the "people of God," and subsequently the hierarchy, laity, and religious. The council had recourse to the so-called munus triplex theory in considering the different tasks that the faithful have. This theory focuses on the threefold ministry of Christ, namely, that of prophet, priest, and king, and the participation of the faithful therein. Through baptism all share in the priesthood of Christ, but this common priesthood differs in essence from the ministerial or hierarchical priesthood. Crucial for this difference is the sacred power (potestas sacra) which the ministerial priest (sacerdos) possesses (LG 10). It is exactly here that the concepts of munus and potestas come together.

Traditionally a differentiation has been made between the powers of orders and jurisdiction. It was for Vatican II to answer two questions related to this. The first one concerned the difference between the priesthood and episcopacy: Was the difference only on the level of a superior jurisdiction of the bishop? The second question had arisen after Vatican I, namely: What is the source of the power of jurisdiction of diocesan bishops? Are they mere delegates of the Roman Pontiff?

Vatican II answered these questions by stating that episcopal consecration is the fullness of the sacrament of orders and that the episcopal consecration confers not only the office (munus) of sanctifying, but also the offices of teaching and governing (LG 21). The diocesan bishop governs his flock as vicar and legate of Christ by authority and, as the council calls it, by sacred power. This power is proper, ordinary, and immediate (LG 27). Since the council here made use of both terms, munera and potestas, and because the Church had traditionally used the language of power for orders and jurisdiction, a "Preliminary Explanatory Note" was added to Lumen gentium. It states, in part,

> In consecration is given an ontological participation in sacred functions [munerum]. ... The word functions is used deliberately, rather than powers [potestatum], since this latter word could be understood as ready to go into action. But for such ready power to be had, it needs canonical or juridical determination by hierarchical authority.[23]

The council stated that presbyters share with bishops in the priesthood of Christ and thus depend on the bishop for the exercise of their power. The council did not speak about deacons and sacred power or about functions which concern the power of governance. Furthermore, the council never discussed the sacred power of the laity, but affirmed that all the faithful do participate in the threefold ministry of Christ.

As Pope John Paul II mentioned when he promulgated the 1983 code, it is the task of canon law to "translate" these theological insights into concrete canonical norms.[24] The commentary on the following canons will show that the translation of the insights about governance into norms for action was among the most disputed areas in the process of the reform of the 1917 code. Moreover, now that the interpretation and application of these norms have been under way for some time, there is still no unified understanding. It will therefore be important to recall a principle of interpretation mentioned by Pope John Paul II, namely, that the council should remain point of reference when something is not clear: the legislation may not interpret the council, but the council should be the basis for the interpretation of the legislation.

Whereas the code has separate books on the teaching and sanctifying offices (munera) of the Church, it lacks a parallel book on the governing office. Book I on general norms contains the title "The Power of Governance" (De potestate regiminis). This title does not correspond to the traditional language of the power of jurisdiction (iurisdictio), nor does it speak of the office (munus) of governing. It speaks about governing, because that fits better with history and with the teaching of Vatican II concerning the three munera.[25] Furthermore, the title is broader than the one in the 1917 code which spoke about "ordinary and delegated power," because the title in the 1983 code does not restrict itself to executive power, but also includes legislative and judicial power.[26]

Who Can Exercise the Power of Governance?

Canon 129 — §1. Those who have received sacred orders are qualified, according to the norm of the prescripts of the law, for the power of governance, which exists in the Church by divine institution and is also called the power of jurisdiction.

§2. Lay members of the Christian faithful can cooperate in the exercise of this same power according to the norm of law.

The first canon of this title attempts to answer the question: who can exercise the power of governance? This question has certainly been one of the most debated issues, not only during the reform of the 1917 code but also in the time after the promulgation of the 1983 code.[27] The debate focuses in particular on the laity and their exercise of the power of governance. The question underlying the debate has to do with the necessity of ordination in order to exercise the power of governance and is closely connected to the question concerning the capacity of the laity to hold office (cf. c. 274, §1).

The discussion has resulted in two (opposing) positions which may be identified as the Roman school and the Munich school.[28] The positions of the two schools can be understood only in light of the 1917 code which determined that only clerics can obtain the power of jurisdiction (CIC 118). Clerics, according to the 1917 code, were all those who had received tonsure. Thus, ordination was not a necessity for obtaining power of jurisdiction.

The Roman school points out that the council did not really speak about the power of jurisdiction, but answered questions about the powers of the bishops and affirmed the oneness of sacred power for the episcopacy. The council neither intended, nor did it in fact speak about, the power of jurisdiction of the laity. This school refers to historical examples which testify to laity having exercised jurisdiction and concludes that, because Vatican II had no intention to break with history, laity can exercise the power of jurisdiction.

The Munich school, however, states that the council clearly decided on the oneness of sacred power which is indivisible. The only source of sacred power is ordination. Hence, laity cannot exercise power of jurisdiction. According to this school, the council restored the unity of the powers of orders and jurisdiction. To state that laity could exercise the power of jurisdiction would therefore be a break with the insight of the council.

In light of these thoughts, both schools proposed changes to the draft texts of the 1983 code.[29] An important result of the discussion concerns the word "cooperate" in the second paragraph of canon 129. It replaced the word "participate" (partem habere), which had been in the 1980 and 1982 schemas. The Munich school sees in this change an affirmation that laity cannot exercise jurisdiction and quotes in favor of that interpretation canon 274, §1 which states that only clerics may be given an office which requires either power of orders or power of jurisdiction. The norm that lay persons may function as judges in collegiate tribunals (c. 1421, §2) is considered to be an aberration which should not be implemented by bishops. To "cooperate" means, therefore, that laity can be involved only in the preparation, accompaniment, and execution of acts of jurisdiction.

The Roman school, while acknowledging the change from "participating" to "cooperating" as a possible weakening of its position, does not give too much weight to this, for the word cooperatores is used in other canons as meaning "participation."[30] The determination that only clerics can hold an office which requires the power of orders or of jurisdiction is to be interpreted in light of its text and context, which implies that this norm is to be seen in terms of the rights and duties of clerics. Thus, clerics would have a right to hold an office which requires the power of jurisdiction by reason of the orders received; they would also then have an obligation to exercise that office. The laity, however, have no right to such an office and therefore no obligation to exercise it.

An issue closely related to the question of laity exercising the power of governance is the question of whether laity can be delegated the power of governance. The code does not determine who can be delegated (c. 131). Therefore, some hold that since the laity are not incapable of exercising the power of governance, it is possible for a bishop to delegate a lay person; others deny this possibility.

In conclusion, the question concerning the exercise of the power of governance by the laity is still being debated. Nevertheless, several offices are open to laity which do imply the power of governance, e.g., finance officer of a diocese (c. 494) and of a religious institute (c. 636), member of a diocesan finance council (c. 492), lay person in charge of a parish (c. 517, §2), administrator of ecclesiastical goods (c. 1279), judge (c. 1421, §2), auditor (c. 1428), promoter of justice (c. 1435), and defender of the bond (c. 1435).[31]

[28] The literature usually speaks of the German school, but this is incorrect because several German canonists do not hold this position. Considering the scholars who hold this theory, it might be better to speak of the "Munich" school.

[29] See in particular the debate concerning the 1980 schema of the code in Plen 33–97 and 177–229.

Internal and External Forum

Canon 130 — Of itself, the power of governance is exercised for the external forum; sometimes, however, it is exercised for the internal forum alone, so that the effects which its exercise is meant to have for the external forum are not recognized there, except insofar as the law establishes it in determined cases.

The second of the ten principles governing the revision of the 1917 code concerned a call for a coordination of the external and internal forums. One of the problems had been that the internal forum had also been referred to as the forum of conscience (CIC 196). However, the internal and the external forums are together to be seen as distinct from the forum of conscience, because the latter refers to the relationship between God and an individual, but the internal and external forums refer to different "places" (of the effect) of an act of governance. Hence, whether an act is placed in the internal or the external forum, its effect on the forum of conscience is the same.

The major difference between the internal and external forums is the absence of publicity in the internal forum. The external forum is the place in which public and verifiable decisions are made. Hence, names of persons are made public or noted in a register (e.g., the registration of a marriage, c. 1121). In the internal forum, however, there would be no mention of (full) name or notation in a public register (e.g., a secret marriage, c. 1133). The internal forum itself is divided into the internal sacramental forum and the internal non-sacramental forum. The internal sacramental forum refers to matters decided within the sacrament of penance and therefore additionally protected by the seal of confession. The power of governance may also be exercised in the internal non-sacramental forum.

The decision as to which forum is applicable in a given case should be guided by the following criteria: what is legally or factually known, or possibly going to be known, is to be decided in the external forum; what is secret and likely to remain secret may be decided in the internal forum. The rules for confessional secrecy are always to be respected. The canon clearly prefers the exercise of the power of governance in the external forum.

Persons who have the power of governance for the external forum may use that power in the internal forum also. There are, however, persons who hold offices the power of which are exclusively (penitentiary—cc. 64, 1082, canon penitentiary—c. 508) or partially (confessor—cc. 1079, §3; 1357, §1) for the internal forum.

Decisions made in the internal forum have full effect. Hence, a marriage entered into after a dispensation from an impediment has been granted in the internal forum is valid, even though the legal effects are not recognized in the external forum. Should, however, the impediment become known before the marriage is contracted, that marriage cannot be entered into until a dispensation has been granted in the external forum. It should be noted that the law does provide for some cases in which the act of governance placed in the internal non-sacramental forum is recognized in the external forum (see, for example, c. 1082).

Ordinary and Delegated Power

Canon 131 — §1. The ordinary power of governance is that which is joined to a certain office by the law itself; delegated, that which is granted to a person but not by means of an office.

596," Antonianum 63 (1988) 551–606 and "Jurisdiction Exercised by Non-ordained Members in Religious Institutes," CLSAP 58 (1996) 292–307. In relation to the argument that in a college of judges in which a lay person participates the sacred power is guaranteed because the majority of the members do have sacred power, McDonough points out that in a chapter of a clerical pontifical religious institute the number of non-ordained members can far exceed the number of ordained, so that it would be difficult to hold that the college would possess sacred power because of a majority of clerical members. McDonough argues that the factual possibilities according to c. 596 should have an influence on the interpretation of c. 129, §2.

§2. The ordinary power of governance can be either proper or vicarious.

§3. The burden of proving delegation rests on the one who claims to have been delegated.

Whereas the Roman Pontiff obtains the power of governance upon accepting the election together with the episcopal consecration, and the college of bishops also has full power by divine law, others who have power of governance receive it either by holding an office—in which case it is called ordinary power—or by delegation. The ordinary power attached to an office can be determined by law or in a decree issued by the authority which constitutes and confers the office (c. 145, §2). Delegated power is given to a specific person. The difference between ordinary and delegated power has relevance for the possibility of delegating it to others and for extinguishing it.

The second paragraph of the canon further differentiates between ordinary proper and ordinary vicarious power. Although the code does not give a criterion for the difference between the two, it is generally accepted that the independence of an office is decisive. Thus, some hold offices which are dependent on others and in a sense assist the "main" office. These, then, are offices with ordinary vicarious power. Hence, a diocesan bishop has ordinary proper power, but a vicar general has ordinary vicarious power. The latter's power is ordinary, because it comes with an office, but it is vicarious because it is exercised in the name of another, namely, the bishop.

Although normally the vicar and the "head" (or bishop) are considered to be the same acting person, the 1983 code allows for recourse to the hierarchical superior against an administrative act placed by someone who acted with vicarious power (c. 1737, §1).

Paragraph three of the canon states that the burden of proof of delegation lies with the one who claims to be delegated. Hence, it is highly recommended that the delegation be given in writing (cc. 973 and 1111, §2).

The canon does not determine who may or may not be delegated. In light of canon 129, §2 the question has arisen as to whether lay persons can be given delegated power.[32]

Habitual Faculties

Canon 132 — §1. Habitual faculties are governed by the prescripts for delegated power.

§2. Nevertheless, unless the grant expressly provides otherwise or the ordinary was chosen for personal qualifications, a habitual faculty granted to an ordinary is not withdrawn when the authority of the ordinary to whom it was granted expires, even if he has begun to execute it, but the faculty transfers to any ordinary who succeeds him in governance.

Habitual faculties are one type of delegated faculties. When they are granted to an ordinary in virtue of his office, they do not cease with the cessation of the office holder's authority and may therefore be exercised by the ordinary's successor. This is an exception to the general provision in the law on the cessation of delegated power (see c. 142). Unless otherwise provided in the grant or unless the ordinary was chosen for personal qualifications, habitual faculties do not cease with the cessation of the ordinary's authority.

The vicar general and episcopal vicar also possess the habitual faculties granted to a bishop by the Apostolic See, unless other provisions have been expressly made or the bishop has been chosen because of personal qualifications (cf. c. 479, §3).

Validity of Acts Placed by a Delegate

Canon 133 — §1. A delegate who exceeds the limits of the mandate with respect to either matters or persons does not act at all.

§2. A delegate who carries out those things for which the person was delegated in some manner other than that determined in the mandate is not considered to exceed the limits of the mandate unless the manner was prescribed for validity by the one delegating.

[32] See above, under c. 129.

The first paragraph of the canon concerns the substance of the delegation and the second one the manner of executing it. There are then two reasons which cause an act to be placed invalidly: (1) The person acts beyond the power he or she has been granted. Invalidity could also be due to the limitations of the one who delegates, because what one does not have one cannot give.[33] However, note that delegation given for all cases (ad universitatem casuum) is to be broadly interpreted (c. 138). (2) The person does not act in the prescribed way as determined for validity.[34] Canon 39 determines that conditions affecting the validity of administrative acts are expressed with the words "if" (si), "unless" (nisi), or "provided that" (dummodo).

Ordinaries

Canon 134 — §1. In addition to the Roman Pontiff, by the title of ordinary are understood in the law diocesan bishops and others who, even if only temporarily, are placed over some particular church or a community equivalent to it according to the norm of can. 368 as well as those who possess general ordinary executive power in them, namely, vicars general and episcopal vicars; likewise, for their own members, major superiors of clerical religious institutes of pontifical right and of clerical societies of apostolic life of pontifical right who at least possess ordinary executive power.

§2. By the title of local ordinary are understood all those mentioned in §1 except the superiors of religious institutes and of societies of apostolic life.

§3. Within the context of executive power, those things which in the canons are attributed by name to the diocesan bishop are understood to belong only to a diocesan bishop and to the others made equivalent to him in can. 381, §2, excluding the vicar general and episcopal vicar except by special mandate.

This canon determines who in canon law is considered to be an ordinary and differentiates between personal and local ordinaries. Personal ordinaries are superiors of clerical religious institutes of pontifical right and clerical societies of apostolic life of pontifical right; the others mentioned in paragraph one are local ordinaries. To be added to the list of local ordinaries is the ordinary of a personal prelature (c. 295, §1).

The third paragraph differentiates between a diocesan bishop and those equivalent to him according to canons 381, §2 and 368 on the one hand, and an episcopal vicar and vicar general on the other hand. At times the code prescribes that only the diocesan bishop can act. When a bishop extends this "reserved" power to a vicar general or an episcopal vicar (see c. 479, §§1–2), the latter act not with ordinary vicarious power, but in virtue of delegated power (see c. 131).

Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Power

Canon 135 — §1. The power of governance is distinguished as legislative, executive, and judicial.

§2. Legislative power must be exercised in the manner prescribed by law; that which a legislator below the supreme authority possesses in the Church cannot be validly delegated unless the law explicitly provides otherwise. A lower legislator cannot validly issue a law contrary to higher law.

§3. Judicial power, which judges or judicial colleges possess, must be exercised in the manner prescribed by law and cannot be delegated except to perform acts preparatory to some decree or sentence.

§4. In what pertains to the exercise of executive power, the prescripts of the following canons are to be observed.

The power of governance is subdivided into legislative, executive, and judicial powers. In the Church there has been a long tradition of recognizing legislative and judicial power. Since the Council of Trent, decisions have also been made in an administrative way. In the 1983 code this type of governance is called executive power. It is important to note that in the Church those who have legislative power are also the ones who implement the law, that is, who have executive power. The reverse, however, is not true, because the code states that those who have executive power normally have no legislative power (c. 30) and that general executory decrees may not affect the law (cc 30; 33, §1; 34, §1). Nevertheless, a problem may occur when executive power is delegated to exercise legislative power (c. 30), since in principle executive power is subject to legislative power.

An important difference between the so-called trias politica of Montesquieu and the three powers in the Church is that in the case of the latter those who have executive power can also become active in the domain of penal law. This occurs, for example, in threatening determinate penalties through a precept (c. 1319, §1) or imposing or declaring a penalty by an extra-judicial decree (c. 1342) in which case the procedure is not judicial but administrative (cf. cc. 1341; 1718, §1, 3°). Furthermore, if circumstances warrant it, an ordinary with executive power can provide for penal remedies even when the accused is acquitted of the charge or when no penalty is imposed (c. 1348).

Due to the absence of administrative tribunals, executive power handles conflicts as well (cc. 1732–1739). Judicial power is normally not exercised personally but through judges (c. 1420), which assures some independence from the executive.

Hence, although the canon distinguishes between legislative, executive, and judicial powers, they are closely connected by reason of the offices and the persons holding them.

The second paragraph of the canon addresses legislative power. The canon does not determine who may legislate, but only states that anybody below the highest authority, that is, the Roman Pontiff (c. 331) and the college of bishops (c. 336), cannot delegate legislative power unless the law provides for it, as is the case, for example, in canon 30.[35] Furthermore, a law which is contrary to a higher law cannot be enacted by a lower level legislator. Thus, a diocesan bishop is restricted by the law enacted by the Roman Pontiff or Apostolic See; a provincial chapter of a religious institute is restricted by the laws enacted by the general chapter. According to Pastor bonus, the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts is competent to determine at the request of someone whether particular laws and general decrees issued by lower legislators are in agreement with (consentanea) the universal law.[36]

The third paragraph speaks about the judicial power not exercised by the Roman Pontiff or diocesan bishop, but by judges or judicial colleges. This power cannot be delegated by these judges or colleges except to carry out acts which are preparatory to a decree or a decision, as would be the case when an auditor hears parties or witnesses (c. 1428).

The fourth paragraph only refers to the norms contained in the subsequent canons.

The Scope of Executive Power

Canon 136 — Unless the nature of the matter or a prescript of law establishes otherwise, a person is able to exercise executive power over his subjects, even when he or they are outside his territory; he is also able to exercise this power over travelers actually present in the territory if it concerns granting favors or executing universal laws or particular laws which bind them according to the norm of can. 13, §2, n. 2.

The canon describes the scope of executive power in terms of who is subject to that power and where.[37] There are no equivalent canons for the exercise of legislative and judicial power. The scope of legislative power is only indirectly determined by way of who is bound by which laws (cc. 11–13). The scope of judicial power is indicated in the determination of competence of the judge (cf. cc. 1404–1416 and c. 1673 for marriage cases).

Delegation of Executive Power

Canon 137 — §1. Ordinary executive power can be delegated both for a single act and for all cases unless the law expressly provides otherwise.

§2. Executive power delegated by the Apostolic See can be subdelegated for a single act or for all cases unless the delegate was chosen for personal qualifications or subdelegation was expressly forbidden.

§3. Executive power delegated by another authority who has ordinary power can be subdelegated only for individual cases if it was delegated for all cases. If it was delegated for a single act or for determined acts, however, it cannot be subdelegated except by express grant of the one delegating.

§4. No subdelegated power can be subdelegated again unless the one delegating has expressly granted this.

Someone holding an office to which is attached ordinary executive power, be it proper or vicarious (see c. 131), may delegate such power. A person who has been delegated may under certain circumstance subdelegate such power. This canon regulates delegation and subdelegation. It should be noted that delegation and subdelegation are not allowed when the law expressly states this (e.g., cc. 508, §1; 969, §1). Of course, a person can subdelegate only what he possesses himself and may exercise legitimately (c. 133).

Interpretation of Ordinary and Delegated Executive Power

Canon 138 — Ordinary executive power as well as power delegated for all cases must be interpreted broadly; any other, however, must be interpreted strictly. Nevertheless, one who has delegated power is understood to have been granted also those things without which the delegate cannot exercise this power.

The canon regulates the interpretation of ordinary executive power and of power that has been delegated. When power is delegated for all cases, it is to be interpreted favorably and therefore broadly. However, when it is not delegated for all cases, a strict interpretation is necessary. This parallels the interpretation of dispensations, for the power to dispense granted for all cases is to be interpreted broadly, but when it is granted for a particular case, the dispensation is to be interpreted strictly (cc. 36, §1; 92) as is the power granted for a particular case (c. 92).

Even though the second part of the canon is not a legal presumption (see c. 1584), it determines that the person who has received delegated power has also been given what is necessary to exercise it.

The Competency of Several Persons to Act

Canon 139 — §1. Unless the law determines otherwise, the fact that a person approaches some competent authority, even a higher one, does not suspend the executive power, whether ordinary or delegated, of another competent authority.

§2. Nevertheless, a lower authority is not to become involved in cases submitted to a higher authority except for a grave and urgent cause; in this case, the lower authority is immediately to notify the higher concerning the matter.

The competence of a person to place an executive act is not suspended when a higher competent authority is approached unless the law prescribes otherwise. The second paragraph, however, states that normally a lower authority should not act when a higher authority has been approached. The norm is a moral exhortation, for even the exception mentioned in the norm touches only the liceity of an act. Any action by the competent lower authority would be valid. Hence, the purpose of the second paragraph is to avoid undermining the higher authority.

The canon provides for a situation where a decision has not been made by anyone. Once, however, a decision has been made, canons 64–65 apply which prescribe what is to be done once a favor has been denied.

Delegation of Several Persons

Canon 140 — §1. When several persons have been delegated in solidum to transact the same affair, the one who first begins to deal with it excludes the others from doing so unless that person subsequently was impeded or did not wish to proceed further in carrying it out.

§2. When several persons have been delegated collegially to transact an affair, all must proceed according to the norm of can. 119 unless the mandate has provided otherwise.

§3. Executive power delegated to several persons is presumed to be delegated to them in solidum.

The canon provides rules for situations where several people have been delegated jointly (§1) or where a college has been given the delegation (§2). A delegation to individuals jointly is to be distinguished from successive delegation (cf. c. 141).

A delegation granted jointly implies that every single individual is equally fully competent to act, but that the first one who uses the delegated power excludes the others from acting legitimately. They continue to hold the delegated power but may no longer exercise it; hence, if one of these persons should act, it would be valid, but illicit. However, if the first one to take action does not fulfill or terminate his task, the others are equally competent to licitly exercise their delegated power once again. The fact that the first individual is unable or unwilling to proceed in the matter must be established authentically.

When delegated power is given to a college, that power is to be exercised according to canon 119. In distinction to individuals who are jointly delegated, the members of a college do not receive the delegation individually, but only as a college. Hence, they ought to act according to canon 119 unless the delegating person has provided otherwise, e.g., by prescribing that a majority different from the one in canon 119 suffices for approval of an action.

Normally, the act of delegation itself indicates whether it is given to individuals jointly or to a college. Should this not be clear, then it is to be presumed that the delegation has been given to the individuals jointly.

Successive Delegation

Canon 141 — When several persons have been delegated successively, that person is to take care of the affair whose mandate is the earlier and has not been subsequently revoked.

Whereas the previous canon discusses the delegation of several persons jointly, this canon treats the case where persons are delegated successively. However, the canon does not answer a practical problem that may arise, namely, that of determining who has been delegated first. In case of doubt, recourse should be taken to the one who delegated.

If one person has general delegation and another later receives specific delegation, the latter has precedence for this specific case.[38]

The Cessation of Delegated Power

Canon 142 — §1. Delegated power ceases: by fulfillment of the mandate; by expiration of the time or completion of the number of cases for which it was granted; by cessation of the purpose for the delegation; by revocation of the one delegating directly communicated to the delegate as well as by resignation of the delegate made known to and accepted by the one delegating. It does not cease, [38] RI 34: Generi per speciem derogatur.

however, when the authority of the one delegating expires unless this appears in attached clauses.

§2. Nevertheless, an act of delegated power which is exercised for the internal forum alone and is placed inadvertently after the lapse of the time limit of the grant is valid.

Delegated power ceases:

- by the fulfillment of the mandate;
- by the lapse of time (cf. cc. 202–203) or by the completion of the number of cases for which it was granted;
- by cessation of the final cause of the delegation;
- by the revocation of the one delegating, directly communicated—that is, communicated officially—to the delegate;
- by the resignation of the delegate, made known to and accepted by the one delegating.

However, the delegated power does not cease when the authority of the one delegating expires, unless this appears in attached clauses. Thus, a priest who has been delegated to dispense from a matrimonial impediment can still do so even when the bishop who delegated him resigns from his office or is transferred. This would not be the case, however, if the bishop had explicitly determined otherwise.

It should be remembered that subdelegation can never extend beyond what the one subdelegating possesses. Thus, when delegated power was granted for a specific number of cases or a specific time, the subdelegation cannot go beyond those limits.

The second paragraph of canon 142 regulates acts placed in the internal forum after the time allowed has expired and states that such acts are valid. When an act of delegated power is inadvertently exercised after the time for which it was granted, it is valid only when placed in the internal forum, be it sacramental or non-sacramental (cf. c. 130). The delegated power need not have been granted solely for the internal forum.

Cessation of Ordinary Power

Canon 143 — §1. Ordinary power ceases by loss of the office to which it is connected.

§2. Unless the law provides otherwise, ordinary power is suspended if, legitimately, an appeal is made or a recourse is lodged against privation of or removal from office.

Since ordinary power of governance comes with an office (cf. c. 131), it is lost when the office is lost. This is applicable to both proper and vicarious ordinary power. Ecclesiastical office can be lost by way of resignation, transfer, removal, or privation (cc. 184–196). Since the law foresees that a person might appeal or have recourse against a removal or privation (cf. cc. 1353, 1733–1739), it states that in such a case the power held in virtue of that office is suspended. Hence, until the matter is definitely settled, the person continues to hold the office, but may not exercise the power attached to the office. In the meantime the competent authority must make an appropriate provision (c. 1747, §3).

An excommunicated person is prohibited from discharging any ecclesiastical office, ministries, or functions, and is forbidden to place acts of governance (c. 1331, §1). Should a person nevertheless do so, the acts would be valid, but illicit, unless the excommunication had been declared or imposed, in which case the acts would be invalid (c. 1331, §2, 2°). A suspension forbids either all or some acts of the power of governance and the exercise of all or some rights attached to an office (c. 1333, §1, 2°, 3°). Acts nevertheless placed would be illicit but valid, unless a law or precept had determined that the suspended cleric could not validly place acts of governance after a condemnatory or declaratory sentence (c. 1333, §2).

Common Error, Positive and Probable Doubt

Canon 144 — §1. In factual or legal common error and in positive and probable doubt of law or of fact, the Church supplies executive power of governance for both the external and internal forum.

§2. The same norm is applied to the faculties mentioned in cann. 882, 883, 966, and 1111, §1.

It has been a traditional principle that in the interest of the community the Church supplies jurisdiction when a public ecclesiastical office-holder has placed an act for which he or she had no authority. Such jurisdiction concerns, however, only the executive power of governance. The Church supplies this power when the person acting either was not given such power or was given it ineffectively, or when the act was placed after power granted had expired. Supplying the power of governance is a kind of transfer of the power of governance; it is not a sanation.

It should be noted that the Church supplies the power of governance for the common good or the avoidance of general harm. This implies that normally the prescribed formalities of the law are applicable, but that in certain circumstances because of the common good the Church supplies the lacking executive power.[39]

The Church can supply executive power of governance only for cases where the person acting would have been capable (habiles) of exercising executive power. Thus, it could never supply a lay person the power to hear a confession, because a lay person is not capable under any circumstance of hearing a confession.

The Church supplies the executive power of governance only when there is a common error which is either factual or legal or when there is a positive and probable doubt. Error is a false judgment. Such an error must be probable, i.e., it must be of such a nature that it is capable of gaining the assent of a prudent person. Hence, it is not simply ignorance. The error is to be common, not private; that is, it is to affect some sort of community. Such a community does not necessarily have to be a canonically established community in the sense of a diocese, parish, or religious community. It could also be a community gathered together for one occasion. That an error is "common" does not mean that a majority of those present hold something to be true, but that there is a public circumstance in which all reasonable persons would naturally conclude that it is true. Thus, to establish common error, it is sufficient that a majority of people, when asked, would reply erroneously to the question. It is also not necessary that in fact a certain number of people actually do make the error, for the Church supplies power when, objectively speaking, reasonable persons would make the error. Common error is also not restricted to situations which occur regularly; it may also be applied to an isolated event, such as a case in which a priest receives the profession of a religious of a pontifical institute of consecrated life without having been delegated by the legitimate superior to do so (c. 656, 5°).

Although the canon presupposes the existence of common error, occasions might arise where common error could be induced, e.g., when a priest has no faculty to hear confession, but enters the confessional because many people want to confess and he is sure that in the given situation people will think he has jurisdiction. In such a situation the Church will supply the faculty.

The second part of the first paragraph concerns positive and probable doubt either about the law or about a fact.[40] Doubt is a state in which the mind is not able to make a decision between contradictory conclusions. Doubt is positive when there are probable reasons for one or both decisions, and it is negative when there is too little information to support either. The doubt may be probable or improbable, depending on the strength of the foundation. Doubt may have to do with the law, namely, its existence, binding force, meaning, extension, or cessation. Doubt may also [39] Thus, if a priest who is not properly delegated assists at a wedding, the mere fact that he is a priest is not a sufficient reason for the Church to supply the faculty. There must be some degree of common error. In other words, there must be a congregation or at least a few witnesses who assume the priest is duly authorized, otherwise he would not be up there at the altar. Canonical form (cc. 1108–1118) is to be observed, but when the common good calls for it, the Church will supply the faculty.

[40] On the difference between doubt of fact and doubt of law, see c. 14.

have to do with the facts in the sense that there is uncertainty with regard to whether a situation contains all that is necessary for the law to be applicable to it. Examples would be whether the number of cases for which delegated power was granted has been completed (cf. c. 142); or whether danger of death really exists when a dispensation from a marriage impediment is given (cf. c. 1079).

In the case of positive and probable doubt, the Church supplies the power of governance for both the internal and the external forum.

The second paragraph states that the canon applies to the faculties mentioned in canon 883 on the sacrament of confirmation, canon 966 on hearing confession, and canon 1111, §1 on assisting as an official witness at a wedding. Furthermore, the canon applies to the executive power of all superiors and chapters in institutes of consecrated life (c. 596, §3).

The principles mentioned in this canon are applicable to all delegated faculties. It is not clear whether they also apply to someone who has been delegated invalidly for one particular act.

TITLE IX
ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICES
[cc. 145–196]

The Church has developed various legal structures to carry out its mission of continuing the work of Christ in the world: the listing of common responsibilities arising from Christian initiation for all the Christian faithful (e.g., cc. 208–223), the recognition and promotion of charisms as given by the Spirit, the delegation of individuals for specific tasks (e.g., cc. 137–142), and the institution of ecclesiastical offices. Office provides a key structure in support of the Church's mission, for unlike the other approaches, the creation of an office assures that an important function will be continued in the Church even after the initial officeholder is no longer available. In the Church, an office is a function established in a stable manner by divine or ecclesiastical ordinance, to be carried out for a spiritual purpose by one who has been legitimately named to the office (cc. 145–146).

Historically, ordination and office were tied together. This was the meaning of "relative ordination" as mandated by the early councils of the Church. A person was ordained for service in a particular locality, and was not to move from there. Clergy were identified with the place for which they were ordained. Beginning in the late fourth century, the Roman Empire assured support for clergy through a system parallel to its civil service, but based on this principle of ordination tied to a place. When this form of financial support was lost with the collapse of the empire in the West, a system of "benefice" gradually replaced it; that is, an assured source of income (e.g., from a vineyard, farm, etc.) was tied to the place where the cleric was ordained to serve.

During the Middle Ages, some major shifts took place which affected the Church's discipline on orders and on church offices. With the development of mendicant clergy and due to some other factors, "absolute" ordination was adopted in the West. This meant that ordination was no longer tied to a specific place. At the same time, church offices were recognized as legal entities distinct from their officeholders. But the economic dimension of the office (the benefice system) overshadowed the spiritual function, at least in canon law. Moreover, as a result of the lay investiture controversy, ecclesiastical office became increasingly a clerical concern: only ecclesiastics could confer an office in the Church, and eventually only clergy could be named to church offices.

The 1917 code summed up this clerical monopoly on offices in its canon 145, recognizing a broad sense of office (any function performed for a spiritual purpose), but narrowing the legal use of office to the strict sense of "any function constituted in a stable manner by divine or ecclesiastical ordinance, to be conferred according to the norms of canon law, involving at least some participation in the powers of either orders or jurisdiction." Canon 118 of that code restricted the power of orders and jurisdiction to clergy. Thus, only clergy could be named to church offices. Although offices were divided into benefices and non-beneficiary offices, all of them were restricted to clergy.

The Second Vatican Council affected ecclesiastical offices in several ways. In dealing with financial support for the clergy, the council separated office from benefice, called for a new system of clergy support to replace benefices, and declared that in the future the legal understanding of office was to be any function conferred in a stable manner for a spiritual purpose (PO 20). The council also called for a more active involvement of lay persons in the life and mission of the Church, including many functions which are constituted as offices (AA 24); indeed, the council encouraged bishops to name lay persons to church offices (LG 37).

Keeping these conciliar developments in mind, the drafters of the 1983 code moved the treatment of ecclesiastical offices from the section on clergy, where it appeared in the 1917 code, and located it among the general norms of Book I to make it clear that church offices are no longer restricted to clergy. Similarly, the drafters of the 1990 Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches placed the canons on office in a distinct title by themselves (title XX—CCEO 936–978).

In both codes the material is developed in three stages: an introductory canon on office; canons on conferral of office; canons on loss of office.[1]

Concept of Ecclesiastical Office

Canon 145 — §1. An ecclesiastical office is any function constituted in a stable manner by divine or ecclesiastical ordinance to be exercised for a spiritual purpose.

§2. The obligations and rights proper to individual ecclesiastical offices are defined either in the law by which the office is constituted or in the decree of the competent authority by which the office is at the same time constituted and conferred.

There are four key concepts in paragraph one.

1. An office is a function (in Latin, munus*).*

Offices are not honorific; they involve doing something. As church offices, they entail doing something on behalf of the Church and of Christ. An office is not for one's own sake, but is to be exercised for the sake of other people.

Munus ("function") is frequently used for the threefold ministry of Christ: to teach, to sanctify, and to govern. Offices in the Church participate in these functions in various ways. Some offices are constitutional, central to the organization and functioning of the Church as the continuation of Christ's mission (e.g., pope, diocesan bishop, pastor). Other offices are auxiliary, assisting in but not central to that mission (offices of the Roman Curia or of a bishops' conference, of a diocesan curia or religious institutes).

The function may be a responsibility the officeholder carries out individually; or it may entail collective or collegial action, such as membership in an ecumenical or particular council, in a conference of bishops or on the council of a religious institute, in the presbyteral council or finance council, and so on.

The function carries with it various obligations and rights. These are to be spelled out in the law or by decree of a competent authority (§2). The power needed to carry out an office is attached to it by the law and is termed ordinary power (c. 131, §1); it can be exercised in the officeholder's own name ("proper" power) or in the name of another ("vicarious" power—see c. 131, §2). Even if the law spells out the obligations and rights of an office, a competent authority can further specify the obligations and rights for some offices; for example, the bishop can further specify for individual episcopal vicars (c. 479, §2), or particular law can modify the role of the diocesan chancellor (c. 482, §1).

An officeholder can be given further powers by delegation, but this is in addition to those responsibilities which belong to the office as such. For example, pastors are often delegated additional powers through "diocesan faculties" to carry out various functions over and above those specified for pastors in the canons (see cc. 528–534).

2. An ecclesiastical office must be constituted by divine or ecclesiastical ordinance.

"Ordinance" (in Latin, ordinatio) is a broader term than "law," although laws are an example of ordinances. Ordinances are also contained in some general executive acts (e.g., cc. 29–34) and in statutes (c. 94). Ordinances can have a divine origin (e.g., c. 113, §1); they can also arise from the customs of the community.[2]

Church offices are not created by secular authorities; neither are they created by private individuals or groups. They must have an appropriate canonical origin. This principle calls to mind the tensions of the lay investiture controversy which racked the Church in earlier centuries, and which was settled by emphasizing the Church's control over its own offices.

Commentators commonly list as offices arising from divine ordinance[3] the office of the Petrine ministry (pope), the college of bishops, and the office of diocesan bishop (although the creation of individual dioceses is a matter of ecclesiastical law). Other offices are considered to be constituted by ecclesiastical ordinance.

Some offices come into existence when the juridic structure they serve is created. So, when a diocese is erected, by that very fact the law constitutes the office of diocesan bishop for that diocese (c. 369). When a parish is erected, the law constitutes the office of pastor (c. 515). When the proper authority of a religious institute establishes a province (c. 621) or a house (c. 608), the law itself creates the corresponding office of superior.

Other offices come into existence either when a law creates them (for example, a diocesan law setting up an office of parish religious education director), or when a competent authority establishes one by decree (e.g., the bishop issues a decree constituting the office of diocesan director of ministry to the handicapped).

3. An office is constituted in a stable manner.

"Stable" here can be understood both in an objective sense (i.e., the office itself continues, even when there is no officeholder) and in a subjective sense (i.e., the person named to the office holds it for a notable period of time).

The canon says an office is "constituted" in a stable manner. This is the objective sense of the term, and is in keeping with canonical tradition. An office is created to assure that a given function will continue in the Church, even after the initial officeholder departs. An office exists for the good of the Church and does not depend on the charisma or gifts of a particular officeholder. This is one of the differences between delegation, which is given to an individual, and an office, which has an existence beyond the individual who carries it out.

Although it is not stated in this canon, offices also entail some subjective stability or "tenure" on the part of the officeholder. Indeed, the Second Vatican Council emphasized this, calling an office a function "conferred" in a stable manner (PO 20). It does not make sense to structure a function as an office and then rotate officeholders as through a revolving door. Canon 193 indicates that there are three levels of subjective stability in canon law. Some officeholders are named for an indefinite period of time and in effect have "tenure" for life, e.g., pastors (c. 522). Other officeholders are named for a term, and enjoy stability in office during the length of that term, e.g., a pastor named for a term (c. 522); the diocesan finance officer (c. 494, §2); religious superiors (c. 624, §1); tribunal judges (c. 1422). Finally, there are officeholders who are named at the prudent discretion of the competent authority; but even these enjoy some stability in office, as seen in the discussion of canon 193 below.

Stability does not mean an office is perpetual. Some offices exist only for a time or for certain circumstances, such as those of a diocesan or parish administrator (cc. 430, §1; 540), or that of an official of a synod of bishops (c. 347, §1).

[2] Socha, in Münster Com, 145/2.

[3] CCEO 936, §1 terms it more personally, "by the Lord himself."

When offices and benefices were so closely related, some offices were considered to be juridic persons.[4] This is no longer true. It is more appropriate to speak of an entity as being established as a juridic person, and an office as serving that entity. For example, a public association of the faithful is a juridic person, but the offices of the association are not juridic persons. Similarly, the office of diocesan bishop is at the service of and represents the juridic person which is the diocese (c. 393), but the office is not itself a juridic person.

4. An office is constituted for a spiritual purpose. This is in keeping with the purpose of canon law, for the salvation of souls is the supreme law of the Church (c. 1752). Yet a spiritual purpose is not disembodied, as is clear from such mundane realities as temporal goods in the Church which exist for the spiritual purposes of providing for divine worship, the support of clergy and other ministers, and works of the apostolate and charity (c. 1254, §2).

Anyone who performs a function in the Church ultimately does it for a spiritual purpose, but not all such functions are constituted as offices. For example, workers can be employed without their work becoming an ecclesiastical office (see c. 1286). The Church relies on a variety of volunteers in carrying out its mission, but they are not necessarily appointed to an office. Clergy are ordained for a spiritual service in the Church (c. 1008), but do not as such hold an ecclesiastical office; office is distinct from sacred ordination. Lay persons can be admitted on a stable basis to the ministries of lector and acolyte, but in themselves these ministries do not constitute ecclesiastical offices (c. 230, §1). Other lay persons may supply for certain of the duties of ministers in the Church (c. 230, §3), but of itself this does not confer on them an ecclesiastical office.

When a function is constituted as an ecclesiastical office, the effect is that the person who performs that function for a spiritual purpose does so in the name of the Church. The spiritual purpose is provided not on the initiative of the individual, nor as a result of the person's charisma alone, but primarily as an act of the Church, for officeholders act in the name of the Church when they carry out Christ's priestly, prophetic, or royal functions in virtue of their office.[5]

For a function to be constituted as an ecclesiastical office, all four elements must be present: it must be a function, constituted in a stable manner, through divine or ecclesiastical ordinance, and for a spiritual purpose. It is not required, however, that the office involve the exercise of the power of orders or of governance.[6] Some offices are the source of financial support for the officeholder (see c. 195) although generally offices no longer include the element of a benefice (see c. 1274, §1).

Unresolved Issues

Several issues remain unresolved by the provisions of the code. Who is the authority competent to erect an office? To what extent are the obligations and rights of individual offices inviolable? What is the relationship in practice of office and delegation? Are some of the current "positions" in the Church ecclesiastical offices?

(1) Who is the authority competent to erect an office, for example, to constitute the position of parish religious education director as an ecclesiastical office? Certainly the bishop is competent to do this (see c. 381, §1). Can a vicar general, or an episcopal vicar, or even the pastor of a parish? This raises the issue of whether legislative power is needed to erect an office, or if executive power is sufficient.

The question is posed most acutely by canon 145, §2, which permits the obligations and rights

[4] See Arrieta, in Com Ex, 910–911; Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1036.

[5] Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1025, warns against the danger of bureaucratization which can compromise this spiritual dimension.

[6] This is a major change from the 1917 code, where the legal meaning of office required such participation.

for an office to be specified not only in a law, but also in a decree which both constitutes and confers the office. The word "decree" can be understood in two senses here: a decree which is a law (c. 29) and hence an ordinance of a legislator; and a decree which makes provision of an office (c. 48) and hence an act of someone with executive power.

It is not a question here of activating an office which is already provided for in the law, whether in the code or in particular law, or even in the proper law of an institute of consecrated life or the statutes of a public association. Rather, it is a question of creating a new office. Can an executive decree, such as the appointment to office, result in the creation of an office?

Most commentators on the 1983 code do not address this issue. Socha argues that whatever the kind of decree, it must have sufficient legal force for the office to have objective stability.[7] Hill, on the other hand, argues that it is an administrative, not a legislative, decree and creates a position with subjective stability but without the usual objective stability associated with ecclesiastical office; "it may never have another incumbent" and "is not intended as a permanent position."[8] Huysmans also holds that it is an administrative act, and says it results in either an altogether new type of office, or else an office of a type that happens only rarely in the Church.[9] Arrieta says it results in a true office with objective stability, but may be a temporary office.[10] The Eastern code does not provide much help; it drops the phrase describing the decree as one which both constitutes and confers the office.[11]

As discussed above, "ordinance" can include legislative acts, general executive acts, statutes, and customs. It would seem from this that a vicar general or an episcopal vicar, who enjoy executive power of governance (c. 134), could issue a general executive decree constituting an office and at the same time appointing the first officeholder. However, it is not clear that pastors enjoy that level of executive power.

(2) Can a diocesan bishop change the obligations and rights specified in the law for various offices, such as pastors? This is not a question of dispensing from disciplinary law, but of actually changing by decree the "obligations and rights proper to individual ecclesiastical offices" (c. 145, §2).

The practice has developed in some dioceses to limit the ministry of pastors in certain areas, either as standard policy (e.g., related to marriages), or on an individual basis. A distinction must be made here between regulating the exercise of rights, which ecclesiastical authority is competent to do in view of the common good (c. 223, §2), and the limits placed on lower level legislators against issuing laws contrary to a higher law (c. 135, §2). The bishop is not competent to change the code's listing of obligations and rights for an office, but he is competent to regulate their exercise.

(3) In practice, it can be difficult to distinguish an office from delegation. For example, because of the debate about whether lay persons can be appointed to certain types of offices in the Church (see c. 274, §1), some dioceses have configured their curia not with vicars (who exercise ordinary power in virtue of the office of episcopal vicar), but with "delegates" or "secretaries." These are functions established in a stable manner by the diocesan bishop, which are carried out for the same spiritual purpose for which the office of vicar might have been created.

In effect, these positions are ecclesiastical offices and not just delegation. They fulfill all the requirements of canon 145 for an office, and have been constituted by the competent ecclesiastical authority. Moreover, when the positions become vacant, they are considered "vacant" and not terminated, as would be the case with delegation properly so-called.

[10] Arrieta, in Com Ex, 918; he mistakenly includes as examples offices which are established by the law rather than by decree, but which are temporary.

[11] CCEO 936, §2. The same canon, §3, states that the authority which is competent to establish an office can modify or suppress it, but it does not specify how to determine what authority is competent.

The officeholders, however, are not "vicars." Canon 478, §1 requires that vicars be priests. These new arrangements make it possible for those who are not priests to hold offices in the service of the diocese.

(4) The revised notion of ecclesiastical office found in the present code raises questions concerning various positions in the Church today. Are they offices? For example, under the previous code, commentators considered parochial vicars not to hold an office as such; under the present law, the position is considered an ecclesiastical office (cc. 545–552).

More difficult to determine is the position of a deacon, religious, or lay person who serves a parish in light of canon 517, §2. The only position mentioned in the canon is that of the priest moderator, which appears to be an office (the canon indicates the rights and duties of this priest). What of the person or persons he supervises? Although they serve "because of a lack of priests," their position is not by that fact unstable. It could be temporary, but as noted earlier, an ecclesiastical office can be temporary (e.g., a diocesan administrator who serves until a new bishop takes office). This may be an example of an office which is constituted and conferred in the letter of appointment.

Principals of Catholic schools and those who teach religion there are given special attention in the canons (see cc. 805–806). Do they hold an ecclesiastical office? The local ordinary has the right to name or approve religion teachers; their position is a stable one and is exercised for a spiritual purpose. It is not yet clear from practice whether these positions have the protections and obligations that come with ecclesiastical office.

Those who teach theology in institutes of higher learning, especially those bound to the profession of faith (c. 833, 7°) who now must also take the oath of fidelity, are considered by the latter document to be assuming an office. In some instances their posts may have been erected as ecclesiastical offices, for example, in countries with concordats regulating such positions. In other countries, colleges and universities which have not been erected as public juridic persons probably do not contain ecclesiastical offices in the strict sense, even for teachers of theology.

Significance of Office

What is the practical import of whether a position is an ecclesiastical office? There are several. First, erecting a position as an ecclesiastical office is a commitment by church officials to the people of God that this function is important enough to be assured on their behalf, even when the initial officeholder is no longer available. Second, as will be discussed below, the law sets various criteria for appointment to an ecclesiastical office. It also provides a procedure for appointment which assures that the criteria will be followed. Thus, the law assures the faithful that they will be served by competent ministers. Third, each office has its own "job description" or list of obligations and rights. An officeholder is assured the right to initiative and is held responsible for fulfilling this job description. That is, the officeholder is presumed to be free to do what is needed to carry out the obligations and rights of the office without need for further authorization, unless this is explicitly required (see c. 138: ordinary power is to be interpreted broadly). On the other hand, there are established expectations to which the officeholder can be held accountable by the proper church authorities. This safeguards both the officeholder and the interests of the community. Finally, the law establishes criteria and procedures for loss of office; it is not done at the whim of a superior. This safeguards the interests of both the officeholder and the community, as well as the concerns of higher authorities.[12]

If a position has not been erected as an office, are there any safeguards for people who perform these important services in the Church today?[13] One safeguard could be contracts, which in canon law generally have the same force as in secular law (c. 1290). Another approach could be a standard diocesan employment policy which incorporates the various safeguards the canons provide for ecclesiastical offices. But it can be questioned why parallel systems need to be developed, when canon law already provides a time-tested system of offices to provide for "human resources" in the Church's mission. If the system of ecclesiastical offices is not being respected in practice, there is little reason to hope that other systems will be effective either.

[12] CCEO 937 provides a further practical import, requiring that adequate means be available before erecting an office, both for the office's operations and to remunerate the officeholder.

PROVISION OF ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICE
[cc. 146–183]

Chapter 1 of title IX deals with the provision or conferral of ecclesiastical offices. It states some general norms, and then details the various systems for conferring an office. The general norms deal with the need and systems for conferring an office, called "canonical provision" (cc. 146–147), the authority competent to make provision (c. 148), the qualifications needed to receive an office (c. 149), and some limitations in the conferral of office (c. 150–156).

GENERAL NORMS ON PROVISION [cc. 146–156]

Canonical Provision

Canon 146 — An ecclesiastical office cannot be acquired validly without canonical provision.

This is a basic principle of canon law, formerly contained in the very notion of an ecclesiastical office (CIC 145, §1).[14] The former code even stated what constitutes provision of an office: "concession of an ecclesiastical office by a competent ecclesiastical authority according to the norms of the sacred canons" (CIC 147, §2).

Because canonical provision is required for validity, any attempt to exercise an office without having received it by canonical provision would be invalid. For example, a priest who tried to take over as pastor of a parish without a proper appointment would not validly assist at a marriage there (see c. 1109).

Canonical provision assures church control over church offices. Since an ecclesiastical office involves acting in the name of the Church, some intervention of church authority is required, whether immediately or remotely (e.g., through legislation approving various ways of making canonical provision).

Canon 147 — The provision of an ecclesiastical office is made: through free conferral by a competent ecclesiastical authority; through installation by the same authority if presentation preceded it; through confirmation or admission granted by the same authority if election or postulation preceded it; finally, through simple election and acceptance by the one elected if the election does not require confirmation.

There are three stages to acquiring an ecclesiastical office: the selection of the candidate, the conferral of the office, and taking possession of the office. This canon describes the various systems for the first two stages.[15]

In free conferral, the same person selects the candidate and confers the office. Presentation means one person selects the candidate(s), another confers the office. Election involves the selection of the candidate according to an electoral process, with conferral by another authority or, in certain cases in which confirmation of the election is not required, free acceptance by the one

[14] See also CCEO 938.

[15] CCEO 939 is similar but does not mention presentation; other Eastern code canons include presentation in practice (e.g., CCEO 284, §2, religious as pastors).

elected. Postulation is similar to election, but involves the need to dispense an impediment which the electors recognize even as they still desire the candidate. These four systems are discussed in detail below.

Most commentators consider this list to be taxative; i.e., these are the only ways in which canonical provision can take place. The final item in the listing in the canon begins with "finally" (in Latin, tandem), which normally indicates this is a closed list. Erdö has demonstrated, however, that the code itself contains other methods, for example, prescription for offices not involving the exercise of sacred orders (c. 199, 6°), or the immediate assumption of the office of administrator by persons so designated in the case of an impeded see (c. 413).[16] As Erdö points out, there appears to be a doubt of law here, and canonical provision by lawful means other than those listed in the canon would be valid in light of canon 14.

The key element in any system of provision is the actual conferral of the office, for at this stage one normally acquires the office (ius in re). Church authority is always involved at this stage, whether in actually conferring the office, in legislating a system whereby one acquires the office (for example, through accepting election), or in approving statutes in which an office is created.[17] Various systems of selection, such as presentation or an election which needs confirmation, give the candidate only a right to be named (ius ad rem), but not the office itself. The third element of conferral, taking possession, usually does not require any particular formality; this is needed only for certain offices involving more important pastoral responsibilities.[18] In these cases, the office itself (ius in re) is acquired only when possession takes place.

Competent Authority

Canon 148 — The provision of offices is also the competence of the authority to whom it belongs to erect, change, and suppress them unless the law establishes otherwise.

"Competent authority" is a phrase used repeatedly in the code, but seldom specified. In this canon, it is specified by referring to the authority who is competent to erect, alter, or suppress an office; but this merely pushes the issue back one degree, without clarifying further the issue of competency.

In some cases competency is clear: the supreme church authority is competent to erect, alter, or suppress an episcopal conference, province, or diocese (cc. 449, §1; 431, §3; 373); the diocesan bishop for parishes (c. 515, §2); the superior specified in the constitutions for erecting various units of a religious institute (cc. 581; 609, §1); and so on. In other cases, as discussed above, there is some question as to the competence of those who do not possess legislative power, although it appears that ordinaries may be included among these competent authorities.

An office can be "erected" either by implementing provisions already existing in law (e.g., when the Holy See erects a diocese, or a diocesan bishop erects a parish) or by the creation of a new office not foreseen in existing law through the promulgation of a new law, the issuing of a decree by a competent authority, the development of a custom, etc.

To "alter" an office can mean to change the configuration of the office (e.g., change the boundaries of a diocese or parish, which changes

[17] For example, in the approval by a competent ecclesiastical authority of the statutes of a public juridic person (c. 117), or specifically of a public association of the faithful (cc. 312, 314) and of the constitutions of a religious institute (c. 587, §2). This would also include the statutes of a parish, which as a public juridic person is to have statutes approved by the competent ecclesiastical authority, but whose statutes could specify various offices within the parish, and who is competent to confer them.

[18] For example, diocesan bishop (c. 382, §2), coadjutor and auxiliary bishops (c. 404, §§1 and 2), pastor (c. 527), and the moderator of a pastoral team in solidum (c. 527). The formalities for taking possession of a parish can be dispensed (c. 527, §2).

the extent of the office of the diocese's bishop or parish's pastor—see c. 515, §2); it can also mean to change the obligations and rights which make up the office.[19] The common interpretation of "alter" in this context is to change the configuration or boundaries.

To "suppress" an office is either to suppress the entity which it serves (e.g., to close a parish involves suppression not only of the juridic person of the parish but also of the office of pastor of that parish) or to terminate an office which is not directly tied to such an entity (e.g., to suppress the office of diocesan director for some activity). Some offices are beyond the competence of the diocesan bishop to suppress, for example, the offices of vicar general, judicial vicar, chancellor, and diocesan finance officer (cc. 475, §1; 1420, §1; 482, §1; 494, §1). He is, however, competent to name these officials because this is specifically stated in the canons.

The "law establishes otherwise" in the cases just cited, and also, for example, in canon 509, which gives the diocesan bishop the right to name canons to a chapter of canons even though canon 504 reserves to the Apostolic See the erection, alteration, or suppression of a cathedral chapter. Similarly, a diocesan law could restrict to the diocesan bishop the erection, alteration, or suppression of the office of a parochial assistant (or parish religious education director, or some other parish office), but it could give the pastor the right to name people to these offices.

Those who claim a right to select the candidate, whether through presentation, election, or postulation, have the burden of proof, since theirs is an exception to the general principle stated in this canon.[20]

[19] Only the supreme authority can change the body of obligations and rights set by the general law of the Church for an office (e.g., diocesan bishop or parish pastor). Other offices, which are created by particular law, custom, or decree of a competent authority, can be altered by that same authority through combining them, dividing them, or in other ways redesignating the obligations and rights which pertain to those offices.

Qualifications for Office

Canon 149 — §1. To be promoted to an ecclesiastical office, a person must be in the communion of the Church as well as suitable, that is, endowed with those qualities which are required for that office by universal or particular law or by the law of the foundation.

§2. Provision of an ecclesiastical office made to one who lacks the requisite qualities is invalid only if the qualities are expressly required for the validity of the provision by universal or particular law or by the law of the foundation. Otherwise it is valid but can be rescinded by decree of competent authority or by sentence of an administrative tribunal.

§3. Provision of an office made as a result of simony is invalid by the law itself.

The canon sets two general criteria for determining the suitability of a person for ecclesiastical office, leaving to the detailed norms governing individual offices the listing of more specific qualifications. It then discusses what happens when the individual lacks the required qualities. Finally, it addresses the problem of simony.

Communion

The canon requires the person to be "in the communion of the Church." It does not specify what this involves.[21]

Negatively, the candidate must not be under a declared or imposed penalty of excommunication; this renders the exercise of an office invalid (c. 1331, §2, 4°). Similarly, the candidate must not have publicly abandoned the Catholic faith or the Church's communion, for this entails the ipso facto loss of office (c. 194, §1, 2°).

[21] See discussion in Arrieta, Com Ex, 931; Chiappetta Com 1996, nn. 1049–1050. For a contrary opinion, see Socha, in Münster Com, 149/2.

CCEO 940, §1 makes no mention of communion as a required quality for provision of office.

Positively, something more than the mere fact of being baptized is needed. An office is exercised on behalf of the Church, so an officeholder must have a positive commitment to the Church. Many commentators take this to mean the person must be a Catholic in "full communion";[22] but the text of the canon does not call for this and a more nuanced view is needed.

First, the canon sets a qualification for candidates which limits the free choice of those who make provision for office; because it is a limitation on their right, the canon is subject to a strict interpretation (see c. 18). Second, the text of the canon itself does not say "full communion" and a strict interpretation must stay with the wording of the text. Third, some canons do require full communion as a qualification for office; e.g., member of a diocesan pastoral council (c. 512, §1), or advocate in a tribunal (c. 1483, which requires the advocate to be a "Catholic" unless the diocesan bishop permits otherwise). If some canons call for full communion as a qualification for office, then the communion required for other offices need not be "full."[23]

Arrieta points out that the degree of communion may vary depending on the office.[24] For example, some offices require the profession of faith (c. 833). Others can be exercised only in hierarchical communion (e.g., cc. 336; 375, §2). Offices which entail the full care of souls can be held only by priests (c. 150).

But could a bishop name a non-Catholic Christian to a diocesan office for which the person is suited (e.g., finance officer or member of the diocesan finance council) if that person is committed to carry out the work in keeping with the bishop's directives and according to the norms of church law? In contrast to the norms on pastoral councils, which require that the lay members be "in full communion with the Catholic Church," members of the diocesan finance council are characterized only as "Christian faithful" without the further requirement of full communion.

Moreover, as disciplinary, non-constitutive law, this qualification can be dispensed in individual cases by the diocesan bishop to permit non-Catholics and even qualified non-Christians to hold an individual ecclesiastical office, provided there is a sufficient reason to do so (see c. 87, §1) and it is not a situation involving procedural law (although, as noted above, procedural law gives the bishop the authority to permit non-Catholics to be named advocates). However, an officeholder acts in the name of the Church and the usual experience is that Catholics are named to offices in the Catholic Church. In the exceptional situation when a non-Catholic is named to an office, it must be clear that the person is informed about the Catholic Church and committed to carry out the office in an appropriate manner.[25]

Suitable

The other qualities required by universal law in general are quite broad. Some offices require priestly orders (c. 150) or sacred orders (c. 199, 6°). There is the question of offices which entail the exercise of the power of governance, which canon 274, §1 says only clergy are capable of receiving, but this restriction is open to question in [22] In addition to Socha, see Aymans, 460; García Martín, 492–493; Huysmans, 314; Manzanares, in Salamanca Com, 114; McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 88; and Urrutia, n. 809. Some take it as evident that "full communion" is meant, or cite another commentator in support of their position. Others give reasons; see Socha (cites analogous canons in the code), García Martín (only those in full communion are subject to ecclesiastical law, c. 11), and Manzanares (office serves the communion). Urrutia, however, holds that full communion is only for the liceity, not the validity, of the appointment.

[23] For discussion of "full communion," see c. 205.

[24] Arrieta, in Com Ex, 931.

[25] A parallel situation is that of a non-Catholic named to a teaching position on an ecclesiastical faculty. Although a non-Catholic is not given a missio canonica but a venia docendi, it is likely that faculty positions in these institutions are ecclesiastical offices. On the appointment of non-Catholic teachers, see SCCE, "Ordinationes ad Constitutionem Apostolicam 'Sapientia Christiana,'" April 29, 1979, art. 18, AAS 71 (1979) 505.

light of exceptions within the law itself (e.g., lay persons can hold the office of judge on an ecclesiastical tribunal; c. 1421, §2). Other qualifications in universal law are set down for individual offices, e.g., bishop (c. 378, §1), pastor (c. 521), parochial vicar (c. 546), religious superior (c. 623), novice director (c. 651, §1), diocesan finance officials (cc. 492, §1 and 494, §1), tribunal officials (cc. 1420, §4; 1421, §3; 1435), etc. But frequently the specifics are left either to the prudential judgment of the superior who is making canonical provision, or to particular or proper law, the law of foundation, or the statutes.

The most common types of qualifications in the code deal with age and experience, academic qualifications or equivalent expertise, character and reputation, and length of time in an organization or in a specific sacred order. There are also restrictions based on blood relationship (e.g., cc. 478, §2 and 492, §3).

The "law of the foundation" is the law established when an office is set up. If it is connected to an ecclesiastical foundation, see canons 1299–1310. Otherwise, the "law of the foundation" is frequently found in the statutes for the office or for the entity it serves (e.g., a public association of the faithful).

Qualifications Missing

Two possibilities are foreseen in canon 149, §2: the qualifications for an office are expressly required for validity, or they are not required for validity. Appointment of a person who lacks the qualifications expressly required for validity is invalid; otherwise, the appointment of a person lacking the qualifications is valid, but it can be rescinded.

Only in a few canons are qualifications for an office expressly and explicitly required for valid appointment.[26] Negatively, a person under a declared or imposed excommunication cannot validly acquire an office (as stated expressly in c. 1331, §2, 4°; see discussion above concerning communion).

In canonical tradition, however, an express requirement can also be stated implicitly (see discussion at c. 10). Here a number of questions arise. How does one determine an implicit but express requirement of a qualification for valid appointment to office? When several qualifications are listed, are all for validity, or are only some, and how can one tell these apart?

Consider the qualifications for judges on a diocesan tribunal (cc. 1420–1421). The judicial vicars and their adjutants "must" (esse debent) have certain qualifications (priestly orders, unimpaired reputation, degree in canon law, at least thirty years old). In contrast, other judges "are to be" (sint) of unimpaired reputation and degreed in canon law. Are any, some, or all of these qualifications for validity? "Valid" is not explicitly stated in the canons; is validity at least implied by the verb "must"? Can it be found implicitly in the subjunctive "are to be"?[27]

A more difficult problem is posed regarding other offices, such as a bishop's vicars. These exercise the power of governance by office, so theoretically must be priests (c. 274, §1), although, as just noted, this canon admits of exceptions and there may even be a doubt of law as to whether it binds for validity.[28] Although some have held that the bishop's vicars exercise the full care of souls and so must be priests in virtue of canon 150,[29] vicars general and episcopal vicars are limited to the external forum (c. 478, §2) and do not have by office all the authorizations and responsibilities involved in the full care of souls (e.g., Mass for the people, sacrament of anointing). But when the qualifications for a bishop's vicars are given (c. 478, §1), "valid" is not expressly stated explicitly, and the [26] For example, see cc. 150; 425, §1; 521,§1; 546; 623.

[27] This is not only a question of whether the judges have degrees in canon law; but on that topic, see G. Read, "At Least a Licentiate in Canon Law," CLS-GBIN n. 61 (June 1984) 34–36, and the criticism of his views by J. Beyer, "Iudex laicus vir vel mulier," P 75 (1986) 34–35.

[28] See also c. 129, where clergy are "qualified" and lay persons "can cooperate" in the exercise of the power of governance.

[29] For example, J. Alesandro, in CLSA Com, 389, cites c. 150 as a reason why vicars must be priests.

verb form ("are to be"—sint) appears weak in terms of an implicit requirement for validity.[30]

These issues should be resolved in each case, keeping in mind the intent of the canon which presumes that an appointment to office is valid unless a missing qualification is expressly required for validity, in accordance with the intent of the revision of the code, which was to reduce the number of invalidating laws.[31]

Effects of Qualifications Missing

If the missing qualification was for validity, the conferral of the office was invalid. Any actions taken in virtue of the office would themselves be invalid. For example, a pastor who lacked a qualification required for valid appointment would not validly assist at marriages in virtue of his office.[32] The actions of a finance officer, religious superior, tribunal judge, etc., taken in virtue of the office, would be invalid if the appointee lacked a qualification required for validity.

If the missing qualification was not required for validity, the appointment is valid and whatever the officeholder did in virtue of the office would itself be valid. However, because of the missing qualification the appointment could be rescinded. The canon lists two ways in which this could happen.

The first is a decree of a competent authority. The competent authority could be the one who conferred the office, or that person's superior, or even the Apostolic See (in virtue of papal primacy). This is not a removal from office but a declaration that the appointment is rescinded due to a missing qualification. It therefore is not subject to the procedures and causes listed in canon 193, but the authority would have to follow the provisions of canons 50–51 and 54 on administrative acts. The lack of qualification could be brought to the competent authority's attention by others (see cc. 57; 212, §§2–3), or may be initiated by the authority.

The second method of rescinding the appointment of someone lacking a qualification for an office is the decision of an administrative tribunal. This provision could be a remnant of the system of administrative tribunals proposed in drafting the code but dropped before its promulgation.[33] On the other hand, it could be the basis of competence for administrative tribunals if they are established by competent authority in dioceses or larger jurisdictions. The only existing administrative tribunal is the Apostolic Signatura.[34]

Simony

Simony is the attempt to buy or sell spiritual things for material benefit. It can be carried out by the one seeking the office, the one conferring the office, or a third party unknown to the recipient. The simony could be active or passive.[35] It is, in effect, an attempt at bribery.

Simony should not be confused with paying a tax or fee for administrative expenses, or with the gift of a donor establishing a new foundation or office. However, care must be taken that the gift is truly for the office, and not an attempt to purchase the position for a given individual.[36]

Limitations in Conferral of Offices

Several limitations or restrictions are placed on those conferring offices. These are based on whether [30] In practice, bishops generally deal with this situation by naming as "secretaries" or "delegates" those who are not priests but carry out responsibilities which might otherwise be done by episcopal vicars.

[31] See Principle 3 for the revision of the code; see also discussion in García Martín, 72.

[32] However, if the diocesan faculties also included delegation from the bishop to assist at any marriages within the diocese, the priest's assistance at a marriage would be valid by that fact.

[33] This might be inferred from the Eastern code, where there is no mention of administrative tribunals in this context; see CCEO 940, §2.

[34] See PB, art. 123, §3. Prior to PB the Second Section of the Signatura was referred to as an administrative tribunal; see RE, art. 106–107.

[35] García Martín, 498.

[36] In addition to simony, CCEO 946 declares null any provision of office made because of serious fear unjustly inflicted, fraud, or substantial error.

the office entails the care of souls (cc. 150–151); the burden of work involved (c. 152); the availability of the office (cc. 153–154); the effect of supplying for another (c. 155); and the written form for provision (c. 156).

Offices with Care of Souls

The "care of souls" refers to the pastoral activity of the Church to teach, sanctify, and govern the people of God. While the ultimate purpose of church law is the salvation of souls, the "care" of souls is the official activity whereby authorized persons provide ministry to people with a view to their salvation.

The care can be "full" or partial. Offices with the full care of souls encompass the full pastoral work of the Church at the appropriate level, carried out by diocesan bishops for their dioceses, pastors for their parishes, and some chaplains for specialized groups of people (c. 564).[37] This care is addressed to believers and non-believers (c. 771, §2). Other offices share in this pastoral care in part, although they do not entail the "full" care of souls (for example, coadjutor and auxiliary bishops [c. 407 §3], parochial vicars [545, §1], deacons and lay persons involved in the care of souls [c. 517, §2], some chaplains [c. 564]).[38]

The concept of an office with the care of souls is used to set a qualification for appointment to some offices (c. 150), and an expectation concerning the time limit in filling any offices with the care of souls (c. 151).

[37] Socha, in Münster Com, 150/3–4, includes as well those who are equivalent in law to a diocesan bishop (see c. 368), the pastor of a quasi-parish (c. 516), and possibly the bishop of a military ordinariate (SMC, n. 11, §1, AAS 78 [1986] 483) and a parish administrator (in the sense of c. 540, §1).

[38] Socha, in Münster Com, 150/4–5, also lists vicars general and episcopal vicars (c. 473, §2), members of the chapter of canons (c. 503), the canon penitentiary or the priest with his function (c. 508), vicars forane (c. 555), chaplains for students (c. 813), rectors of churches (c. 556), superiors in institutes of consecrated life or societies of apostolic life (cc. 618–619, 717, 734), missionaries (c. 784), etc.

Canon 150 — An office which entails the full care of souls and for whose fulfillment the exercise of the priestly order is required cannot be conferred validly on one who is not yet a priest.

This is an example of a qualification expressly and explicitly required for valid appointment to an office. It is limited to offices with the full care of souls; it does not limit who can be appointed to offices involved with partial care of souls (e.g., c. 517, §2). It is in addition to whatever other qualifications may be stated in law (e.g., cc. 378, §1; 521, §2), and is repeated expressly for pastors of parishes (c. 521, §1).

The clause "for whose fulfillment the exercise of the priestly order is required" explains and specifies the meaning of an office entailing the full care of souls. Because priestly orders are required to fulfill the office as such, only those who have been ordained priests can be named to such offices. Deacons, including those about to be ordained priests, cannot be named to such an office until they have received priestly ordination.[39]

Canon 151 — The provision of an office which entails the care of souls is not to be deferred without a grave cause.

The implication of this canon is that these are the most important offices in the Church; provision of other offices can be deferred, but not these, unless there is a grave cause.[40]

The canon applies to any system for the provision of these offices, including free conferral, presentation, and election.[41]

No specific standard of time is set by the canon. The office must not be filled precipitously, for it is necessary to attend to what is needed for the care of souls (which is the primary consideration). For example, it takes time to conduct the consultation mandated prior to appointing bishops (c. 377, §3) or pastors (c. 524).

[39] Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1056, lists offices for which presbyteral orders are required, whether with full care of souls or not.

[40] CCEO 941 uses a different standard: offices conferred without a term are not to be deferred.

On the other hand, some canons require action within three months at least to propose one or more candidates for any office (by presentation, election, or postulation; see cc. 158, §1; 165). Many commentators argue that the conferral of the office itself must take place within three months after the presentation, election, or postulation; otherwise, recourse can be taken to a higher authority in virtue of canons 57 and 1734–1739.

In the case of a diocesan administrator, "deferral" is limited to a maximum of eight days or the college which is to elect loses its right to do so for that time (c. 421, §1).

The canon includes the possibility of an exception for a "grave cause." Who determines when a cause is grave? If the provision is by a competent authority, that person decides. If a group is to make the provision (e.g., by presentation or election), the authority who is to supply for their inaction is competent to determine if there is a "grave cause."

The gravity of the cause depends on the office to be filled and the care of souls it entails. Examples could include a lack of qualified candidates or a shortage of priests for offices requiring priestly orders.[42]

There is no immediate sanction for not complying with this canon. In the former code, if the time limit was not met, the right to appoint for some offices devolved to a higher authority.[43] This is no longer the case. Failure to comply with this canon does not affect the validity of an appointment, but could constitute negligence of office (see c. 1389, §2).

Incompatible Offices

Canon 152 — Two or more incompatible offices, that is, offices which together cannot be fulfilled at the same time by the same person, are not to be conferred upon one person.

Generally speaking, incompatibility depends on the officeholder; what is too much for a given person to take on becomes incompatible. The inability to fulfill the several offices could be for various reasons, such as the impossibility of being in two places at the same time,[44] personal conditions of physical or mental health, language requirements, etc.

However, the law does establish some offices as incompatible. For example, the same person cannot be at the same time the diocesan administrator and the diocesan finance officer (c. 423, §2); vicar general or episcopal vicar, and canon penitentiary (c. 478, §2); major superior and provincial finance officer (c. 636, §1); promoter of justice and defender of the bond in the same case (c. 1436, §1); judge or assessor in a subsequent instance if the person acted in any of several capacities in an earlier instance (c. 1447).[45]

Appointment to incompatible offices, however, does not affect the validity of the appointment. The new appointment is valid, but it could be rescinded in light of canon 149, §2.[46] The fact of in-

[42] McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 89; Socha, in Münster Com, 151/2.

[43] Arrieta, in Com Ex, 937.

[44] Diocesan bishops (c. 395, §1) and pastors (c. 533, §1) are to reside in their respective places; this would seem to prohibit being bishop of two dioceses, or pastor of two parishes, at the same time. But the Apostolic See dispenses to permit the first, and the law authorizes the bishop to permit exceptions to residence (c. 533, §1) and thus makes possible the second.

[45] García Martín, 502, and Socha, in Münster Com, 151/1–2, also list seminary rector and spiritual director (c. 239, §§1–2), and major superior and novice master (cc. 620, 651 §3) as incompatible. They also consider the ineligibility of relatives of the bishop for certain offices to be a type of incompatibility, although strictly speaking this does not involve two offices for the same person.

[46] Manzanares, in Salamanca Com, 155, holds that the earlier office is lost when the incompatible office is assumed; this was true under the 1917 code, but is no longer the case. McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 90, agreeing that incompatibility does not affect validity, notes that it is hard to see how it does not. On the other hand, CCEO 942 permits appointment to incompatible offices in a case of "real necessity."

compatibility in the sense of too much for a particular person to take on would be a legitimate impediment leading a cleric to decline an appointment by his bishop (c. 274, §2).

Vacant Offices

An office is vacant when there is no officeholder. The vacancy can be by law (de iure), in which case there is no one with a legal claim to the office; and by fact (de facto), in which case there is no one who actually is holding the office.

Canon 153 — §1. The provision of an office which by law is not vacant is by that fact invalid and is not validated by subsequent vacancy.

§2. Nevertheless, if it concerns an office which by law is conferred for a determined period of time, provision can be made within six months before the expiration of this time and takes effect from the day of the vacancy of the office.

§3. A promise of some office, no matter by whom it is made, produces no juridic effect.

The first paragraph states the general rule which affects the validity of provision: the office must be vacant by law (de iure) in order to make provision of it. An attempt to provide someone with an office before it is legally vacant is not corrected by a subsequent vacancy; a new provision would be needed.

The second paragraph provides for an exception to the general rule. If the office is held for a limited term,[47] a new officeholder can be named six months or less before the end of the current term and takes over when the current term ends. For example, within six months of the end of the term of a pastor, his replacement can be named; similarly, a new religious superior can be named or elected within six months of the current superior's end of term.[48] The office becomes vacant and the new officeholder takes over when the competent authority communicates the term's end in writing (c. 186).

The Apostolic Signatura has ruled that the transfer of several pastors (serving without a term) which was to take place simultaneously on the same day was invalid because the offices were not vacant at the time the appointments were made.[49] Such a system for appointments is not uncommon. These could be considered promises until the date of effectiveness. Since a promise has no effect (§3), the appointment could be changed without any formalities until the date of effectiveness. Or this may be a situation where competent authority prescribes otherwise in a transfer (see c. 191, §1).

Canon 154 — An office vacant by law, which may still be possessed illegitimately by someone, can be conferred provided that it has been declared properly that the possession is not legitimate and mention of this declaration is made in the letter of conferral.

Two actions are required. The declaration of illegitimate possession would resolve any questions about possession in good faith leading up to prescription for an office not requiring priestly orders (cc. 198, 199, 6°). The mention of de facto possession in the letter of conferral prevents the new officeholder from any surprises. Some authors consider this mention to be required for validity of the appointment, but it is only for liceity.[50]

Supplying for Another

Canon 155 — A person who confers an office in the place of another who is negligent or impeded

[47] On the concept of limited term, see discussion at c. 186.

[48] Hill, in CLSA Com, 101, points out that dispensation by the Apostolic See is possible for provisions prior to the six months.

[49] McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 90, discusses the principles involved.

[50] For example, Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1065; Hill, in CLSA Com, 101; and McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 91, say it is for validity. But the "provided that" (dummodo) is in the canon, not in an administrative act (where it would have an invalidating effect—c. 39); see Arrieta, in Com Ex, 946; García Martín, 505–506; Urrutia, n. 818.

acquires no power thereafter over the person upon whom the office was conferred. The juridic condition of that person, however, is established just as if the provision had been completed according to the ordinary norm of law.

The negligence can be due to an inability to act (ill, exiled, or prohibited from exercising office [e.g., c. 415]), or division within an electoral body, or simple failure to act. The general law permits supplying for negligence when the time limits are not met in presentations (c. 162), elections (c. 165), or postulation (c. 182, §2). It may also happen if a competent authority fails to act in time and recourse is taken to a superior (c. 57).

The purpose of the canon is to clarify that the one who supplies does not by that fact acquire any authority over the officeholder, who remains subject to the usual hierarchical order as if the provision happened properly.

In Writing

Canon 156 — The provision of any office is to be put in writing.

This provides proof of the provision. Most commentators do not consider it necessary for the validity of the provision itself, but there are important arguments that appointment is not effective until the appointee is notified in writing.[51]

Article 1: Free Conferral [c. 157]

Canon 157 — Unless the law explicitly establishes otherwise, it is for the diocesan bishop to provide for ecclesiastical offices in his own particular church by free conferral.

In free conferral, the same authority selects the candidate and confers the office. The canon applies this to diocesan offices, where the diocesan bishop and those equivalent to him in law (but not other local ordinaries unless otherwise specified[52]) is presumed to exercise free conferral within his church.

The general law contains various exceptions. Some pastors are named through presentation or election (c. 523; for example, the pastor of a parish committed to religious); at least about half the members of the presbyteral council are elected (c. 497, 1°). Particular law and the law of foundation can set other exceptions.

Before deciding on a candidate for some offices the bishop is to consult others but he retains free conferral; e.g., diocesan finance officer (c. 494, §1), canons of the cathedral chapter (c. 509, §1), naming of pastors (c. 524); naming a religious to a diocesan office (c. 682, §1).

Free conferral is also exercised by the Roman Pontiff (e.g., c. 377, §1 for naming bishops), and by religious superiors in keeping with their proper law (e.g., c. 625, §3 on naming of other superiors by the supreme moderator).[53]

Once named by free conferral, the person acquires the right to the office (ius ad rem) and the office itself (ius in re), unless, as for offices such as pastor (c. 527), one must take possession to have the office in full right (ius in re).

Article 2: Presentation [cc. 158–163]

In free conferral, one person or group has the right to select one or more candidates, but a separate competent authority installs (confers) the office. Examples include a diocesan bishop submit-

[51] García Martín, 507, argues that it is required for validity by c. 54, §2; Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1067, points out that curial acts of an ordinary must be signed to be valid (c. 474).

[52] See cc. 565 (chaplains), 805 (religion teachers), and 830 (censors of books) for exceptions where local ordinaries exercise free conferral.

[53] See Chiappetta Com 1996, nn. 1070–1080, for lists of who freely confers which offices in a diocese.

ting three names for auxiliary bishop (c. 377, §4), or a religious superior presenting candidates for a diocesan office such as pastor (c. 682, §1).

Canon 158 — §1. Presentation for an ecclesiastical office by a person who has the right of presentation must be made to the authority to whom it belongs to install in that office. Moreover, this must be done within three months from notice of the vacancy of the office unless other provision has been made legitimately.

§2. If some college or group of persons has the right of presentation, the person to be presented is to be designated according to the prescripts of cann. 165–179.

The first rule here is that presentation is made to the person competent to confer the office (see c. 148). Presentation gives the candidate no right to the office (no ius ad rem), but does limit the competent authority to considering only the candidate(s) presented.

The second rule is that presentation must be made within three months of notice of vacancy.[54] Exceptions must be "legitimate"; i.e., by law or custom. The law permits an additional month if the candidate refuses (c. 161). There is no time limit set for installing (conferring) the office by competent authority, but failure to act after three months gives rise to the situation of canon 57.

The third rule in the canon applies to groups which have the right to present; they are to select the candidate as if it were an election, although the one thus chosen does not acquire any right to the office, since it is a presentation. No norm is given for how an individual is to select a candidate, but particular law, the law of foundation, or the statutes can require consultations and other processes.

Canon 159 — No one is to be presented unwillingly; therefore, a person who is proposed for presentation and questioned about his or her intention can be presented unless the person declines within eight useful days.

This is a case when silence is understood as consent. It applies only to whether the name can be submitted; the person can still decline the installation (c. 161, §2). To compute "useful time," see canon 201, §2.

Canon 160 — §1. The person who possesses the right of presentation can present one or even several persons, either at the same time or successively.

§2. No one can present oneself; a college or group of persons, however, can present one of its own members.

Presentation can be of one or several persons. If of several persons, they can be named all at the same time, or in successive times. Proposing other names after the first does not mean the first is withdrawn, or that the first has necessarily been refused; but it does give the competent authority a choice among those presented (see c. 163).[55]

Canon 161 — §1. Unless the law establishes otherwise, a person who has presented one found unsuitable can present another candidate within a month, but once more only.

§2. If the person presented renounces or dies before the installation, the one who has the right of presentation can exercise this right again within a month from the notice of the renunciation or death.

There are three situations in which the three-month time limit is extended. The first is when the candidate has been found unsuitable by the competent authority.[56] The second is when the [54] In light of c. 162, García Martín, 514, and Socha, in Münster Com, 158/2, clarify that this is "useful time" (see c. 201, §2).

[55] Although one cannot present one's self for an office, Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1097, describes how exceptions could be worked out.

[56] Recourse is possible against this judgment (see c. 1734) which suspends the time because it suspends the execution of the decree.

candidate declines to be installed. The third is when the candidate dies before installation. In each case, an additional month is given in which to present a new candidate. The following canon characterizes this month as "useful time."

Canon 162 — A person who has not made presentation within the useful time according to the norm of can. 158, §1 and can. 161 as well as one who has twice presented an unsuitable person loses the right of presentation for that case. The authority to whom it belongs to install freely provides for the vacant office, with the assent, however, of the proper ordinary of the person appointed.

This canon enforces the time limits for presentation, but also respects the rights of ordinaries and religious superiors. For example, if a religious superior has failed to meet the time limits, or has twice presented two unsuitable candidates for pastor of a religious parish, the bishop has the right to free conferral for the religious parish this one time. But the bishop has to obtain the assent of the religious superior if he names one of the institute's members as pastor.

Canon 163 — The authority competent to install the person presented according to the norm of law is to install the one legitimately presented whom the authority has found suitable and who has accepted. If several persons legitimately presented have been found suitable, the authority must install one of them.

Installation by the competent authority completes the provision of office by presentation. It involves three steps by the competent authority: determination of the candidate's suitability (see c. 149); determination that the candidate is willing; and the actual installation or conferral of the office, which is to be in writing (c. 156). If several candidates were presented, the competent authority must select which one to install from among those who are suitable and willing. The candidate acquires the right to the office (ius ad rem) and the office itself (ius in re), unless, as for offices such as pastor (c. 527), one must take possession to have the office in full right (ius in re).[57]

ARTICLE 3: ELECTION [cc. 164–179]

Through election, an electoral body selects the candidate for an office. The elected person obtains the office either by accepting the election, if no confirmation is needed,[58] or by being confirmed by a competent authority.

Canon 164 — Unless the law has provided otherwise, the prescripts of the following canons are to be observed in canonical elections.

The first place to look for how to conduct an election is in the statutes, proper law, and particular law governing an electoral body. The canons in this article are obligatory for situations not otherwise resolved by the electoral body's own law. This point is repeated in several canons which follow (cc. 165, 167, 174, 176, 179).

Convening the Electors

Canon 165 — Unless the law or the legitimate statutes of a college or group have provided otherwise, if a college or group of persons has the right of election to office, the election is not to be delayed beyond three months of useful time computed from the notice of the vacancy of the office. If this limit has passed without action, the ecclesiastical authority who has the right of confirming the election or the right of providing for the office successively is to make provision freely for the vacant office.

[57] Chiappetta Com 1996, nn. 1108–1113, lists possible presentations in the code, how the right of presentation can cease definitively, and how it can be suspended.

[58] For example, the Roman Pontiff (c. 332, §1), diocesan administrator (c. 427, §2), supreme moderators of various religious institutes (c. 625, §1).

If a shorter or longer time is not set by the electoral body's own law or other law, it must act within three months ("useful time") of notice of a vacancy to conduct the election or risk losing the right to elect for this time. The competent authority to confirm some elections is given in the code;[59] others are set in proper law. For some offices which do not need confirmation, the law specifies who is to make the provision called for in this canon.[60]

Where the vacancy has not yet occurred, the convocation and election would both be invalid,[61] unless it were a case of an office whose term will run out in six months (c. 153, §2).

Canon 166 — §1. The person presiding over a college or group is to convoke all those belonging to the college or group; the notice of convocation, however, when it must be personal, is valid if it is given in the place of domicile or quasi-domicile or in the place of residence.

§2. If anyone of those to be convoked was overlooked and for that reason was absent, the election is valid. Nevertheless, at the instance of that same person and when the oversight and absence have been proved, the election must be rescinded by the competent authority even if it has been confirmed, provided that it is evident juridically that recourse had been made at least within three days from the notice of the election.

§3. If more than one-third of the electors were overlooked, however, the election is null by the law itself unless all those overlooked were in fact present.

Convocation is by the one who presides according to the group's statutes or the law, or who is otherwise specified in law (e.g., c. 419). The group's rules may specify how convocation is to be made (personally, or by notice, edict, etc.). The convocation is to include the reason why the group is being convened, and the time and place it will meet (c. 167, §1).

All belonging to the college or group are to be convoked, although some commentators argue that it is not necessary to convoke some.[62] If one-third or less are not called, the election is valid but rescindable (§2); if more than one-third are not convoked, the election is invalid by the law itself (§3). In either case, if the persons who were not convoked actually are present, the election is valid and not rescindable.

Individuals who were overlooked and not present for the election have three days from notice of the election to have recourse. It will be necessary to prove that they should have been convoked, were overlooked, were not present, and have made recourse within three days of notice of the election itself. Recourse is to be made to the authority competent to confirm the election; if the election did not need confirmation, recourse is to the authority to whom the group is subject. If the facts are proven, the authority has no choice but to rescind the election.

Canon 167 — §1. When the notice of the convocation has been given legitimately, those present on the day and at the place determined in the same notice have the right to vote. The faculty of voting by letter or proxy is excluded unless the statutes legitimately provide otherwise.

§2. If one of the electors is present in the house where the election occurs but cannot be present at the election due to ill health, his or her written vote is to be sought by the tellers.

Canon 168 — Even if a person has the right to vote in his or her own name under several titles, the person can vote only once.

[59] See, for example, cc. 317, §1; 352; 509, §1.

[60] See, e.g., c. 421. In contrast, no competent authority is specified for failure to act in other situations; see cc. 413, §2 and 452, §1.

[61] García Martín, 521.

[62] García Martín, 524: various members who cannot vote need not be called; Urrutia, n. 835: those certainly impeded (c. 167, §2) or who are not capable of voting (c. 171) need not be called. This affects who is to be included among those "to be convoked" in paragraph two or the total number used to determine the number of electors in paragraph three; the group's statutes should clarify the issue.

Elections to an office normally are held in a place designated in the convocation. The statutes could provide for other arrangements (e.g., ballot by mail).

Likewise, unless otherwise specified, the quorum for an election is a majority (over half) of those who must be convoked (c. 119, 1°).

To vote, one must be present in the place at the time of the election. Thus, proxy votes are not usually allowed, although the statutes could provide for them.[63] However, if an elector is ill and not able to come to the room where the election is held but is in the house where the election is held (or in a house attached to that building or at least on the same grounds[64]), the tellers can go to the person for a written ballot.

Only one vote per person is allowed, even if an elector holds several positions which would give the right to vote.[65] On the other hand, if an elector who is present also exercises proxy votes for others, the same person could cast in addition as many ballots as proxies.

Validity of the Election

Canon 169 — For an election to be valid, no one can be admitted to vote who does not belong to the college or group.

Canon 170 — An election whose freedom actually has been impeded in any way is invalid by the law itself.

In these two cases the election itself is invalid. Persons other than the electors can be present for the election, but they cannot vote nor can they impede the freedom of the election itself.

The impairment of freedom is of the electoral group as such; it invalidates if it truly exists and is not just a threat, no matter how the impediment occurs.[66] Anyone who impairs the freedom of an election can be punished in keeping with canon 1375.

Validity of the Vote

Canon 171 — §1. The following are unqualified to vote:

1° a person incapable of a human act;

2° a person who lacks active voice;

3° a person under a penalty of excommunication whether through a judicial sentence or through a decree by which a penalty is imposed or declared;

4° a person who has defected notoriously from the communion of the Church.

§2. If one of the above is admitted, the person's vote is null, but the election is valid unless it is evident that, with that vote subtracted, the one elected did not receive the required number of votes.

To vote, one must be eligible. Four sources are given for ineligibility to vote. Incapable of a human act are infants (c. 97, §2), persons who lack the use of reason habitually (c. 99), or who temporarily are deprived of this ability due to illness, drugs, trauma, etc. Active voice is the right to vote; passive voice is the right to be elected.[67] The right to vote can be taken away or restricted as an expiatory penalty (c. 1336 §1, 2°–3°). An excommunication is a medicinal penalty; if it is incurred latae sententiae and has not been declared, the person is eligible to vote. Only when it has been properly declared or imposed does it

[64] Hill, in CLSA Com, 104; Socha, in Münster Com, 167/3.

[65] Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1133; Hill, in CLSA Com, 104; and Socha, in Münster Com, 168/1 hold that the statutes could permit a person several votes if each office is a distinct basis for voting; other commentators do not mention this.

[66] Socha, in Münster Com, 170/2–3, lists ten ways in which an election's freedom can be impeded.

[67] For elections to the presbyteral council, c. 498 specifies who has active and passive voice; religious lack active and passive voice who are exclaustrated (c. 687) and who have become bishops (authentic interpretation of April 29, 1986, AAS 78 [1986] 1324).

render one ineligible (cf. c. 1331, §2, 2°). To be notorious, defection from the Church's communion must be public by law (e.g., declared by competent authority) or in fact known. Most commentators equate this defection from communion with breaking the bonds of canon 205, but the phrase in canon 171 is more nuanced.[68] Leaving by a formal act is not required, only that the defection be notorious; it is also not required that the person join another church or religion.[69]

The issue of eligibility becomes significant in close votes. To assure stability in office it is important to verify prior to the election the eligibility of electors if any questions arise.

Canon 172 — §1. To be valid, a vote must be:

1° free; therefore the vote of a person who has been coerced directly or indirectly by grave fear or malice to vote for a certain person or different persons separately is invalid;

2° secret, certain, absolute, determined.

§2. Conditions attached to a vote before the election are to be considered as not having been added.

If a vote is to be valid, not only must the elector be eligible to vote, but the elector's action must satisfy five criteria. The vote must be:

Free: this is one of the situations where the "law provides otherwise" regarding a juridic act (c. 125, §2), giving invalidating force to grave fear or dolus ("deceit," here translated as "malice"), whether direct or indirect. The "therefore" (ideoque) clause specifies the coercion is to vote for a certain person or different persons separately. It would appear the clause is illustrative, not limiting, in the sense that whatever coercion, fear, or dolus is brought to bear regarding the content of a vote would invalidate. If, however, the clause is substantive and not merely illustrative, a strict interpretation (required because it is an exception to c. 125, §2) would seem to limit the invalidating force.[70]

Secret: at least at the time of casting the vote, who votes for whom is not to be made known.[71]

Certain: there is no doubt that the elector intends to vote, and for whom the vote is cast; it would not be certain if it were illegible or blank.

Absolute: the vote itself contains no extrinsic conditions.

Determined: no doubt regarding the person for whom the vote is cast; it would not be determined if, for example, the vote were for "a or b."[72]

Conditions which may have been made prior to the vote are considered worthless in law and do not affect the validity of the vote. But if they were contained in an actual ballot, that individual ballot would be invalid.

Conducting the Voting

Canon 173 — §1. Before an election begins, at least two tellers are to be designated from the membership of the college or group.

[68] CCEO 953, §1, 3° is more explicit, specifying the Catholic Church.

[69] Does this mean a non-Catholic Christian is ineligible to vote in a canonical election? It would seem so, since electoral bodies in the Church are composed of Catholics. However, experiments with non-Catholic members of various movements directed toward ecumenism raise special issues, which need to be resolved according to the statutes of these movements.

[70] Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1146. However, Miñambres, in Com Ex, 999, cautions that the legislator is not giving an exhaustive list of how freedom can be restricted, but does specify that it should relate to the vote and not to something else. Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 166, holds that fraud, fear, or coercion unjustly inflicted would invalidate whether it was to vote for or against a specific person. However, Urrutia, n. 849, says the vote would not be invalid if the coercion were to exclude voting for someone; Socha, in Münster Com, 142/2, agrees and adds that it would also not invalidate if directed toward voting disjunctively (for A, or B, or C). García Martín, 533, observes that the canon does not address the prohibition against voting for a determined person.

[71] Urrutia, n. 852, observes that secrecy is not affected if the tellers know. Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1148, gives an example of one who is incapable of writing and asks the tellers to complete the ballot.

[72] CCEO 954, §1, 2° adds for the last four criteria that any contrary customs are reprobated.

§2. The tellers are to collect the votes, to examine in the presence of the one presiding over the election whether the number of ballots corresponds to the number of electors, to count the votes themselves, and to announce openly how many votes each person has received.

§3. If the number of votes exceeds the number of electors, the voting is without effect.

§4. All the acts of an election are to be transcribed accurately by the secretary and are to be preserved carefully in the archive of the college after they have been signed at least by the same secretary, the one presiding, and the tellers.

Particular law or the statutes of the electoral body may specify a greater number of tellers, and may provide for alternative methods for voting besides ballots (e.g., raising hands, unanimous acclamation, etc.).[73] They may specify how to include proxies in determining the number of votes cast and what disposition is to be made of the ballots.[74]

Canon 174 — §1. Unless the law or the statutes provide otherwise, an election can also be done by compromise, provided that the electors, by unanimous and written consent, transfer the right to elect on that occasion to one or more suitable persons, whether from among the membership or outside it, who are to elect in the name of all by virtue of the faculty received.

§2. If it concerns a college or group composed of clerics alone, those commissioned must be ordained; otherwise the election is invalid.

§3. Those commissioned must observe the prescripts of the law concerning elections and, for the validity of the election, the conditions attached to the compromise agreement which are not contrary to the law; conditions contrary to the law, however, are to be considered as not having been attached.

Canon 175 — The compromise ceases and the right to vote returns to those authorizing the compromise:

1° by revocation by the college or group before any action was taken;

2° if some condition attached to the compromise agreement was not fulfilled;

3° if the election had been completed but was null.

Compromise is a usual option unless the law or statutes rule it out.[75] Unanimous written consent is required to proceed with this method of electing. It frequently is used to resolve tensions in the electoral body or to negotiate a difficult situation. As an exception, it permits persons who are not members of the electoral body to be commissioned to act on its behalf.

The electoral body can attach conditions to the compromise agreement; provided they are not contrary to law, these conditions are binding on those commissioned to carry it out. The electoral body can also cancel the compromise process, but only before any action has been taken by those commissioned.

The Election

Canon 176 — Unless the law or the statutes provide otherwise, the person who has received the required number of votes according to the norm of can. 119, n. 1 is considered elected and is to be announced as such by the one presiding over the college or group.

Canon 177 — §1. An election must be communicated immediately to the person elected who must inform the one presiding over the college or [73] Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1149, disagrees, because these would violate secrecy. His concern would have to be addressed if such alternatives are allowed by particular law or statutes.

[74] CCEO 955, §4 requires the ballots to be destroyed after each ballot or session; see comparable provisions in CIC 171, §4.

[75] John Paul II has eliminated compromise as a means for electing the pope; apconst Universi Dominici gregis, February 22, 1996, n. 62, AAS 88 (1996) 331. Compromise is not included in the Eastern code.

group whether or not he or she accepts the election within eight useful days after receiving the notification; otherwise, the election has no effect.

§2. If the one elected has not accepted, the person loses every right deriving from the election and does not regain any right by subsequent acceptance but can be elected again. A college or group, however, must proceed to a new election within a month from notification of non-acceptance.

Canon 119, 1° is presented as a fall-back provision if nothing is specified in law or the electoral body's statutes. Canon 119, 1° requires an absolute majority (fifty percent plus one) of the votes cast for election on the first and second ballots; if a third ballot is needed, only two candidates are to be voted on (the ones with the most votes; or, if that does not resolve it, the two senior in age with the most votes);[76] if a tie results, then the one senior in age is elected.

The votes are announced by the tellers (c. 173, §2); the formal announcement of who is elected, however, is by the one presiding over the electoral body and brings this stage of the process to a close.

But the winner must first accept the election before the full electoral process is complete. If this step is omitted, the election has no effect.

The communication to the winner, usually by the one presiding over the electoral body, is to be given "immediately." There is no penalty for delay, except that if it goes beyond the three months to conduct the election the right to elect this time is lost.

The person has eight "useful days" (c. 201, §2) to accept or decline. If the person declines or fails to respond within this time, a new election has to be conducted within one month. In the meantime, the person loses any rights acquired from the earlier election but is eligible for election again.

Acquiring Office

Canon 178 — The person elected who has accepted an election which does not need confirmation obtains the office in full right immediately; otherwise, the person acquires only the right to the office.

Canon 179 — §1. If the election requires confirmation, the person elected must personally or through another seek confirmation from the competent authority within eight useful days from the day of acceptance of election; otherwise, the person is deprived of every right unless it has been proved that the person was prevented from seeking confirmation by a just impediment.

§2. The competent authority cannot deny confirmation if the person elected has been found suitable according to the norm of can. 149, §1, and the election was conducted according to the norm of law.

§3. Confirmation must be given in writing.

§4. Before being notified of confirmation, the person elected is not permitted to become involved in the administration of the office, whether in matters spiritual or temporal, and acts possibly placed by the person are null.

§5. Once notified of the confirmation, the one elected obtains the office in full right unless the law provides otherwise.

If the election does not need confirmation (e.g., pope, diocesan administrator, some supreme moderators), by accepting the election the one elected immediately obtains the office in full right (ius in re) provided all other requirements of law are met.[77] No further formalities are required.

If the election needs confirmation, acceptance gives the one elected a right to the office (ius ad rem), but obtaining the office in full right (ius in [76] Here is where particular law or statutes could simplify matters. If one candidate received the highest number, and several candidates received the next highest, is the run-off between the two senior of all the candidates in this pool? Or is it between the one with the highest number, and the senior of those in the second group?

[77] For the pope, episcopal consecration must come first if the one elected is not a bishop (c. 332, §1). If an election is held in the six months before an office becomes vacant (c. 153, §2), taking office is postponed until the vacancy of the office by written notification of the end of the term to the person being replaced (c. 186).

re) occurs only after the process of confirmation has taken place. This process is initiated by the one elected, not the electoral body, and must be done within eight "useful days" of accepting the election under penalty of being deprived of the effects of the election. The competent authority must make a judgment about the suitability of the one elected, and about the lawfulness (not just the validity) of the election itself. If satisfied on both matters, confirmation must be given, and in writing.

Meanwhile, the one elected is to abstain from involvement in the office itself until notified of the confirmation; even then, law can provide further delay.[78]

Article 4: Postulation [cc. 180–183]

Postulation is a vote by an electoral body for a candidate who is known to be canonically impeded from an office. A competent authority must determine whether to admit the postulation and grant a dispensation from the impediment. The postulated candidate receives the office upon acceptance after dispensation.

Postulation is carried out in the same manner as an election, with the exceptions or specifications which follow.

Canon 180 — §1. If a canonical impediment from which a dispensation can be and customarily is granted prevents the election of a person whom the electors believe to be more suitable and whom they prefer, by their votes they can postulate that person from the competent authority unless the law provides otherwise.

§2. Those commissioned to elect in virtue of a compromise cannot postulate unless this was expressed in the compromise.

The impediment must be of ecclesiastical law, and one that is usually dispensed. Examples include age, academic degree, ineligibility for reelection, etc.[79]

The person does not have to be objectively the most suited; rather, the electors have to consider this candidate more suitable than others and prefer this choice to others.

An electoral body should always consult its statutes and applicable law to determine whether postulation is ruled out in the case at hand.[80] Moreover, those commissioned to elect by compromise may postulate only if that is included in the compromise agreement.

Canon 181 — §1. At least two-thirds of the votes are required for a postulation to have force.

§2. A vote for postulation must be expressed by the words, I postulate, or the equivalent. The formula, I elect or I postulate, or the equivalent is valid for election if there is no impediment; otherwise it is valid for postulation.

The members of the electoral body must be aware of the impediment, and of their desire for the candidate despite the impediment. To assure this, the law requires explicit mention of postulation in the ballots cast for the impeded person, and sets a higher standard for election (two-thirds instead of one-half plus one).[81]

[78] For example, if installation is required after confirmation; or until the end of the current officeholder's term in an election held early in light of c. 153, §2.

[79] Urrutia, n. 883, claims it cannot be because the person is not "suitable," although he does not explain why. Socha, in Münster Com, 180/1, disputes this. The key is really whether the impediment is one which is usually dispensed. For the Eastern churches, however, this restriction does not apply (CCEO 961).

[80] Miñambres, in Com Ex, 1023, reports that some authors claim that because there is no provision in the canons on religious for postulation, the restrictions of the previous code apply and for elections at chapters postulation must be authorized in the constitutions. This would not seem applicable in light of c. 6, §1, 1°, but it would be advisable to address the point in constitutions.

[81] CCEO 962 does not require specific wording for postulation.

If a third ballot is needed, a candidate without the impediment is elected by an absolute majority (c. 119, 1°); only a candidate with an impediment requires the two-thirds.

Canon 182 — §1. A postulation must be sent within eight useful days by the one presiding to the authority competent to confirm the election, to whom it pertains to grant the dispensation from the impediment, or, if the authority does not have this power, to petition the dispensation from a higher authority. If confirmation is not required, a postulation must be sent to the authority competent to grant the dispensation.

§2. If a postulation has not been sent within the prescribed time, by that fact it is null, and the college or group is deprived of the right of electing or postulating for that occasion unless it is proved that the one presiding had been prevented from sending the postulation by a just impediment or had refrained from sending it at the opportune time by malice or negligence.

§3. The person postulated acquires no right by postulation; the competent authority is not obliged to admit the postulation.

§4. Electors cannot revoke a postulation made to a competent authority unless the authority consents.

Unlike in an election, in a postulation it is not the candidate but the one presiding over the electoral body who must submit the postulation to the competent authority.

If the election requires confirmation, the postulation is sent to that authority. If it does not require confirmation, it is sent to the authority who can dispense.

The time limit of eight "useful days" is important; if it is not observed, the postulation is not only null but the electoral body loses its right to elect for this time. However, in addition to the usual caution that "useful time" does not run when a person is impeded (c. 201, §2), the effect of the delay can also be avoided by proving that the presiding officer failed to act in due time because of "malice" (dolus) or negligence. These facts can be brought to the competent authority by any member of the electoral body which would lose its right.[82]

Once it has been sent to a competent authority, a postulation is entirely in that person's hands. Unlike an election where the candidate acquires a right to the office (ius ad rem), no such right is acquired with postulation and it is up to the authority's discretion whether to proceed or not. Moreover, if the electors ask to withdraw the postulation, the authority is free to decide whether to grant their request or to proceed with the postulation.[83]

If the authority decides to proceed with the postulation, it must determine whether the postulation was carried out legally and the candidate is otherwise suited for the office; if both are true, it must determine who is authorized to grant the dispensation.

The dispensation itself is to be given by one who is competent to dispense. In a case where the election does not need confirmation, this is done by the authority to whom the postulation was sent. If the election needs confirmation, the dispensation is given by the one competent to confirm if that person has the authority to dispense; otherwise, that authority must seek the dispensation from an authority competent to dispense. This latter is free to dispense or not.

A just cause is required for the dispensation (c. 90). It is for the authority which grants the dispensation to determine the sufficiency of the cause.

Canon 183 — §1. If a postulation has not been admitted by the competent authority, the right of electing reverts to the college or group.

§2. If a postulation has been admitted, however, this is to be made known to the person postulated, who must respond according to the norm of can. 177, §1.

[82] Socha, in Münster Com, 182/3.

[83] CCEO 963, §4 does not permit the electors to seek to revoke a postulation.

§3. A person who accepts a postulation which has been admitted acquires the office in full right immediately.

Unlike an election where the candidate is asked to agree before the results are sent to a competent authority for confirmation, the candidate is not contacted until the authority has determined to admit the postulation. In light of paragraph three, this contact is not made until the dispensation has been granted. Thus, if the person accepts, all that needs to be done has taken place and the person obtains the office in full right (ius in re).[84]

CHAPTER II
LOSS OF ECCLESIASTICAL OFFICE
[cc. 184–196]

General Norms on Loss of Office [cc. 184–186]

An office is constituted in a stable manner. It is conferred, however, with varying degrees of stability for the officeholder. In addition to death, which is not listed in the code, there are various other ways by which office can be lost, all involving some intervention of a competent authority. Thus office is never to be lost without at least those who have the responsibility to fill it being notified.

This chapter has three preliminary canons and four articles. It begins with the following statement of general principles.

Canon 184 — §1. An ecclesiastical office is lost by the lapse of a predetermined time, by reaching the age determined by law, by resignation, by transfer, by removal, and by privation.

§2. An ecclesiastical office is not lost by the expiration in any way of the authority of the one who conferred it unless the law provides otherwise.

§3. Loss of an office which has taken effect is to be made known as soon as possible to all those who have some right over the provision of the office.

In addition to the six ways listed in the canon, there are other ways by which office can be lost. These include death, suppression of the office by competent authority (see c. 148), reasons determined by proper or particular law (see c. 624, §3) or in contracts, and for some offices the expiration of the authority that conferred them (see c. 481, §1).[85]

Unless the law specifies otherwise, office is not lost by the expiration of the authority that conferred it. Unless competent authority intervenes, office is not lost by psychic or physical disability, by incompetence, or by bad behavior. Even when someone is impeded from carrying out official duties, the office is not vacant, only impeded.

Because various people can have rights to provide for an office, all of them are to be notified, for example, the cardinals on the death of the pope, the bishop and the religious superior on the death of a pastor who is a religious.

Canon 185 — The title of emeritus can be conferred upon a person who loses an office by reason of age or of resignation which has been accepted.

Usually this is not automatic but requires the intervention of a competent authority. However, in the case of a bishop, the law itself confers the title.[86] In addition to the situations mentioned in [84] This may not happen immediately, of course, if taking possession is required, or until a vacancy occurs at the end of the current officeholder's term (c. 186) in an election held early in light of c. 153, §2.

[85] CCEO 965, §1 covers these by the phrase "besides other cases prescribed by law."

[86] Canon 402, §1 applies this to bishops of dioceses; it has been extended to other bishops (e.g., in the Roman Curia, papal diplomatic corps, etc.); see CFB, "Normae de episcopis ab officio cessantibus," October 31, 1988, Comm 20 (1988) 167–168.

the canon, there are other situations in which the title may be conferred when judged appropriate by the competent authority.[87]

Canon 186 — Loss of an office by the lapse of a predetermined time or by the reaching of a certain age takes effect only from the moment when the competent authority communicates it in writing.

Some offices are or can be conferred for a term, or "predetermined time."[88] Once the term is up, the person loses the protection of the term (see c. 193, §2) but remains in office until notified by the competent authority.

If an age limit has been set by law, once the age is reached, the person remains in office until notified. There are no age limits set in the code, but particular law may do so.[89] Cardinals (c. 354), bishops (cc. 401, §1 and 411), and pastors (c. 538, §3) are asked to resign when they reach seventy-five, but this is resignation, not loss of office upon reaching a predetermined age.

In both cases, written notification is required for the cessation from office to take effect, seen by some as an application of canon 54, §2.[90]

[87] See Gefaell, in Com Ex, 1041; Hill, in CLSA Com, 109; Socha, in Münster Com, 185/2.

[88] Examples in the code include episcopal vicars who are not auxiliary bishops (c. 477); pastors and priests jointly entrusted with pastoral care of a parish, who are appointed for a term (c. 522); members of the presbyteral council (c. 501, §1) and finance council (c. 492, §2); the college of consultors as such (c. 502, §1) and the diocesan pastoral council as such (513, §1); vicars forane (c. 554, §2); religious superiors (c. 624, §1); moderators of secular institutes (c. 717, §1) and societies of apostolic life (c. 734); judicial vicars, adjutant judicial vicars, and tribunal judges (c. 1422). Other offices can be established with limited terms by particular law, law of foundation, or statutes.

[89] Various officials of the Roman Curia are retired at 65, 70, or 75 years; see Regolamento generale della Curia Romana, February 4, 1992, art. 43, AAS 84 (1992) 220–221.

[90] As García Martín, 561, argues, this applies to all methods for loss of office which require direct intervention of competent authority.

ARTICLE 1: RESIGNATION [cc. 187–189]

Resignation is a request initiated by an officeholder to leave the office. If no confirmation was required to obtain the office, resignation consists in notifying those responsible for providing for the office. Otherwise, it must be submitted to a competent authority and does not become effective until that authority gives notice of acceptance in writing.

The article deals with who can resign (cc. 187–188) and the process of resignation (c. 189). Understood but not stated in the canons is that only one who holds an office can resign that office.

Who Can Resign

Canon 187 — Anyone responsible for oneself (sui compos) can resign from an ecclesiastical office for a just cause.

Resignation is a juridic act; this canon highlights one of the aspects of what is required for a juridic act (cc. 124–126). To be "responsible for oneself" or sui compos requires the person to be of sound mind. Someone suffering from severe mental illness, a mentally disabling stroke, a coma, or otherwise lacking the use of reason (c. 99) is not capable of resigning an office.

The just cause can be the good of the individual as well as the good of the Church, or the good of the office being resigned. It should be proportionate to the importance of the office.

Commentators are divided on whether the canon establishes a right to resign.[91] It at least states a right to submit a resignation.

[91] The right to resign is held by Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 175; Gefaell, in Com Ex, 1047; and Hill, in CLSA Com, 109. García Martín, 568, argues that competent authority can refuse a resignation, so the canon does not establish a right of the officeholder vis-à-vis authority. Urrutia, n. 900, claims that particular law can prohibit resignation as under the former code, in which case there would be no "right" to resign.

Canon 188 — A resignation made out of grave fear that is inflicted unjustly or out of malice, substantial error, or simony is invalid by the law itself.

Resignation is not only initiated by the officeholder, and not someone else; it must also be a free act of the officeholder. This canon reinforces the freedom of any juridic act as it applies to resignation.

Not mentioned is an irresistible extrinsic force, whether physical, chemical, or whatever.[92] Canon 125, §1 considers an act placed under such a circumstance as non-existent.

Canon 188 is an example of a case in which "the law provides otherwise," as mentioned in canon 125, §2. Unjustly inflicted grave fear and "malice" or "deceit" (dolus) do invalidate the juridic act of resignation; without this provision, these factors would not invalidate but would make the resignation rescindable. The threatened evil which produces the fear must be at least grave in the estimation of the officeholder, and its source must be external to the person.

The process for removing a pastor provides an example of force which is justified (c. 1742, §1). For just cause a bishop can remove a pastor, but first he must give the pastor an opportunity to resign, which is resignation under pressure but the pressure is justified.[93]

Substantial error is a mistaken judgment which affects the essential elements of resignation, in terms of either the cause or motivation for resignation, or the nature of resignation and its consequences.[94] An example could be a diocesan finance officer who mistakenly thinks one must resign when a new bishop is named even though one's term has not expired.

Simony invalidates resignation as it does conferral of office (c. 149, §3). In effect, one cannot "buy off" someone by enticing the person to resign for material considerations, although one could freely resign to accept a "golden parachute" which does not buy the resignation, but does provide added incentive for it.

Because invalidity in these circumstances is by the law itself, the office does not become vacant even though the resignation may have been accepted. The officeholder or another aggrieved party may take recourse to the competent authority for a declaration of the nullity of resignation.

Process of Resignation

Canon 189 — §1. To be valid, a resignation, whether it requires acceptance or not, must be made to the authority to whom it pertains to make provision of the office in question; this must be done either in writing, or orally in the presence of two witnesses.

§2. The authority is not to accept a resignation which is not based on a just and proportionate cause.

§3. A resignation which requires acceptance lacks all force if it is not accepted within three months; one which does not require acceptance takes effect when it has been communicated by the one resigning according to the norm of law.

§4. A resignation can be revoked by the one resigning as long as it has not taken effect; once it has taken effect it cannot be revoked, but the one who resigned can obtain the office by some other title.

The canon distinguishes resignations which need acceptance from those which do not. Although no general principle is given in the code for determining which category an office belongs to,[95] a practical rule seems to be that no acceptance of resignation is needed if the office did not require direct intervention of competent authority to confer it.[96]

If no acceptance is needed, resignation must be communicated to the authority competent to make provision (e.g., college of cardinals for the pope, college of consultors for diocesan administrator). This may be done in writing, or orally in the presence of two witnesses, although particular law could require a specific formality. The resignation takes effect immediately upon its legitimate communication to the competent authority, although its effect may be suspended until the one resigning specifies when it is to take effect if this condition was made in the resignation itself (e.g., "I resign effective noon tomorrow").

If acceptance is needed, the effect of the resignation is determined by the competent authority. In addition to receiving proper written or oral communication of the resignation, the authority must also judge whether the person acted freely and responsibly, and whether the cause is just and sufficient to warrant resignation.

If the competent authority does not act within three months, the answer is considered to be negative (§3). Recourse can then be taken if the person seeking to resign so decides.

The competent authority can also refuse the resignation directly, or can accept it. If the resignation is accepted, this must be communicated in writing to the one resigning in order to take effect. There are several reasons for this, even though it is not expressly required in this canon.[97] First, written notification is the general norm for an individual decree to take effect (c. 54, §2). Second, appointment to the office was an administrative act for offices requiring provision, installation, or confirmation; revocation of this act by accepting the resignation takes effect when it is legitimately made known to the officeholder (c. 47). Third, it is required for the provision of paragraph four to make sense; that is, how could one know whether it is still possible to revoke the resignation, if it took effect without the person being properly notified?

If the authority fails to act within the three months, the resignation lacks all force; therefore, the competent authority cannot subsequently accept the resignation. A new resignation would be required. The Holy See has adopted the practice of accepting a bishop's resignation within the three months but qualifying this as nunc pro tunc, i.e., the effect of the resignation is suspended until some future time to be determined by the Apostolic See. But the Apostolic See must then determine that the resignation has taken effect for the office to become vacant, a condition for appointing the successor (c. 153, §1).

The person resigning can also specify when the resignation will take effect if this is done in the letter of resignation. If competent authority accepts the resignation, the resignation will take effect as specified in the letter and the officeholder cannot be removed in the meantime except for cause and following the appropriate procedure for removal.[98] However, if the officeholder submits a "standing resignation" which can be accepted whenever the competent authority decides, the resignation would cease to have any force after three months.[99]

Article 2: Transfer [cc. 190–191]

Transfer is initiated by the competent authority and results in the vacancy of one office and the provision of another. It need not necessarily carry a negative connotation, but it can be imposed as a penalty (c. 1336, §1, 4°).

[97] Because the 1983 code does not include the 1917 code's requirement that acceptance of resignation be communicated in writing to be effective, the commentators are divided. Some hold it is necessary for the acceptance to be effective: Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1234; García Martín, 569; Gefaell, in Com Ex, 1057–1058; Heimerl and Pree, 139; Huysmans, 342; Socha, in Münster Com, 189/5. Others say it is not: Manzanares, in Salamanca Com, 128, and Urrutia, n. 255.

[98] Hill, in CLSA Com, 110; but see limitations on this for resignation of pastors when the process of removal has begun (c. 1743).

[99] Hill, in CLSA Com, 110, and McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 106. Gefaell, in Com Ex, 1056, agrees that such a practice does not appear correct, but claims the code does not exclude it; he does not give a reason, however, or explain why the three-month limit would not apply.

Canon 190 — §1. A transfer can be made only by a person who has the right of providing for the office which is lost as well as for the office which is conferred.

§2. If a transfer is made when the officeholder is unwilling, a grave cause is required and the manner of proceeding prescribed by law is to be observed, always without prejudice to the right of proposing contrary arguments.

§3. To take effect a transfer must be communicated in writing.

The first paragraph clarifies the authority competent to effect a transfer. If that authority does not have the right to provide for both offices, a different process would be required, such as resignation or removal from one office, and provision by another competent authority of the new office.

If the officeholder is willing, a just cause is still required for a transfer. It can be for the common good, the service of the Church, or the good of the officeholder personally.[100] No formalities are stated in the code, other than that the transfer be in writing (§3). Particular law could provide additional procedures.

If the officeholder is unwilling, a grave cause is required. The competent authority is the judge of the gravity of the cause, in light of the offices involved and the circumstances;[101] these should be expressed in writing for the eventuality of a recourse against the transfer. Moreover, the procedure prescribed by law is to be observed. A specific procedure is provided in the code only for the transfer of pastors (cc. 1748–1752) and for transfer as a penalty (penal law must be followed); proper law is to provide for the transfer of superiors (c. 624, §3). Particular law could provide other procedures, but must always provide for the officeholder to propose arguments against the transfer. If the officeholder is under contract, the terms of the contract must be respected.[102] All other transfers are at least subject to the procedures of canons 50–51, since a transfer is expressed in a decree (§3).

If there is no general or particular law governing the transfer, and it is not a penal transfer, a more detailed process could be developed for an individual case by relying on laws passed in similar circumstances (c. 19).[103]

A decree of transfer must be communicated in writing to take effect; it is subject to recourse, which suspends its effect.[104]

Canon 191 — §1. In a transfer, the prior office becomes vacant through the canonical possession of the other office unless the law provides otherwise or competent authority has prescribed otherwise.

§2. The person transferred receives the remuneration assigned to the prior office until the person has taken canonical possession of the other office.

In the transfer of a diocesan bishop the law provides otherwise (c. 418) to the extent that he is no longer diocesan bishop but administrator of the prior diocese until he takes possession of the new one.

Competent authority may make other determinations in the case of various transfers simultaneously.[105]

If recourse has been taken against a decree of transfer, the prior office remains occupied de iure while the recourse is resolved. If no recourse has been taken, the prior office becomes vacant

[100] García Martín, 570.

[101] The type of the officeholder's subjective stability will affect the gravity of the cause; see c. 193, §§1–3.

[102] See cc. 1290 on contracts, 192 on removal when a contract is involved.

[103] Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1243; Socha, in Münster Com, 190/3–4; Urrutia, n. 913. Gefaell, in Com Ex, 1063, considers the general prescriptions of law and equity to be sufficient in cases of transfer involving lesser stability.

[104] Gefaell, in Com Ex, 1064; see cc. 1734, §1; 1736, §1; 1747, §3; 1752.

through canonical possession of the new office. If the officeholder fails to take possession of the new office, the prior office remains occupied de iure and further action (e.g., decree declaring vacancy) would be needed for it to become de iure vacant.

Particular law can make other provision for remuneration, provided there is no loss to the officeholders involved. The canon protects against double reimbursement, as well as loss.

Article 3: Removal [cc. 192–195]

Removal results in loss of office; it differs from transfer in that, of itself, it does not include provision with another office. It carries the connotation that the officeholder is not conducting the office properly, although not necessarily due to a delict.

Removal can be initiated by competent authority (cc. 192–193), or it can be in virtue of the law itself (c. 194). The law is also sensitive to issues of support.

Removal by Competent Authority

Canon 192 — A person is removed from office either by a decree issued legitimately by competent authority, without prejudice to rights possibly acquired by contract, or by the law itself according to the norm of can. 194.

Canon 193 — §1. A person cannot be removed from an office conferred for an indefinite period of time except for grave causes and according to the manner of proceeding defined by law.

§2. The same is valid for the removal of a person from an office conferred for a definite period of time before this time has elapsed, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 624, § 3.

§3. A person upon whom an office is conferred at the prudent discretion of a competent authority according to the prescripts of the law can, upon the judgment of the same authority, be removed from that office for a just cause.

§4. To take effect, the decree of removal must be communicated in writing.

The authority competent to remove is the authority competent to provide for the office. If a contract is involved, its provisions must be respected in addition to the causes and procedures specified in canon 193. The terms of the contract are to be interpreted in keeping with the applicable civil law on contracts (see c. 1290). Moreover, third parties (in addition to the officeholder) may have acquired rights through the contract and these must be respected as well.[106]

For the decree of removal to be legitimate, it must be based on sufficient cause and be preceded by the requisite procedure. These vary depending on the type of subjective stability enjoyed by the officeholder being removed.

Three types of subjective stability are listed. Conferral for an indefinite term provides the greatest stability; the officeholder enjoys the presumption of full subjective stability. Conferral for a definite term provides the same kind of subjective stability as conferral for an indefinite term, but only for the duration of the term; once the term has expired, the officeholder remains in office but loses the office with the simple notification that the term has expired; no other cause or procedure is required. Conferral at the prudent discretion of a competent authority has limited protection of subjective stability.

For some offices, the code clearly specifies which type of subjective stability is involved.[107] In [106] Chiappetta Com 1996, n. 1258; Gefaell, in Com Ex, 1069.

[107] For example, the Roman Pontiff (c. 332), bishops (cc. 401, 411), and pastors not appointed for a term (c. 522) or priests entrusted jointly with pastoral care of a parish without a term (c. 542, 2°), hold office for an indefinite term. See discussion at c. 186 for examples of offices with limited term. Conferral at discretion of competent authority applies to vicars general (c. 477, §1), chancellors and notaries (c. 485), delegates (c. 142, §1), other situations, the message is mixed: officeholders named for a definite term can be removed as if they were appointed at prudent discretion.[108] Particular law, the law of foundation, or the statutes governing a specific office may clarify which category applies. If there is no specification in law or statutes, is an office to be presumed as conferred for an indeterminate time? Some commentators think so,[109] and the text of Presbyterorum ordinis 20 would seem to argue for this.[110]

Offices with Special Stability

For offices conferred for an indefinite time, and during the term for an office conferred in that manner, grave causes are required for removal, and the procedures defined by law must be followed.

Grave causes are to be determined by proper law for religious superiors (c. 624, §3). The code gives some examples of grave causes.[111] Otherwise, grave causes are to be judged in light of equity, the good of souls, the common good, the importance of the office, and so on. The judgment is the responsibility of the one decreeing the removal, but should be substantiated and recorded in view of any eventual recourse.

Procedures are provided for some of these offices,[112] but in general canons 50–51 and particular law will determine how to proceed. If procedures are included in an applicable contract, they must be observed. To take effect, the decree of removal must be communicated to the officeholder in writing (§4).

Offices Conferred at Discretion

This is not removal at will or whim, but for a cause. The cause, however, is not so weighty as in the previous types; it must be considered just by the authority who decrees the removal. The cause should be substantiated and recorded in view of any eventual recourse.

No specific procedure is mandated by the canon, but at least the procedures for individual decrees must be followed (cc. 50–51) and, to take effect, the decree of removal must be communicated to the officeholder in writing. Particular law, proper law, the law of foundation, the statutes, or contracts governing the office in question may specify further procedures.

Removal by Law

Canon 194 — §1. The following are removed from an ecclesiastical office by the law itself:

1° a person who has lost the clerical state;

2° a person who has publicly defected from the Catholic faith or from the communion of the Church;

3° a cleric who has attempted marriage even if only civilly.

§2. The removal mentioned in nn. 2 and 3 can be enforced only if it is established by the declaration of a competent authority.

For all three situations competent authority must intervene. The clerical state is lost by declaration of invalidity of orders, imposition of the penalty of dismissal, or dispensation (c. 290); competent authority must act for each of these.

In the other two situations of canon 194, competent authority declares the removal. These both involve delicts by the officeholder, and removal here has the effect of a penalty. The canon is an parochial vicars (c. 552), rectors of churches (c. 563), chaplains (c. 572), and any diocesan offices held by religious or members of societies of apostolic life (cc. 682, §2 and 738, §2).

[108] For example, episcopal vicars who are not bishops (c. 477, §1) and vicars forane (c. 554, §§2–3).

[109] For example, Arrieta, in Pamplona ComEng, 178, and Socha, in Münster Com, 193/1.

[110] Where it defines an office as "conferred" in a stable manner.

[111] For example, for seminary professors (c. 253, §3), pastors (c. 1741).

[112] For example, moderators of public associations (c. 318, §2), diocesan finance officers (c. 494, §2), pastors (cc. 1740–1747).

exception to penal law, for removal from office is a permanent expiatory penalty (c. 1336, §1, 2°) which normally cannot be imposed or declared by decree (c. 1342, §2). Nevertheless, competent authority must determine the facts in the case and provide the officeholder with an opportunity to be heard (c. 50) before issuing the decree containing the reasons for removal and communicating this to the officeholder (c. 51).

Public defection from the Catholic faith is similar to but not precisely the same as apostasy (which is total repudiation of Christian faith—c. 751); public defection from the communion of the Church is similar to but not precisely the same as schism (which is defection from Catholic communion—c. 751).[113] A formal act is not required for the defection in canon 194; the only requirement is that it be public (i.e., known, or likely to become known).[114] Neither is it required that the officeholder join another religion, although this could be an objective indication of defection.

Because clergy are bound by the impediment of orders (c. 1087) and canonical form (c. 1117), they are said to "attempt" marriage. If a dispensation has been given to permit marriage (e.g., for a widowed permanent deacon), canon 194, §1, 3° does not apply. Attempted marriage by lay persons, whether vowed religious or not, is not affected by this canon; neither are other types of sexual misconduct by clergy.[115]

In the case of defection or clergy attempting marriage, the declaration by competent authority is similar to the declaration at the end of a term of office or completion of age. The fact on which loss of office is based does not depend on the authority's declaration, but its effectiveness does. The officeholder remains in office, and actions which require the office are valid, until the declaration of removal is communicated to the officeholder in writing.[116]

Support

Canon 195 — If a person is removed not by the law itself but by a decree of competent authority from an office which provides the person's support, the same authority is to take care that the support is provided for a suitable period, unless other provision is made.

This canon applies directly to those removed by decree of competent authority, not to those removed by law. However, canon 1350 makes a similar provision for clerics when they are penalized, and rights acquired by non-clerical officeholders in virtue of canons 231, §2 and 1286 must also be respected.

Other provision can be made through civil unemployment compensation if available, secular employment or some other church office accepted by the officeholder, conditions of a contract, etc.[117] The competent authority is to determine the length of the "suitable period," but civil law pro-[113] CCEO 976, §1, 2° specifies defection from the Catholic Church, which is the same as schism.

Commentators on the Latin code generally do not mark these nuances in the canon, equating communion with full communion in the Catholic Church (c. 205), and the defections the same as those in c. 751.

[114] Socha, in Münster Com, 194/2–3; Urrutia, n. 925, confuses this with "notorious."

[115] For example, c. 1395. Socha, in Münster Com, 194/4, argues that Hill, in CLSA Com, 111, is wrong to say that particular law could remove someone by the law itself for such activities. They may be the basis for removal by competent authority, or even privation (c. 195).

[116] McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 108, claims the office may be vacant de iure even without the declaration of competent authority, but as Gefaell, in Com Ex, 1083, argues, this is not so. The officeholder continues to act validly, and to receive remuneration, until notified in writing (c. 54, §2).

[117] Socha, in Münster Com, 195/2, points out that "other provision" is made for clerics due to incardination, and for members of institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life. For each of these, the diocese or other entity of incardination, and the institute or society, have an obligation to provide for decent support. Gefaell, in Com Ex, 1086, cautions that this may not always be true and that each case should be studied carefully.

visions (for example, on unemployment compensation) can provide guidance in this.

ARTICLE 4: PRIVATION [c. 196]

Canon 196 — §1. Privation from office, namely, a penalty for a delict, can be done only according to the norm of law.

§2. Privation takes effect according to the prescripts of the canons on penal law.

Privation is penal removal from office, one of the expiatory penalties (c. 1336, §1, 2°). It can be imposed only if a delict has been committed and is imputable to the officeholder. The provisions of this canon assure due process protection for the officeholder, as well as a means to safeguard the welfare of the community and the common good.

The procedures for penal law must be followed (cc. 1341–1353, 1717–1728). Thus, as a permanent penalty it cannot be imposed by an administrative decree (c. 1342, §2) but requires a judicial process.[118] Privation cannot be imposed where the law states simply a "just penalty," for it is one of the graver penalties.[119] However, particular law could further specify privation as a penalty where the code lists a "just penalty," although only for very grave necessity (c. 1315, §3). Privation cannot be imposed latae sententiae (c. 1336, §2), and can be imposed only if the office is subject to the superior who decrees the penalty (c. 1338, §1).

Penal law is rather complex on when a penalty finally takes effect, so this canon refers the question to penal law. In the interim, officeholders continue to exercise their office unless prohibited by decree (c. 1722).

[118] García Martín, 582, and Gefaell, in Com Ex, 1089. But Socha, in Münster Com, 196/2, seems to rely on the distinction made under the 1917 code between irremovable and movable offices to permit proceeding by decree in the latter type, which does not seem justified under the present code.

[119] See c. 1349; Gefaell, in Com Ex, 1089; McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 109; Socha, in Münster Com, 196/1. Privation is mentioned directly or indirectly in cc. 1364, §1; 1387; 1389, §1; 1396; 1397; and 1457.

Title X
Prescription

Prescription is a means of acquiring or losing rights, or of freeing oneself from obligations, by the passage of time under conditions prescribed by law. Derived from classical Roman law and further developed under Justinian,[1] prescription is found in virtually all legal systems in the western tradition, including the law of the Church. It is grounded in societal needs for the peace and good order that ensue from bringing closure to disputes, precluding prolonged uncertainty of ownership, curing transactional defects flowing from failure to fulfill formalities, avoiding the bringing of stale claims after witnesses and relevant documentary evidence are no longer available, and encouraging social and economic development and productivity by removing fears of future litigation. While the code uses the sole term "prescription," canonists generally distinguish acquisitive prescription (the acquiring of rights, especially ownership of temporal goods) from liberative or extinctive prescription (the freeing oneself of an obligation).[2] Civil laws employ a variety of terms. In the United States, for example, acquisitive prescription is generally called adverse possession when referring to rights to real property, and prescription when referring to rights to personal property; liberative or extinctive prescription is generally referred to in the United States as the operative effect of a statute of limitations.

Canon 197 — The Church receives prescription as it is in the civil legislation of the nation in question, without prejudice to the exceptions which are established in the canons of this Code; prescription is a means of acquiring or losing a subjective right as well as of freeing oneself from obligations.

In acknowledging the acceptance by the Church of prescription as found in the applicable civil law, canon 197 effectively "canonizes" the local civil law on the matter except where other canons in the code provide otherwise. Canon 197 is a specification of the general norm found in canon 22 regarding civil laws to which the law of the Church defers.

Exceptions to the canonization of civil laws regarding prescription relate to the requirement of good faith (see c. 198), matters considered by the Church to be totally exempt from prescription (see cc. 199, 1°– 6°; 1492, §1) or partially exempt (see cc. 82; 199, 7°; 1269), and the length of time which must pass before some forms of acquisitive prescription become effective (see c. 1270) or some forms of liberative (extinctive) prescription become effective (see cc. 1362, 1363, 1621).

Canon 198 — No prescription is valid unless it is based in good faith not only at the beginning but through the entire course of time required for prescription, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 1362.

It has never been the purpose of prescription to reward unethical behavior such as theft or the wresting of rights or release from obligations by violent means. Good faith has always been an essential element. The extent of required good faith, however, has varied among legal systems. Roman law, both classical and imperial, required good faith only at the beginning of the running of the time for prescription;[3] a good faith purchaser or recipient of a gift, for example, was not deprived of the benefits of prescription upon subsequently learning that the property in question had previously been stolen or otherwise misappropriated. The Church, however, at least since the Fourth Lateran Council,[4] has required good faith throughout the entire running of the prescribed time, both for acquisitive and liberative prescription;[5] it is that stance of the Church that is codified in canon 198 and in the parallel canon of the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.[6] Moreover, the Church requires positive good faith, that is, a judgment (even though erroneous) that one possesses property, or exercises a right, or withholds payment of a debt or fulfillment of other obligation, justly, that is, without violating any right of another. One who acts in good conscience acts in good faith.[7]

In the United States, civil law requires good faith throughout the entire running of the prescribed period of adverse possession or statute of limitations but, generally speaking, positive good faith (a judgment of the propriety of one's possession of property, for example, or nonfulfillment of an obligation) is required only at the outset; negative good faith (the absence of fraudulent concealment or other deliberate injustice) suffices thereafter.[8]

[8] For a helpful discussion of the element of good faith in civil law approaches to prescription in the United States, see P. Gerstenblith, "The Adverse Possession of Personal Property," Buffalo Law Review 37 (1989) 119–163.

The sole exception to the canonical requirement of good faith is in regard to the extinctive prescription of criminal actions according to the norms of canon 1362. The presence or absence of good faith on the part of the offender is irrelevant to the effective running of the prescribed time limits for instituting a criminal action (see commentary on c. 1362).[9]

Canon 199 — The following are not subject to prescription:

1° rights and obligations which are of the divine natural or positive law;

2° rights which can be obtained from apostolic privilege alone;

3° rights and obligations which directly regard the spiritual life of the Christian faithful;

4° the certain and undoubted boundaries of ecclesiastical territories;

5° Mass offerings and obligations;

6° provision of an ecclesiastical office which, according to the norm of law, requires the exercise of a sacred order;

7° the right of visitation and the obligation of obedience, in such a way that the Christian faithful cannot be visited by any ecclesiastical authority or are no longer subject to any authority.

This is the principal, but not the only, canon that exempts certain matters from prescription. In addition to the seven exemptions declared in canon 199, judicial actions concerning the status of persons are exempt from prescription (c. 1492, §1), as are certain privileges (see c. 82) and, under some circumstances, sacred objects owned by public juridic persons (see c. 1269).

The first of the canon 199 exemptions are rights and obligations that are of divine law, natural or positive. These would include such rights as the right to be free from any kind of coercion in choosing a state in life (see c. 219) and the right to a Christian education (see c. 217), and such obligations as that of parents to care for the Christian education of their children (see c. 226, §2). Other obligations and rights of Christian spouses are also considered to be of divine law. It is axiomatic that a right or obligation which flows from divine law cannot be precluded by a law of human origin such as prescription.

Rights which can be obtained only by apostolic privilege, the subject matter of the second of the canon 199 exemptions, include the erection of a public association of the faithful by other than the Holy See, episcopal conference, or diocesan bishop (see c. 312, §1, 3°), and entrusting to others the power to grant indulgences (see c. 995, §2). To declare that a right which can be obtained only by apostolic privilege cannot be obtained by prescription would appear to be a redundant provision of law, but through canon 199, 2° the legislator evidently intends to remove any possible doubt.

Virtually all rights and obligations in the Church relate in some way to the spiritual life of the faithful, for that is the central focus of the Church's mission; some, however, such as rights and obligations in the area of temporal goods, relate only indirectly to the spiritual life. Rights and obligations which relate directly to the spiritual life and, hence, which are exempt by canon 199, 3° from prescription include the rights to worship God according to the prescriptions of one's own approved rite and to follow one's own form of spiritual life so long as it is consonant with the teaching of the Church (see c. 214), and the obligations properly to observe Sundays and other feast days (see c. 1247) and days of penance (see c. 1249).

The certain and undisputed boundaries of ecclesiastical territories compose the fourth category of canon 199 exemptions. The parallel provision in the 1917 code detailed the precise territories included, namely, ecclesiastical provinces, dioceses, parishes, apostolic vicariates and prefectures, and abbacies and prelatures nullius.[10] Since the same varieties of ecclesiastical territory continue to be recognized in the 1983 code (see cc. 368–374, 431),[11] they should be understood as included in canon 199, 4°; the more general language of canon 199, 4°, however, would also include additional categories of ecclesiastical territory provided for in the 1983 code, such as ecclesiastical regions (see c. 433). If a particular boundary is uncertain or disputed, then the boundary is subject to prescription, it being among the purposes of prescription to bring closure to uncertainties and disputes (see commentary introducing title X).

Canon 199, 5° exempts from prescription Mass offerings and obligations. This is in accord with the strictness of the Church's stance in regard to the faithful fulfillment of all Mass obligations (see cc. 947–958, 1308–1309), whether they arise from freely accepted individual stipends or from legitimately established foundations, autonomous or non-autonomous (see c. 1303). No passage of time relieves one from the obligation to celebrate Mass or the designated number of Masses for which one has accepted an offering unless, of course, one has legitimately transferred the offering and obligation to another (see c. 955, §1). The same is true of juridic persons, such as parishes or houses of a religious institute, which have accepted Mass stipends. Nor does passage of time relieve one (e.g., a pastor) from giving to priests who have celebrated stipend Masses the full stipends for Masses celebrated unless the priests have voluntarily relinquished their rights to the stipends.[12]

Canon 199, 6° is a puzzling provision. Earlier canons appear to make clear that no ecclesiastical office can validly be acquired without canonical provision (c. 146), and that canonical provision of an office occurs by free conferral, installation if presentation preceded it, confirmation or admission following election or postulation, or "finally" (tandem) by simple election and acceptance if confirmation is not required (c. 147). Canon 199, 6° implies, however, that an office which does not require the exercise of a sacred order can also be acquired by prescription, thus adding to the earlier, apparently taxative, list of the ways in which ecclesiastical offices can be acquired. Offices that do not require the exercise of a sacred order include the chancellor (see c. 482), diocesan finance officer (see c. 494), member of a diocesan finance council (see cc. 492–493), and superior in a lay institute of consecrated life.

[11] In the 1983 code, abbacies and prelatures nullius are called territorial abbacies and prelatures (see c. 370).

[12] Notwithstanding the exemption of Mass offerings and obligations from prescription, the code does provide for the reduction of Mass obligations by certain ecclesiastical authorities in strictly limited circumstances (see commentary on c. 1308).

Even more puzzling is the ambiguity of canon 199, 6° as to whether or not an office which does require the exercise of a sacred order is exempt from prescription only by one who lacks the requisite order. The published history of the drafting of canon 199 is silent on the matter, and the 1917 code did not contain a similar provision. Since one who lacks a sacred order which is expressly required by law for the valid reception of a particular office (see, e.g., cc. 150; 521, §1; 546) cannot validly acquire such an office because of the lack of a required quality (see c. 149, §2), canon 199, 6° would be an unnecessary provision of law if applicable only to those who lack the requisite sacred order for a particular office. It would seem, therefore, that canon 199, 6° is intended to preclude all provision by prescription of an ecclesiastical office which by law requires the exercise of a sacred order, even by those in possession of the requisite sacred order.

One of the defining characteristics and fundamental obligations of a Catholic is the obligation to maintain communion with the universal Church and with one's particular church through obedience to competent ecclesiastical authority (see cc. 205, 209, 212, §1). The hierarchy of the Church, in turn, is obliged to protect the unity of the Church by the promotion of doctrinal and moral integrity and by urging the observance of all ecclesiastical laws (see cc. 392, 747–755). Physical visitation is a means by which ecclesiastical authority can exercise vigilance over Catholic persons, institutions, and activities to verify that, both in commitment and in operation, they are in accord with Catholic teaching and discipline (see cc. 305, 397, §1). Canon 199, 7° exempts from prescription the right of visitation on the part of ecclesiastical authority, and the obligation of obedience on the part of the Christian faithful, in circumstances which would leave one or more members of the faithful without subjection to any ecclesiastical visitation or to any ecclesiastical authority at all. Transfer of the right of visitation from one ecclesiastical authority to another, or transfer of one's obligation of obedience from one authority to another, are not exempt from prescription. Only a loss of the right or obligation that would leave one or more members of the faithful with no obligation to obey any ecclesiastical authority is exempt from prescription. To allow such a loss to occur would permit the dissolution of the bond of ecclesiastical governance which, together with the bonds of the profession of faith and the sacraments, constitute the essential elements of full communion with the Catholic Church (see c. 205).[13]

TITLE XI
COMPUTATION OF TIME
[cc. 200–203]

The manner in which precise moments or periods of time are calculated often has serious consequences for persons subject to the law of the Church. The acquisition, duration, and expiration of many canonical rights and obligations depend upon particular measurements of time, as does eligibility for the reception of sacraments, religious profession, and election or appointment to office, and the validity of numerous juridic acts, especially procedural ones. It was said that over three hundred canons in the 1917 code involved some [13] For a discussion of the application of prescription to the acquisition or loss of rights and obligations relating to temporal goods, see commentary on cc. 1268–1270.

mention of time,[14] and the same has been said of almost two hundred canons in the present code.[15] The final four canons of Book I set forth general norms for the computation of time in matters of canonical significance. The norms, which are intended to minimize ambiguity and afford as much juridical certainty as possible, are greatly simplified from those in the corresponding canons of the 1917 code,[16] and are virtually the same as those in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.[17]

Canon 200 — Unless the law expressly provides otherwise, time is to be computed according to the norm of the following canons.

General norms governing the canonical computation of time begin with an acknowledgment that other norms having the force of law constitute exceptions to the general norms, and are to be followed in the matters to which they apply. Given the large number of canons that involve the reckoning of time, it is not surprising that there are a considerable number of exceptions to the general norms.

Some of the exceptions concern liturgical matters, such as the determination of the beginning of a day on which the faithful are bound to participate in the offering of the Eucharist. The general norm of canon 202 understands a day to begin at midnight; fulfillment of the precept to participate in Mass "on Sundays and other holy days of obligation" (c. 1247), however, may take place on the evening of the preceding day (c. 1248). Some exceptions are a consequence of the canonization of the local civil law regarding contracts (see c. 1290) and prescription (see cc. 197, 1268), as a result of which time is reckoned in such matters in the manner determined by civil law. Procedural law governing ecclesiastical tribunals, in addition to prescribing a number of time limits of its own, provides for additional time limits to be determined by judges or by the mutual agreement of the parties (see cc. 1465–1466). Particular law of a diocese,[18] the proper law of an institute of consecrated life or a society of apostolic life, the statutes of a public or private juridic person or a college or group,[19] the decree of a diocesan bishop,[20] or custom may, and occasionally do, provide for the computation of certain periods of time in ways different from those set forth in the general norms of this title.

Canon 201 — §1. Continuous time is understood as that which undergoes no interruption.

§2. Useful time is understood as that which a person has to exercise or to pursue a right, so that it does not run for a person who is unaware or unable to act.

This canon introduces a fundamental canonical distinction between continuous time (tempus continuum) and useful or available time (tempus utile). Continuous time is the ordinary, moment-by-moment passage of time which undergoes no interruption as, for example, aging. Useful time is that which is available for the exercise or pursuit of a right and which does not run in instances of unawareness of the right or of the beginning of the time limit for its exercise, or in instances of inability to act due, for example, to illness. Unawareness, which can be due to ignorance or error, usually interrupts tempus utile by delaying its start; inability to act, although in some instances it may delay the beginning of the running of the tempus utile, most often intervenes to halt the running of the designated period of time after it has begun.[21]

[21] Useful time (tempus utile) should not be confused with peremptory time limits. The latter expression refers to the effect of not acting within a designated time; tempus

Very few canons explicitly mention continuous time.[22] Many canons, however, explicitly state that the designated period of time is to be useful time. Though explicit affirmations of useful time are primarily found in canons regulating tribunal procedures,[23] they are also present in canons regarding such matters as presentation for office,[24] election to office,[25] postulation,[26] administrative recourse,[27] and administrative removal of a pastor.[28] Most canons that refer to intervals of time, however, are silent as to whether the time referred to is continuous or available (useful) time. In the absence of explicit or implicit designation, it would seem that continuous time, not tempus utile, should be understood as intended by the legislator; tempus utile is not to be presumed.[29]

A reasonable view to the contrary could argue that concern for the adequate protection of rights, which is the underlying rationale for tempus utile and, indeed, for all procedural law,[30] requires that a designated period of time be presumed to be tempus utile whenever the passage of the interval of time could result in the loss of a procedural right, even if the particular procedural law in question makes no mention of tempus utile. Such a view might be said to find support in the wording of canon 162 which speaks of the tempus utile provided for in canons 158, §1 and 161 even though neither of those canons refers to the time limits they prescribe as tempus utile. The view is appealing and could perhaps find effective expression in an argument drawn from analogy to those procedural canons which do make explicit mention of useful time (see note 23).

On the other hand, a number of considerations lead to the opposite conclusion adopted above. Continuous time is the natural understanding of time, and the legislator's explicit reference to available time in many canons would seem to justify the conclusion that where tempus utile is not mentioned, it is not intended. An argument drawn from analogy to canons which mention tempus utile would seem to lack cogency in an area where the legislator has explicitly spoken of tempus utile in many canons and has not so spoken in others. Moreover, in regard to procedural acts in a tribunal, canon 1467 provides that if the tribunal is closed on the day scheduled for a judicial act, the time limit is extended to the first day that is not a holiday. Such a provision would be unnecessary if all procedural time limits, even those which were not so specified, were understood as tempus utile; canon 1467 seems to indicate that procedural time limits not said to be tempus utile are to be understood as continuous time, with provision for prorogation of the final day if it should fall on a holiday. Similarly, in canon 1646, which provides for the seeking of restitutio in integrum against a sentence in instances of manifest injustice, paragraph three provides that the time limit of three months, mentioned in paragraphs one and two of the canon, does not run as long as the injured person is a minor (and, hence, unable to make the petition). If all procedural time limits that could result in the loss of a procedural right are to be understood as tempus utile whether or utile refers to the manner of computing the passage of a designated period of time. That the two expressions are not synonymous is clear from their occasional appearance together in the same canon (see, e.g., cc. 1630, §1; 1734, §2).

not the canon prescribing the time limit so states, paragraph three of canon 1646 would be superfluous; not only minority, but any other cause of inability to place a juridic act would also interrupt the running of the time limit. Canon 1646, like canon 1467, seems to confirm the view that where time limits are not said to refer to available (useful) time, they are to be understood as continuous time, with only such specific prorogations as are mentioned in specific canons.

Since the smallest canonically significant unit of time is a day (see commentary on c. 202), a significant interruption of tempus utile results in the addition of a full day to the designated time limit, even though one actually may have been impeded from acting for only a few hours. Not every interruption of tempus utile, however, is significant; a notable interruption is required in order to have an additional full day added to the period of time allotted for a particular action or condition to have been fulfilled.[31] Some authors would require an interruption to last for the greater part of a day in order to be canonically significant.[32] The notions of notable and greater part of a day, however, are necessarily relative, depending upon the nature and extent of the interruption in relation to the number of hours in the day during which a particular act could be placed. Some acts can be placed only during certain hours of certain days (e.g., a particular tribunal may be open for business only on weekdays from 10 A.M. to 3 P.M.) whereas other acts (e.g., deciding whom to appoint to a particular ecclesiastical office) can take place during a much longer time period on any day. To qualify as notable, or as lasting for the greater part of a day, an interruption caused by unawareness or inability to act would have to be of longer duration in the latter instances than in the former.[33] It is a matter for the prudent judgment of a judge or superior to determine in a particular case whether or not a sufficiently significant interruption of available (useful) time has occurred to warrant prorogation of the designated time limit.[34]

Canon 202 — §1. In law, a day is understood as a period consisting of 24 continuous hours and begins at midnight unless other provision is expressly made; a week is a period of 7 days; a month is a period of 30 days, and a year is a period of 365 days unless a month and a year are said to be taken as they are in the calendar.

§2. If time is continuous, a month and a year must always be taken as they are in the calendar.

Initial wonder as to why it would be thought necessary to include in a code of canon law statements as to how many hours are in a day, and how many days are in a week, or a month, or a year, eventually yields to the realization that the ambiguities that often characterize everyday speech in such matters are incompatible with the precision demanded by law. When canonical rights, duties, and even the ownership of property are contingent upon the passage of designated intervals of days, weeks, months, or years, it is imperative to know precisely when, for canonical purposes, a day is considered to begin (e.g., at midnight, at dawn, at the opening of office hours), how long it is considered to last (e.g., to the close of office hours, to sunset, to midnight), how many days constitute a week (7 days, or 5 working days, or 6 working days), how many days constitute a month (31 or 30 or 28 or, in a leap year, 29), and how many days constitute a year (360,[35] or 365, or 366).

The primary unit of time for canonical purposes is a day; parts of a day, as a general rule, are not accorded canonical significance.[36] A day is canon-

[35] Some computations in the financial world consider a year to be composed of 12 equal months of 30 days each, resulting, for some purposes, in a year of 360 days.

[36] The sole exception in the code is the prescribed one-hour fast prior to the reception of Holy Communion (see c. 919, §1).

ically understood to be a period of 24 continuous hours beginning at midnight, unless otherwise expressly provided (e.g., in particular or proper law). A week is understood to be a period of 7 days, consecutive if computed as continuous time, intermittent (in units of whole days, not parts of a day) if computed as tempus utile. A month is understood to be a period of 30 days unless it is to be computed as it is in the calendar (in which case some months will have 30 days while others will have 31 or 28 or, in a leap year, 29 days). A year is a period of 365 days unless it is to be computed as it is in the calendar (in which case leap years will have 366 days).

A month is to be computed as it is in the calendar whenever it is referred to by name or equivalently so (as, e.g., "next month"); similarly, a year is to be computed as it is in the calendar if specifically referred to (e.g., "the year of 2000") or equivalently so (as, e.g., "next year"). Moreover, canon 202, §2 provides that whenever time is to be computed continuously, which is usually the case (see commentary on c. 201), a month and a year are always to be understood as they are in the calendar. Thus, a one-month period of continuous time that begins on January 1 will consist of 31 days; a one-month period of continuous time beginning on February 1 will consist of only 28 (or, in a leap year, 29) days; a one-month period of continuous time beginning on April 1 will consist of 30 days. Similarly, a year of continuous time beginning on January 1, 2000 will consist of 366 days, while a year of continuous time beginning on January 1, 2001 will consist of 365 days.

A month computed as tempus utile, however, always consists of 30 unimpeded days which, depending upon the number of canonically significant interruptions (see commentary on c. 201), could last more than 30 calendar days. Similarly, a year computed as tempus utile always consists of 365 unimpeded days which could last more than 365 calendar days depending upon the number of canonically significant interruptions.

Canon 203 — §1. The initial day (a quo) is not computed in the total unless its beginning coincides with the beginning of the day or the law expressly provides otherwise.

§2. Unless the contrary is established, the final day (ad quem) is computed in the total which, if the time consists of one or more months or years, or one or more weeks, is reached at the end of the last day of the same number or, if a month lacks a day of the same number, at the end of the last day of the month.

As is clear from canon 202, the basic unit of time for canonical purposes is a day and, as a general rule subject to exceptions, a day is canonically understood to begin at midnight. Canon 203, §1 declares, also as a general rule subject to exceptions, that canonical intervals of time such as weeks, months, and years begin at the beginning of the day, that is, at midnight, following the event that occasions the canonically significant period of time (e.g., birth, temporary religious profession, publication of a sentence, acquiring potentially prescriptive possession of property) unless the event coincides precisely with the beginning of a canonical day (usually midnight). Succinctly stated, the actual day from which a computation is to be made (the terminus a quo) is not counted unless the event which occasions the computation coincides with the beginning of the day. This general norm applies both to continuous time and to tempus utile.[37]

Conversely, unless expressly provided otherwise, the entire final day (the terminus ad quem) is counted so that the interval of time is not completed until midnight at the end of the final day of the designated interval. This general norm also applies both to continuous time and to tempus utile.[38]

One's actual day of birth, therefore, is not counted in the computation of one's age (unless one were born precisely at midnight), and one does not complete a year of age until midnight at the close of one's birthday. Consequently, one cannot licitly be ordained to the priesthood until the day following one's twenty-fifth birthday, since the law requires completion of twenty-five years of age (c. 1031, §1), nor can one validly be admitted to perpetual profession in a religious institute until the day following one's twenty-first birthday (see c. 658). Similarly, the three-month period of de facto residence required for the acquisition of quasi-domicile, and the five-year period of de facto residence required for the acquisition of domicile (see c. 102), do not begin to run until the midnight following one's actual taking up of residence, and are not completed until the midnight following the last day of the three-month or five-year periods.

[37] See Miñambres, in Com Ex, 1:1115.

So, too, in the computation of tempus utile as, for example, in computing the ten days within which one may take recourse against rejection of a libellus (see c. 1505, §4), the day of rejection (terminus a quo) is not counted, and the period of ten unimpeded days begins at midnight at the close of that day; the ten-day period will expire at midnight at the end of the tenth unimpeded[39] day.

Canon 203, §2 also makes explicit what is implicit in canon 202, namely, that weeks, months, and years computed not as tempus utile but continuously, which is usually the case (see commentary on c. 201), expire at midnight at the end of the corresponding day of the final week or corresponding date of the final month. A three-week period of continuous time beginning on a Wednesday (i.e., according to c. 203, §1, at midnight at the end of a Wednesday), for example, will expire at midnight at the end of the third ensuing Wednesday. A three-month period of continuous time beginning on November 15 will expire at midnight at the end of February 15. If, however, the final month does not have a corresponding date (as, e.g., when a three-month period begins on November 30), the terminus ad quem is considered to have been reached at midnight at the end of the last calendar day in the final month of the designated interval (e.g., in a three-month period beginning on November 30, on February 28 or, in a leap year, on February 29).

Tempus utile, on the other hand, is always computed without regard to the calendar. One month of tempus utile beginning on January 31, for example, will not, under any circumstances, expire on February 28; thirty unimpeded days must pass before the one month of tempus utile will expire.

[39] For the meaning of "unimpeded," see commentary on c. 201.

BOOK II
THE PEOPLE OF GOD
[cc. 204–746]

INTRODUCTION

Robert J. Kaslyn, S.J.

The title of Book II of the code, "The People of God," not only reflects its content but also indicates a foundational ecclesiological perspective. Both the number of canons which Book II contains (543) as well as this ecclesiological perspective clearly demonstrate the importance of its material. This introduction will address two topics in particular. After presenting an overview of the contents of Book II, the introduction will discuss the ecclesiology presented in the code. Canons 204–207 are of special importance in that they fulfill two important functions: from the specific context, these canons introduce the contents of Book II; from a broader perspective, they present ecclesiological principles foundational to the entire code.[1]

The three major divisions of Book II include: part one, "The Christian Faithful" (the Christifideles, cc. 204–329); part two, "The Hierarchical Constitution of the Church" (cc. 330–572); and part three, "Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life" (cc. 573–746).

Part one, "The Christian Faithful," begins with an introduction consisting of four canons generally describing the Christian faithful (cc. 204–207), followed by sixteen canons which constitute title I, "The Obligations and Rights of All the Christian Faithful" (cc. 208–223). The remaining topics in part one include rights and duties specific to lay people (cc. 224–231); the rights and duties of clerics as well as norms on clerical formation, incardination ("enrollment") and excardination, and loss of the clerical state (cc. 232–293). Part one concludes with personal prelatures and associations of the faithful (cc. 294–329). Part two, "The Hierarchical Constitution of the Church," is divided into two primary topics: "The Supreme Authority of the Church" (cc. 330–367) and "Particular Churches and Their Groupings" (cc. 368–572). The first topic considers the Roman Pontiff and the college of bishops as well as the synod of bishops, cardinals and legates, and the Roman Curia. The second topic, particular churches, includes the function, appointment, and authority of bishops; provinces, metropolitans, and conferences of bishops; and internal diocesan and parochial governance structures. The canons in part three (cc. 573–746) concern religious and secular institutes as well as societies of apostolic life and begin with norms common to all institutes of consecrated life (cc. 573–606). Each of these subjects, however, as well as the other canons in the code, presuppose and build upon the first twenty canons in Book II, namely, canons 204–223. For example, the rights and duties of all the Christian faithful apply not only to lay people but also to clerics and to members of institutes of consecrated life.

Through its arrangement of this material, the Eastern code demonstrates the foundational role of these canons more clearly than does the Latin code. The Eastern code begins with six preliminary canons specifying the scope of the text and then articulates "The Rights and Obligations of All the Christian Faithful" in title I (CCEO, cc. 7–26, of which cc. 7–9 correspond to cc. 204–206 of the Latin code).

In Book II itself, the four introductory canons, cc. 204–207, exercise a determinative role for the interpretation not only of the remaining canons in Book II but of the entire code. These canons introduce critical foundational and ecclesiological principles which, as Pope John Paul II states in Sacrae disciplinae leges, "characterize the true and genuine image of the Church." Canons 204–207 succinctly describe the Catholic Church and the various relationships (or "degrees of relationship") which all the baptized, through reception of baptism, enjoy with the Catholic Church. This description finds greater elaboration throughout the code, and specifically in Book II, in reference to the mission incumbent upon the baptized, derived from their participation in the threefold functions (munera) of Jesus Christ, priest, prophet, and ruler. This mission is variously described: "to promote the growth of the Church and its continual sanctification" (c. 210); to "cooperate in the building up of the Body of Christ" (c. 208); "to promote or sustain apostolic action" (c. 216). This mission, derived from baptism, applies to all the baptized independent of their particular status or condition in the Church.[2]

One approach to the ecclesiology expressed in cc. 204–207 arises from the title of Book II, "The People of God." This title reflects the ecclesiological perspective of Lumen gentium, especially chapter 2, itself entitled, "The People of God." According to Lumen gentium 9, "It has pleased God, however, to sanctify and save men and women not individually and without regard for what binds them together, but to set them up as a people who would acknowledge him in truth and serve him in holiness." Chapter 2 of Lumen gentium provides a more particular description of the people of God: it emphasizes God's initiative, inviting all people to enter into a redemptive relationship with him and the salvific life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ, who thereby institutes a new covenant uniting God's people in and through the Holy Spirit. The people of God enjoy the dignity and freedom of the children of God; their law is Christ's commandment of love; their goal is the kingdom of God; their mission is to be a light for the world.

This description, with its trinitarian emphasis, expands the succinct statement in Lumen gentium 4: "the universal church appears as a people made one by the unity of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit." Both the concept "the people of God" and its underlying trinitarian foundation find systematic clarification in the ecclesiology of communio (koinonia). The ecclesiology of communio finds expression in various documents issued by Pope John Paul II, the synods of bishops, and the Roman dicasteries.[3] The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued a document in 1992 entitled, "Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church on Some Aspects of the Church

[2] See CFC et al., "Some Questions Regarding Collaboration of Nonordained Faithful in Priests' Sacred Ministry" (cited hereafter as "Some Questions"), Origins 27 (November 27, 1997) 399, 400–409, followed by "The Instruction: An Explanatory Note," 409–410. This text, approved in forma specifica by Pope John Paul II, is an instruction signed by the heads of eight Vatican offices: CFC, PCL, CDF, CDWDS, CFB, CEP, CICLSAL, and PCILT. The instruction explains the meaning of approval in forma specifica by the pope: such action "makes it a text bearing his own authority and against which there can be no appeal" (410). The text itself, "Some Questions," aims at clarifying "new forms of 'pastoral activity' of the nonordained on both parochial and diocesan levels" (400) and begins by reiterating the call of all the faithful "to participate actively in the mission and edification of the people of God" (399).

[3] In paragraph 42 of his apostolic exhortation, VC, John Paul II situated the mission of members of institutes of consecrated life in the context of the Church as "essentially a mystery of communion" (Origins 25 [April 4, 1996] 695). "Some Questions" uses the same context for its discussion of collaboration within the Church (400, #1). CICLSAL continued this theme in its document FL which presents religious community as an expression of ecclesial communion (#10). The 1993 Ecum Dir uses the ecclesiology of communio as a foundation for understanding and promoting the ecumenical movement; see especially paragraphs 13–25 and 92–160 (the latter paragraphs are entitled "IV. Communion in Life and Spiritual Activity Among the Baptized"). Paragraph 24 of the "Final Message for the Synod of Africa" states, "It is the church as family which manifests to the world the Spirit which the Son sent from the Father so that there should be communion among all" (Origins 24 [May 19, 1994] 5). See also the lineamenta for the special assembly of the synod of bishops for America, "Encounter with the Living Jesus Christ: The Way to Conversion, Communion and Solidarity in America," in Origins (26 August 15, 1996) 145, 147–164, especially paragraphs 29–47 "Third Part: Jesus Christ, the Way to Communion," 154–158.

One of the foremost authors on communio, J.-M.-R. Tillard, approached the ecclesiology of communion from the perspective of canon law in "Ecclesiology of Communion and Canon Law: The Theological Task of Canon Law: A Theologian's Perspective," in CLSAP 58 (1996) 24–34.

Understood as Communion."[4] This letter begins as follows:

> The concept of communion (koinonia), which appears with a certain prominence in the texts of the Second Vatican Council is very suitable for expressing the core of the mystery of the church and can certainly be a key for the renewal of Catholic ecclesiology. A deeper appreciation of the fact that the church is a communion is indeed a task of special importance which provides ample latitude for theological reflection. (#1)

The canons of the code further elaborate this ecclesiology; general references are provided here with more in-depth commentary found in the analysis of specific canons.

Communio exists first and foremost as a relationship with God, rooted in the presence of the Holy Spirit. Through his Spirit, God invites the individual to participate in the intra-trinitarian communion of Father, Son, and Spirit. Inasmuch as communio arises from this participation in the divine life, any discussion of ecclesiology must include this essential dimension. Given the social nature of the human person, salvation, a relationship with God, cannot remain solely between the individual and God but involves a specific community of faith: "For by natural constitution the human person is a social being who cannot live or develop without relations with others" and these relations "bring about the first form of the communion of persons."[5] Thus communion does not remain internal but finds external expression in the reception of baptism.[6] Through this sacramental initiation, a person is incorporated into Christ, becomes a member of the people of God, and exercises the mission entrusted by Christ to his Church. Through baptism, a person becomes one of the Christian faithful (Christifideles, c. 204, §1), who participate in the threefold functions (munera) of Christ as priest, prophet, and ruler. All the baptized are therefore placed in communion with God, with all the other baptized, and with the Catholic Church in which the Church of Christ subsists (c. 204, §2).

This ecclesiological perspective provides the necessary background for the first canon in the code: the code applies primarily to Latin Catholics. But Latin Catholics are in communion not only with Eastern Catholics but also with members of separated and reformed churches and ecclesial communities, although in the latter instance the relationship does not express full communion. Further, communio forms the theological and canonical basis, for example, of the sacramental sharing of the Eucharist, penance, and anointing of the sick (c. 844) and of the distinction between disparity of cult marriages (which require a dispensation, c. 1086) and so-called mixed marriages (which require only permission, cc. 1124–1129).

Each of the baptized lives in some degree of communion with the Catholic Church; the baptized in full communion are those "joined with Christ in its visible structure by the bonds of the profession of faith, the sacraments, and ecclesiastical governance" (c. 205). The impetus for full communion with the Catholic Church is the Holy Spirit, the origin and continuing inspiration for communio itself. In title I of Book II, "The Obligations and Rights of All the Christian Faithful," after the first canon which states the fundamental equality of all the faithful, canon 209 enunciates the obligation incumbent upon the faithful "to maintain communion" (§1) and to fulfill their responsibilities "to the universal Church and the particular church to which they belong." Communion finds its paramount expression in and through the celebration of the Eucharist; this celebration particularizes communio as it exists in the Catholic Church, both representing and creating unity among the Christian faithful.[7] According to the Ecumenical Directory, "Eucharistic communion is inseparably linked to full ecclesial communion and its visible expression" (#129). Consequently, the Eucharist is celebrated by a community united in faith, sacraments, and governance (cc. 204–205). Canon 844 indicates the conditions under which non-Catholic Christians may exceptionally receive the sacraments of the Eucharist, penance, and anointing of the sick.

[5] GS 12.

[6] According to c. 849, baptism is "necessary for salvation by actual reception or at least by desire"; the Church, therefore, does not deny the possibility of salvation to those who have not received this sacrament, who also share to some degree in the divine communion arising from the gift of the Holy Spirit. See, for example, GS 10: "It is the church's belief that Christ, who died and was raised for everyone, offers to the human race through his Spirit the light and strength to respond to its highest calling."

The parish, "a certain community of the Christian faithful stably constituted in a particular church" (c. 515), celebrates the Eucharist as a community of faith; this celebration signifies and unites the people of God and builds up the body of Christ (c. 897) and thereby manifests communio. In turn, the diocese, "a portion of the people of God... entrusted to a bishop for him to shepherd with the cooperation of the presbyterate" (c. 369), expresses communio through the celebration of the Eucharist, most particularly as manifested in the Eucharist celebrated by the diocesan bishop in the presence of his presbyters and the people entrusted to his care. The bishops themselves are united by the bond of communio among themselves within the episcopal college, "together with its head and never without this head," the Supreme Pontiff (c. 336). This communion finds its clearest expression in an ecumenical council, more specifically, through the Eucharistic celebration presided over by the bishop of Rome. Communion therefore permeates every level of the Church's visible expression in the world and as a result provides the basis for the Christian faithful's lives of prayer and activity.

Communion provides the underlying unity among the different vocations, states of life, and ministries which exist within the Church through the gifts of the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit as origin and impetus for communio is "the dynamic principle of diversity and unity in the Church" (CL 20). Unity does not require uniformity but rather a fundamental recognition of the one mission entrusted to the Church by Jesus Christ himself, a mission which involves the participation of all the faithful in diverse ways.

The ecclesiology of communio thus establishes the foundation for synthesizing the various images used to describe the Church—for example, as the people of God, as sacrament, as the Body of Christ. In addition, this ecclesiology provides the ground for understanding and interpreting the code. Thus, as a general principle, the nature and exercise of authority in the Church on all levels must be situated within communio: the Church's hierarchical structure exists to serve and foster communio, to build up the Church as the Body of Christ, and to ensure the active participation of each of the faithful in the Church's mission. More particularly, communio also forms the context for interpreting canons which concern, for example, the mission of lay men and women, of members of institutes of consecrated life, and of clerics in the universal call to holiness; the exercise of the teaching office; the relationship among members of various forms of consecrated life (both among themselves and with others, either Christian faithful or not). All church activity, either in virtue of baptism (participation in the threefold functions [munera] of Christ as priest, prophet, and ruler; see c. 204) or in virtue of some type of official authorization by competent ecclesiastical authority (for example, through mandate, delegation, or appointment to ecclesiastical office), must aim at maintaining and fostering communio among all the people of God so that the Church continues to proclaim the gospel message. Communio, through its origin in the divine life, recognizes the importance of charisms in the Church's life and provides a means and a context for their exercise. Canon law needs to reflect further and to develop specific means to implement the ecclesiology of communio in the Church's life, in reference both to those in full communion (c. 205) and to those persons who through baptism live in some degree of communion with the Catholic Church.[8]

Finally, the ecclesiology of communio indicates the unique nature of law in the Church, distinguishing it from civil law by reason of its trinitarian and sacramental basis. Canon law exists to serve the Church's mission: the salvation of souls (c. 1752).

CANONS AND COMMENTARY

Part I
THE CHRISTIAN FAITHFUL
[cc. 204–329]

INTRODUCTORY CANONS
[cc. 204–207]

The Christian Faithful

Canon 204 — §1. The Christian faithful are those who, inasmuch as they have been incorporated in Christ through baptism, have been constituted as the people of God. For this reason, made sharers in their own way in Christ's priestly, prophetic, and royal function, they are called to exercise the mission which God has entrusted to the Church to fulfill in the world, in accord with the condition proper to each.

§2. This Church, constituted and organized in this world as a society, subsists in the Catholic Church governed by the successor of Peter and the bishops in communion with him.

This canon, in a few but highly nuanced sentences, presents an ecclesiological foundation for the interpretation of the code, a foundation which finds further expansion in the following canons, especially in canons 205–207. These introductory canons contain theological affirmations requiring theological interpretation and analysis prior to canonical explanation and application. The Eastern code presents the same foundation in canon 7.[9]

The first paragraph of canon 204 establishes a fundamental distinction among all people: either they have received the sacrament of baptism or not. All the baptized, therefore, constitute the Christian faithful, the Christifideles. Like the other sacraments, baptism has both social and individual effects inasmuch as the sacraments influence not only the relationship between God and a particular individual but necessarily involve a specific community of faith. As the canon describes the ramifications of this sacrament, baptism has a personal, individual effect: incorporation into Christ. This personal relationship with Jesus Christ is presupposed in other consequences of baptism as elaborated by canon 204, §1. But baptism also has a social effect: a person enters into the people of God; more particularly, the person enters into a specific community of faith.

From these relationships—with Christ and with the rest of the people of God—flow two consequences: first, the person, in virtue of baptism, participates in the threefold functions (mu- nera) of Christ as priest, prophet, and ruler. Second, the person receives a call (vocatio) to exercise the mission of the Church in the world, a mission derived from God and from the person's active response to God's initiative. Both consequences require specific determination: individuals participate in the triple functions (munera) each "in their own way," and they exercise this mission in distinct manners, determined in reference to each person's "condition." Before we clarify further these types of determinations, a foundational principle must be understood.

The effects and consequences of baptism expressed in §1 apply to all the baptized, whether Catholic or not. This application to all the baptized forms one of the constitutive principles of a communio ecclesiology: by the fact of baptism, each of the baptized enters into a relationship with all other baptized; all the baptized are equal in dignity and all are called to exercise the Church's mission (see c. 208).[10] According to canon 207, "by divine institution" all the Christian faithful are either clerics or laity. Specifically within the code, apart from such theological statements as in this paragraph, the term "Christian faithful" (Christifideles) applies to the baptized who live in full communion with the Catholic Church (c. 205). Thus derives a second principle of a communio ecclesiology: varying degrees of communion exist, i.e., degrees of relationship with the Catholic Church. Canon 204, following the conciliar texts, does not refer to membership but rather to incorporation; degrees of incorporation exist. "Incorporation" as used in §1 does not necessarily imply "full incorporation"; "communion with the Church" does not necessarily imply "full communion." Incorporation is a more dynamic term than membership, reflecting the ongoing and hopefully deepening relationship between the individual and God and between the individual and the community of faith. Thus, the relationship between a baptized person and the Catholic Church receives specification along a continuum from "communion" to "full communion" and this specification forms the primary aspect of the "condition" proper to each baptized person.

This communio among all of the baptized with the Catholic Church forms the basis for the ecumenical movement.[11] The code refers to ecumenism in canon 755, §1 (the competence of the college of bishops and the Apostolic See in promoting and directing Catholic participation in the ecumenical movement); canon 383, §3 (the bishop's role in fostering ecumenism); and canon 256 (instruction of seminarians in ecumenical concerns). The code also provides more particular actions: canon 463, §3 allows the bishop to invite persons not in full communion to the diocesan synod as observers; canon 825, §2 allows Catholics and "separated brothers and sisters" to cooperate in preparing and publishing translations of scripture with the permission of the conference of bishops; canon 844, §4 establishes conditions for administering the sacraments of penance, Eucharist, and anointing of the sick to Christians who do not enjoy full communion; canon 1183, §3 outlines circumstances in which funeral rites can be granted to baptized non-Catholics; and canons 1124–1129 refer to mixed marriages.

Thus the foundational "condition" of the faithful arises from the reception of baptism; as noted, there are varying degrees of communion with the Catholic Church, and this affects the exercise of rights and duties. A related canon, canon 96, states that the Christian faithful can exercise rights and duties "insofar as they are in ecclesiastical communion"; unlike canon 204, this canon refers to the baptized person primarily from a juridical rather than theological perspective.[12] An individual's condition is also determined by other factors, for example, age (cc. 97–98), mental capacity (c. 99), residence (including but not limited to domicile and quasi-domicile; see cc. 100–107 and 209, §2). Reception of sacraments also affects one's condition. For example, holy orders establishes further rights and obligations for the one ordained (cc. 207, 1008, 273–289) as does the sacrament of matrimony for the spouses (cc. 226; 774, §2; 1135–1136). An individual's condition also changes when he or she makes a public commitment in an institute of consecrated life (cc. 573 and 662–672). Further, an individual belongs to a particular ritual church (for example, the Latin church or the Ukrainian Catholic Church; see cc. 111–112).[13] Finally, sanctions may affect an individual's standing and thus condition in the Church, provided that these are "legitimately issued" (c. 96).

[10] In the context of c. 204, §1, the word "Church" refers to the Church of Christ; §2 clarifies the relationship between the Church of Christ and the Catholic Church.

[11] See, for example, Ecum Dir, especially 13–21.

[12] For a further discussion of rights and obligations, see the introduction to title I (cc. 208–223).

According to canon 204, the faithful participate through baptism in the threefold functions (munera) "in their own way." Two consequences derive from this. First, all the people of God possess a role in exercising the functions of Jesus Christ priest, prophet, and ruler. Through this participation, the Christian faithful continue the mission of Christ entrusted to the Church: to proclaim the gospel and thus continue the work of redemption. The qualifying phrase, "in their own way," refers to the second consequence: each of the faithful receives and accepts a specific vocation from God.[14] The code refers more explicitly to participation in the offices of priest and prophet, less explicitly to the governing office.[15]

Paragraph two, citing Lumen gentium 8, expresses a theological principle foundational to a communio ecclesiology, namely, the fact that the two terms, "Church of Christ" and "Catholic Church," are not identical with one another; rather, "this Church [of Christ]...subsists in the Catholic Church."[16] Lumen gentium 8—and this canon which quotes it—thus makes a positive affirmation that the Church founded by Christ continues to exist as a visible society, active in history, guided by the Holy Spirit, and under the leadership of the successor of Peter and the bishops in communion with him (cc. 331 and 336). From the canonical perspective, the most important implications of this teaching—the relationship among all the baptized—refer to the possibility of sacramental sharing (c. 844) and the canons concerned with mixed marriage (cc. 1124–1129). While "many elements of sanctification and of truth are to be found" outside the structure of the Catholic Church,[17] these elements "impel toward Catholic unity."[18] The same texts recognize the unique place held by the Catholic Church: "For it is only through Christ's catholic church, which is the all-embracing means of salvation, that the fullness of the means of salvation can be attained."[19] Any form of religious syncretism, i.e., that all churches are equal, is clearly rejected, a principle also found in the Ecumenical Directory, paragraph 17.

By analogy with the Incarnation, the Church exists in the world as a visible reality, a society. But the visible society possesses a distinct purpose: it "serves the Spirit of Christ who vivifies the church towards the growth of the body";[20] this purpose serves as a refutation of attempts to distinguish between, for example, "the Church of law" and "the Church of charity" as though the Church could exist in the world independent of any structure or of any norms.

[13] Note the important principle in c. 112, §2: baptism in the Latin church does not necessarily enroll that person into the Latin church.

[14] For specific examples of this participation, see cc. 208–223 (which apply to all the Christian faithful); cc. 224–231 (which pertain to lay Christian faithful); and cc. 273–289 (which apply to clerics).

Full Communion

Canon 205 — Those baptized are fully in the communion of the Catholic Church on this earth who are joined with Christ in its visible structure by the bonds of the profession of faith, the sacraments, and ecclesiastical governance.

This canon continues the ecclesiological foundation of the code by identifying those persons who live in "full communion" with the Catholic Church (see CCEO 8). As discussed in reference to canon 204, all the baptized share some relationship—to a greater or lesser degree—with the Catholic Church. Thus, a distinction exists between "full communion" and "communion," between "full incorporation" and "incorporation"; canon 205 offers basic criteria for determining, in the external forum, which persons live in "full communion" with the Catholic Church.

The canon derives from Lumen gentium 14 with two important modifications: it deletes the phrase "possessing the Spirit of Christ" (describing those persons who are "fully incorporated into the society of the Church") and omits one of the bonds, namely, that of communion.[21] While the canon focuses on external criteria for determining full communion, it does not ignore the internal dimension, indicated by the phrase "joined with Christ." Communio ecclesiology presupposes the grace of God through this union: the Holy Spirit is constitutive of the Church as communio. These three bonds (the profession of faith, the sacraments, and ecclesiastical governance) imply some type of faith relationship with God as a reason for the person to assume freely the obligations inherent in them. The omission of the fourth bond—communion—raises fewer difficulties inasmuch as canon 209 obliges all the Christian faithful to maintain communion with the Church.

The code does not specify the content of the three bonds; inasmuch as breaking full communion restricts rights (c. 96), canon 18, requiring a strict interpretation of such laws, would apply in any attempt to determine that a person is no longer in full communion. Thus, the application of this canon to a particular individual and precise situation requires great caution to avoid violating individual rights, for example, the right to a good reputation (c. 220). In addition, external actions do not always or necessarily correspond to interior dispositions; we must maintain the distinction between the external forum and the internal forum as well as realize that harmony between these two fora does not always exist.

One of the principles for the code revision and approved by the 1967 synod of bishops urged proper coordination between the external and the internal fora so as to avoid conflict between them. The judgment that an individual has in fact broken the bond of full communion pertains primarily to the external forum; it does not necessarily indicate that a person has committed sin. Although an individual's external activities should generally reflect his or her interior dispositions, a conflict could arise between a person's internal faith relationship ("communion") with God and the person's incorporation into the Church. In the external forum, the judgment could be made that a person has broken full communion; this judgment, however, does not necessarily indicate a rupture in the person's interior relationship with God, that the individual has sinned. For example, an apostate from the Catholic faith has clearly broken full communion with the Church (see cc. 751; 1364, §1); God alone judges the effect of such an action on the person's relationship with God.

The conciliar teaching on the hierarchy of truths assists in understanding the first bond, that of the profession of the faith. Not all doctrines taught by the Church carry the same weight: they vary "in their connection with the foundation of the Christian faith"[22] and therefore elicit different responses from the faithful. Canons 750 and 752–754 reflect the hierarchy of truths by distinguishing types of church teaching. The canons begin with the obligation to believe "with divine and Catholic faith all those things contained . . . in the one deposit of faith" (c. 750, §1). The following canons apply to teachings that are not contained in the one deposit of faith and therefore elicit different responses: "a religious submission of the intellect and will" to a doctrine of the authentic magisterium concerning faith or morals declared by the pope or college of bishops (c. 752); adherence "with religious submission of mind to the authentic magisterium of their bishops" (c. 753); and observance of constitutions and decrees issued by the legitimate authority of the Church (c. 754). The hierarchy of truths and these differing responses recognize the fact that, although bishops are "authentic teachers, that is teachers endowed with the authority of Christ" (LG 25), they do not always engage their teaching authority to its fullest extent.[23] Therefore, each teaching must be analyzed to determine the proper response of the faithful.

As defined in canon 751, heresy applies only to the first category, those teachings which must be believed by divine and catholic faith. As one consequence, the determination that a person has broken the bond of professing the faith must be carefully decided on an individual basis, taking into account the nature of the teaching involved. Further, an apostate, one who totally repudiates the Christian faith (c. 751), has broken this bond and thereby incurs an automatic excommunication (1364, §1). Nonetheless, that individual remains "in communion" with the Catholic Church. Sanctions affect the exercise of rights and obligations (c. 96) and may reflect the breaking of the bond of full communion, but they do not erase the fundamental communion relationship with God and with the Church deriving from baptism. In the practical order, this means that the individual may incur further expiatory penalties (c. 1364, §2) or may request reconciliation with the Church.

The second bond is that of sacraments which "contribute in the greatest way to establish, strengthen, and manifest ecclesiastical communion" (c. 840). Baptism is the prerequisite for receiving the other sacraments (c. 842, §1); the faithful have a right to receive the sacraments (c. 213) provided that they request the sacraments "at appropriate times, are properly disposed, and are not prohibited by law from receiving them" (c. 843, §1).[24] The sacraments themselves cross the boundaries between "full communion" with the Catholic Church and the lesser degree of communion of baptized non-Catholics with it: for example, canon 1055 states that every marriage between two baptized persons is a sacrament; canon 844 allows for reception of penance, Eucharist, and anointing of the sick by those not in full communion with the Catholic Church in certain circumstances and under specific conditions. Nonetheless, canon 837 articulates the basic principle that liturgical actions in general and the sacraments in particular are celebrations not of private individuals but of the specific community of faith, the Catholic Church, in union with Jesus Christ (see also cc. 834 and 840) and therefore are linked with "full ecclesial communion."[25]

The third bond, that of ecclesiastical governance, requires the same careful interpretation and application as demanded by the bond of profession of the faith; this bond reflects union with the visible or societal structure of the Church, including its hierarchical constitution with the Petrine ministry at the center of the communion. Canon 18, which requires a strict interpretation of canons that restrict rights, again serves to protect individuals: it must be unequivocally demonstrated that an individual has indeed broken the bond of governance before a judgment is made that full communion has been severed. Canon 751 defines schism as "the refusal of submission to the Supreme Pontiff or of communion with the members of the Church subject to him." One clear example of schism was the behavior of Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre, in particular his unlawful conferral of episcopal ordination on June 30, 1988, in the face of an explicit papal prohibition (see c. 1382). In his apostolic letter, Ecclesia Dei, Pope John Paul II described this ordination as constituting a schismatic act insofar as Archbishop Lefebvre's disobedience implied a rejection of the Roman primacy; further, those individuals linked with Archbishop Lefebvre have severed the bonds of full communion with the Catholic Church.[26]

[24] For examples of such a prohibition, see, for example, c. 1331, §1, 1° which forbids "any ministerial participation in celebrating the sacrifice of the Eucharist" and 2° which forbids the celebration and reception of the sacraments. Canon 915 discusses the reception of the Eucharist by those "obstinately persevering in manifest grave sin."

[25] See Ecum Dir 129 and also c. 908 which forbids Catholic priests from concelebrating the Eucharist with priests or ministers of churches or ecclesial communities which do not have full communion with the Catholic Church.

Other cases which might suggest schism, however, are not so apparent. Disagreement with church teaching does not necessarily break the bond of full communion, nor, more specifically, of the bonds of governance or of faith; each case must be carefully analyzed. In the Instruction on the Ecclesial Vocation of the Theologian, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith clearly distinguishes between "disagreement with Church teaching" and dissent, recognizing that a theologian can have difficulties with a particular teaching, the arguments used to justify it, or the way in which the teaching is presented and should make these difficulties known to the proper authority.[27] This process can contribute to a greater understanding and appropriation of Church teaching. Such a process does not break the bond of full communion, in contrast with "dissent" as this is presented in the same document. Such dissent "aims at changing the Church following a model of protest" derived from political society and maintains that non-infallible teachings lack any obligatory character.[28] Thus understood, "dissent" might indicate a severance in full communion, but caution must be used to determine that a particular theologian is exhibiting dissent rather than experiencing "difficulties with Church teaching."

Canon 205 describes those in "full communion" and the criteria for judging its presence. The situation of those who wish to leave the Church is not addressed. On the occasion of Pope John Paul's visit to France in 1996, certain individuals requested that they be "de-baptized." Given the irrevocability of the baptismal character, theology (and the code) does not provide for fulfilling such requests, although specific canons create an exemption from the impediment of disparity of cult and the required form of marriage for those who leave the Church "by a formal act."[29] Aside from this particular situation, these persons are considered bound by church law (c. 11). This position, expressed through the axiom, "Once a Catholic, always a Catholic," reflects the fidelity of God toward an individual—the offer of grace always remains for the individual to accept or reject. From a canonical perspective, the law seeks to preserve clarity in determining who is bound to ecclesiastical laws.

Catechumens

Canon 206 — §1. Catechumens, that is, those who ask by explicit choice under the influence of the Holy Spirit to be incorporated into the Church, are joined to it in a special way. By this same desire, just as by the life of faith, hope, and charity which they lead, they are united with the Church which already cherishes them as its own.

§2. The Church has a special care for catechumens; while it invites them to lead a life of the gospel and introduces them to the celebration of sacred rites, it already grants them various prerogatives which are proper to Christians.

Canon 204 makes a fundamental distinction between persons who have received baptism and those who have not; the baptized live—to a greater or lesser degree—in communion with the Catholic Church. Canon 206 addresses the particular situation of catechumens, that is, unbaptized persons who request incorporation into the Catholic Church (see CCEO 9). In the external forum, catechumens do not yet enjoy communion with the Catholic Church inasmuch as they have not fulfilled the essential requirement of baptism.[30] The situation of catechumens thus differs from that of baptized non-Catholics who request full communion with the Catholic Church; the latter already live "in communion" with the Catholic Church and can exercise certain rights (see, e.g., c. 844).

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults does distinguish among different types of persons requesting full communion: the unbaptized; baptized non-Catholics; uncatechized Catholics who have received only the sacrament of baptism. Their formation is similar, but for the baptized the desire for full communion arises from this sacrament already received.[31] Proper selection and preparation of candidates prior to admission to the catechumenate is important, especially the investigation to determine that nothing impedes the individual's reception of the sacraments. Due pastoral care should address issues connected with the individual's marital history as well as that of his or her spouse.[32]

Book III, "The Teaching Function of the Church," refers to the catechumenate under title II, "The Missionary Action of the Church" (cc. 781–792). The canons envisage a period of pre-catechumenate (c. 788, §1; see c. 787 for preliminary dialogue with non-believers); the catechumenate itself (c. 788, §2); and the post-catechumenate period (the mystagogia, c. 789).[33]

Although catechumens do not enjoy communion with the Catholic Church, they are nevertheless "joined to [the Church] in a special way" and "are united with the Church which already cherishes them as its own." This relationship arises from the role of the Holy Spirit in the life of the individual. Neither the code in canon 206 nor its source, Lumen gentium 14, provides further specification of this relationship, despite the encouragement in Ad gentes 14 that "the juridical status of catechumens should be clearly expressed in the new code." Canon 788, §3 empowers conferences of bishops to determine "what prerogatives are to be recognized as theirs [the catechumens']." The term "prerogatives" is important: inasmuch as they have not yet received baptism, catechumens do not enjoy rights in the Church unless specifically granted to them. For example, canon 1183, §1 considers catechumens as members of the Christian faithful for the purposes of their funeral rites[34] and canon 1170 allows catechumens to receive certain blessings. However, if catechumens wish to enter into marriage with Catholics, they, as unbaptized, must request a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of cult.

The catechumenate can exercise a very important function, not only for the catechumens themselves, but also for the particular church community. The Christian community provides an example of living the virtues of faith, hope, and charity for the catechumens; the catechumens and their desire for full communion encourage the faithful to appreciate and to activate their own faith.[35]

Clergy, Religious, Laity

Canon 207 — §1. By divine institution, there are among the Christian faithful in the Church sacred ministers who in law are also called clerics; the other members of the Christian faithful are called lay persons.

[34] See OEx 18.

[35] The example and support provided by the community to catechumens is one manifestation of the obligation and right of all the Christian faithful to spread the gospel message (c. 211).

§2. There are members of the Christian faithful from both these groups who, through the profession of the evangelical counsels by means of vows or other sacred bonds recognized and sanctioned by the Church, are consecrated to God in their own special way and contribute to the salvific mission of the Church; although their state does not belong to the hierarchical structure of the Church, it nevertheless belongs to its life and holiness.

This canon is terminological, expressing the distinction between "sacred ministers" and "lay persons" and then specifying those Christian faithful (including both lay persons and sacred ministers) who are "consecrated to God" through professing the evangelical counsels. Canon 323 of the Eastern code describes clerics and thus corresponds to canon 207, §1; there is no equivalent to canon 207, §2.

Canon 207 must be situated within the context of communio, that is, the mutually supportive interrelationship of all the Christian faithful in the Church under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. This interrelationship necessarily involves the common mission of all the faithful (c. 204) as well as their "true equality regarding dignity and action" (c. 208) and has as its goal the salvation of all men and women.

The first distinction, between sacred ministers and lay persons, derives from "divine institution."[36] The canon significantly uses the expression "sacred ministers," contrasting it with the juridical term "clerics."[37] This reflects the distinction between the necessity for sacred ministry in the Church and the particular legal condition associated with that ministry, organized under the juridic title "the clerical state." A person becomes a cleric through reception of diaconate (c. 266, §1). Canon 290 presents one clear example of the distinction between sacred ministry and the juridic condition of ministers: ordination, once validly received, never becomes invalid, but an individual may lose "the clerical state." Title III of Book II discusses "Sacred Ministers or Clerics" under the chapter headings "The Formation of Clerics" (cc. 232–264); "The Enrollment, or Incardination, of Clerics" (cc. 265–272); "The Obligations and Rights of Clerics" (cc. 273–289); and "Loss of the Clerical State" (cc. 290–293). Book IV, "The Sanctifying Function of the Church," considers the sacrament of orders in canons 1008–1054; other references to clerics and to the clerical state are found throughout the code, e.g., canon 1333 which describes the penalty of suspension, applicable only to clerics.

The term "sacred ministry" also reflects the conciliar teaching that, in origin, this is a ministry of service so the people of God may attain salvation.[38] Sacred ministers are appointed by God and act in his name, not in the name of the community.[39] Lumen gentium 10 emphasizes the interre-

[36] See LG 32 and c. 1008. The phrase "by divine institution" indicates that sacred ministers are essential to the Church's hierarchical structure; see McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 117 (commentary on c. 207). "Some Questions" emphasizes the necessity of the ministerial priesthood "for a community to exist as 'church'" and quotes PDV 16: "The ordained priesthood ought not to be thought of as existing . . . posterior to the ecclesial community, as if the church could be imagined as already established without this priesthood" (402, #2).

[37] The phrase "sacred ministers" indicates an underlying terminological difficulty, present not only in the code but in the conciliar texts as well. In referring to ordained ministry in the Church, the code uses various expressions: sacred ministers (see, for example, cc. 232–293; 1008); presbyter (see, for example, cc. 89; 290, 3°; 294), and sacerdos (see, for example, cc. 233; 276; 279). For a full listing of such terms, see H. Zapp, Codex Iuris Canonici Lemmata Stichwortverzeichnis (Freiburg: Rombach, 1986). On the use of these terms, see, for example, D. Donovan, "Priest," in The New Encyclopedia of Theology (Wilmington: Michael Glazier, 1987).

[38] See LG 18; see also c. 1025, §2 which requires for licit ordination that a candidate be considered "useful for the ministry of the Church."

[39] See, for example, PO 2 and 5. See also Hervada, in Pamplona ComEng, 188: "Ministerial priesthood is participation in a divine power and can only be granted by a divine act; its cause is the sacrament of orders that produces the sacramental character at the root of which are the hierarchical munera or functions."

lationship between the common priesthood of the faithful and the ministerial priesthood: each in its own way originates from a participation in the one priesthood of Christ. Nonetheless, the two types of priesthood differ in "essence and not simply in degree."[40] This difference forms one basis for distinguishing the participation of all the faithful in the threefold functions (munera) of Jesus Christ as priest, prophet, and ruler (see c. 204) and the participation by the ordained in the same munera (see c. 1008 and CL 22–23). All persons have a distinct role in the Church and all should encourage one another in each one's particular vocation.[41]

The canon does not provide here a description of laity; further articulation of the laity's mission in the Church arises, in part, from their "specific lay vocation" derived from baptism, confirmation, and, for some, marriage; from their participation in the triple munera (c. 204); from a consideration of the obligations and rights of all the Christian faithful (see especially cc. 208–223) as well as those particular to the lay Christian faithful (cc. 224–231). According to one of the conciliar sources for this canon, "The laity, however, have the specific vocation to make the church present and active in those places and circumstances where only through them can it become the salt of the earth."[42]

Whereas the first paragraph is terminological in focus ("sacred ministers," "clerics," "lay persons"), the second paragraph, without using specific terminology, describes some of the Christian faithful who are distinguished by their "profession of the evangelical counsels." The paragraph therefore includes the groups and individuals discussed in part three of Book II: members of institutes of consecrated life; societies of apostolic life; and hermits. These persons profess the evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity, and obedience through vows or other bonds recognized as such by the Church and they thereby further specify their participation in the mission derived from baptism.[43] Further, this specification determines their "state" in the Church: they do not form part of the hierarchical constitution of the Church but rather belong "to its life and holiness" (see c. 210). Finally, as is reiterated in canon 588, §1, this state is neither clerical or lay; the code maintains the qualification found in Lumen gentium 43: consecrated life is not "an intermediate condition between the clerical and the lay" states.[44] Nonetheless, by analogy with the distinction between "sacred ministers" and "clerics," the latter indicating a particular legal condition, persons whose profession of the evangelical counsels is recognized and accepted by the Church do have a distinct juridic status. For example, their particular exercise of the obligations and rights of all the faithful is situated within the context of these vows or bonds as well as proper law applicable to them. Further, canons 662–672 present "The Obligations and Rights of Institutes and Their Members"; canons 711–712, 718–719, and 723 do the same for members of secular institutes; and [40] See LG 10. "Some Questions" summarizes the essential difference between the ministerial priesthood and the common priesthood of the faithful in two points: "a) The ministerial priesthood is rooted in the apostolic succession and vested with potestas sacra, consisting of the faculty and the responsibility of acting in the person of Christ the head and the shepherd. b) It is a priesthood which renders its sacred ministers servants of Christ and of the church by means of authoritative proclamation of the word of God, the administration of the sacraments and the pastoral direction of the faithful" (401, #1).

[41] See "Some Questions," which states that through the ministerial priesthood "Christ gives to priests, in the Spirit, a particular gift so that they can help the people of God to exercise faithfully and fully the common priesthood which it has received" (400–401, #1, quoting PDV 17). See also cc. 394, §2 and 529, §2 for the responsibility of bishops and of pastors in fostering the proper role of laity in the Church's mission. Canon 233, §1 expresses the duty of all the faithful to foster vocations to sacred ministry.

canons 731, 735, and 737–742 apply to members of societies of apostolic life. One might note that canon 672 applies certain obligations of clerics to members of institutes of consecrated life.

TITLE I
THE OBLIGATIONS AND RIGHTS OF ALL THE CHRISTIAN FAITHFUL
[cc. 208–223]

The code contains several titles which list obligations and rights; of paramount importance are those expressed here. Their importance arises from their placement at the beginning of Book II: these obligations and rights follow directly after the ecclesiological principles expressed in canons 204–207 and serve to develop and particularize these principles in the life of the communio that is the Church, the people of God. In other words, canons 208–223 present specific means by which the people of God express their identity and their mission in the world. Book II contains other obligations and rights which pertain to specific groups: "The Obligations and Rights of the Lay Christian Faithful" (cc. 224–231); "The Obligations and Rights of Clerics" (cc. 273–289); "The Obligations and Rights of Institutes and Their Members" (cc. 662–672). In addition to these groups of canons, other duties and rights are found throughout the code. For example, canon 793, §1 expresses the right of parents to educate their children, and canon 1620, 7° nullifies a judicial sentence if the right of defense was denied to either party in the case.

Obligations and rights, analyzed either within the context of the Church or of civil society, comprise a complex topic, involving a number of disparate but related issues: the source of rights and duties; the distinction between civil and ecclesial society; the basis for rights (for example, natural, divine, human positive law, either ecclesiastical or civil); the protection of rights and encouragement of the Christian faithful to use them; the enforcement of obligations; recourse against neglect or violation of specific rights.

The approach taken here begins with communio ecclesiology as expressive of the Church's nature and mission.[45] In his apostolic constitution promulgating the code, Sacrae disciplinae leges, Pope John Paul II explicitly links the participation of the faithful in the threefold functions (munera) of Jesus Christ priest, prophet, and ruler with the obligations and rights of the faithful and, in particular, of the laity. This connection indicates that the fundamental basis for understanding and interpreting the rights and duties of the faithful (including those listed in this title as well as others expressed elsewhere) is communio, the relationship between the individual and God which finds visible manifestation in the person's incorporation into Christ and the community of faith through the sacrament of baptism.

Rights and duties, therefore, occur within a specifically theological or spiritual context—the Church as the community of faith established by Jesus Christ as the sacrament of salvation until the fulfillment of the kingdom of God through the return of Christ.[46] This community of faith finds its origin and goal in the self-communication of God—communio begins and continues with God's initiative. This salvific context also applies to specific rights which are more universal in scope and which thereby pertain to everyone, for example, canon 220, which expresses the right to protect one's privacy. The exercise of this right occurs within the specific context of the Church as communio. Certain canons apply to all the baptized under definite conditions. For example, canon 213 expresses the right to receive spiritual help, especially the word of God and the sacraments, from sacred pastors. Although the canon applies primarily to those persons living in full [45] For a fuller elaboration of this ecclesiology, see the introduction to Book II. For other analyses of rights and obligations, see, for example, Provost, in CLSA Com, 134–139; Hervada, in Pamplona ComEng, 190; McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 118.

[46] See, for example, LG 9.

communion with the Catholic Church (c. 205), it also applies to baptized non-Catholics, as governed by canon 844.

From another perspective, the origin of rights also requires this theological context, specifically in reference to God's salvific will. Bishop Walter Kasper suggests two mutually related approaches to understanding the basis of rights. The more traditional approach begins with natural law: rights reflect the fundamental dignity of the human person, a dignity arising from one's human nature as a free being and endowed with the ability to reason. The second approach, more common since Vatican II, begins with the economy of salvation and situates rights within God's plan of salvation for humanity. This plan begins with the creation of men and women in God's image and reaches its culmination in the incarnation of Jesus Christ. Through the incarnation, by which the second person of the Trinity assumed human nature and united it with himself, God imparts a unique dignity to each and every human being.[47] These two approaches are summarized by Gaudium et spes 29:

> Since all men and women possessed of a rational soul and created in the image of God have the same nature and the same origin, and since they have been redeemed by Christ and enjoy the same divine calling and destiny, the basic equality which they all share needs to be increasingly recognized.

Each approach provides a balance to the other: the abstract notion of "human nature" as created in God's image and endowed with reason finds its correlative in the reality that each human being—as he or she exists in a particular historical period—has been changed by the incarnation of Jesus Christ. As the Eastern tradition maintains, "God became human so that humans could become divine."[48]

Understanding rights and duties within this theological context—broadly expressed, the economy of salvation—removes certain objections to the idea of "fundamental" rights within the Church—primarily, that the Church cannot be considered the equivalent to civil society; that rights arise from and foster an adversarial relationship between the individual and state authority; that the Church as founded by Christ focuses on a personal faith relationship with God, not on rights. These objections must be taken seriously and not only in the context of obligations and rights. There is still the danger of considering the Church simply as a perfect society, i.e., complete in and of itself, analogous to the civil state. This ecclesiology was prevalent until Vatican II and is operative even today when people might consider the Church as an international business conglomerate which manages itself as such. The Church exists as a visible, organized society only to fulfill the mission entrusted to it by Christ and this mission determines the context for any discussion of obligations and rights.[49] In other words, any ecclesial activity, including the exercise of obligations and rights, must be viewed in terms of its fostering the salvific purpose and mission of the Church.

An emphasis on this salvific mission can also correct the impression that rights arise or exist only in consequence of an adversarial relationship between an individual and civil (or ecclesiastical) authority. The Church was established by the will of Christ and not by a group of individuals acting on their own behalf; rights in the Church, therefore, derive from incorporation into Christ through the sacrament of baptism and not from a social compact among individuals.[50] A relationship with God finds its most specific and visible expression in baptism; this relationship with God necessarily involves the community of faith. The community dimension—incorporation into the Body of Christ, communio with God and with other members of the Church—argues against an excessive individualism in which an overemphasis on individual rights often gives rise to an adversarial relationship not only with authority but also with the other members of the community.

Further, the Church as communio provides a basis for understanding the dynamic interrelationship between obligations and rights: each right implies a duty and each duty implies a right. The terminology, "obligations and rights," does not imply a priority of one over the other; they are "essential and inseparable."[51] For example, the Christian faithful have a right to receive spiritual assistance from pastors, especially the word of God and the sacraments (c. 213). The code expresses the same right from a different perspective in canon 843, which requires pastors to provide the sacraments to those properly prepared for them, and canon 767, which requires pastors to preach. The obligation to maintain communion (c. 209) corresponds to the duty of the pastor to have concern for and to promote parochial communion (c. 529, §2).

The emphasis on the community of faith and on the Church's mission finds expression through the arrangement of the canons in this title. Canon 208 begins by stating a general principle, derived from the theology expressed in canons 204–205, namely, that a true equality in dignity and in action exists among all the faithful. This fundamental equality does not remove differences among the Christian faithful; different persons have distinct vocations within the community. Flowing from this principle, canons 209 and 223 act as a framework for specific obligations and rights: both canons refer to the broader context for their exercise. As with the practice of faith, duties and rights in the Church exist within a specific community; they do not emphasize the individual as such but are a means to ensure that the Church as the people of God continues to manifest the reality of salvation in the world. Canon 209 therefore emphasizes the interrelationship among all the Christian faithful; each one of the faithful has the obligation not only to live within and actively support the communio that is the Church but also to foster the interior communio with God. Canon 223 provides a more particular context for rights and duties: the common good of the Church, the rights of others, and duties toward other persons. In other words, the common good is not in opposition to obligations and rights but provides the particular context for their proper exercise. Canons 208–223 (and other duties and rights expressed elsewhere in the code) provide a means to ensure that the Church as a visible society not only allows but also actively encourages the mission of all the Christian faithful derived from baptism.

The duties and rights expressed within this framework in canons 210–222 reflect the nature of the Church as communio. Certain rights and obligations reflect the fundamental dignity derived from a relationship with God and from baptism and incorporation into the Body of Christ: the right to privacy and a good name and reputation (c. 220); the right to freedom from coercion in choosing a state of life (c. 219); the requirement to lead a holy life (c. 210); the rights to proclaim the divine message of salvation (c. 211) and to promote and sustain apostolic action (c. 216); the right to spiritual assistance, primarily, the sacraments and the word of God (c. 213); the right to worship according to one's rite and to follow one's own spiritual life (c. 214). Other rights and obligations flow from this basic dignity and reflect the organized structure of the Church as well as the variety of functions and vocations within the community: the obligation of Christian obedience (c. 212, §1); the right to express needs and desires and to manifest opinions on ecclesial issues (c. 212, §§2–3); the right to a Christian education (c. 217); the right to legitimate academic freedom of inquiry and expression (c. 218); the right to associate (c. 215); the obligation to provide for the Church's needs and to promote social justice (c. 222); the right to vindicate and defend one's rights, to be judged according to the law applied with equity (c. 221 §§1–2), and not to be punished except in accord with the law (c. 221, §3).[52] These obligations and rights, however categorized, cannot be interpreted in isolation, apart from communio—the relationship with God and with the specific community of faith.

This analysis of obligations and rights within the context of the Church as communio must also recognize another teaching of Vatican II. While consistently reiterating the teaching of the genuine holiness of the Church found, for example, in the Nicene Creed, the council also recognized the reality that individual men and women do sin. According to Lumen gentium 8, "the church, containing sinners in its own bosom, is at one and same time holy and always in need of purification." In other words, the Church is holy inasmuch as it was established by Jesus Christ as the definitive sign of his victory over sin and death. At the same time, however, the Church is on pilgrimage in the world and is ever progressing toward its culmination in Christ.[53] Individuals within the Church can and do sin; at times, the rights of others are violated. Such violations need correction in order for the Church to fulfill its mission. From this perspective, the listing of obligations and rights, such as is found in this title, provide one means for the Church on pilgrimage in this world to strive consistently to fulfill its mission. Thus, canon 221, affirming the right of the Christian faithful to vindicate their rights, is of foremost importance.[54]

Despite the presence of specific obligations and rights in the code, difficulties remain in their practical implementation in the life of the Church. These difficulties arise from a variety of reasons: lack of information about them among both clergy and lay people; deficiencies in procedures for protecting and vindicating rights as well as lack of knowledge about or access to these procedures; lack of support among bishops and clergy; and the complex terminology and careful nuances used in articulating specific obligations and rights.[55] This terminology can create certain difficulties in interpretation and implementation. The canons do not always express a right by using the Latin word ius. For example, the right to enjoy a good reputation is expressed passively and negatively: "No one is permitted to harm illegitimately the good reputation which a person possesses" (c. 220).[56] In addition, difficulties emerge as to the precise content, limits, and fulfillment of certain rights, for example, canon 211 and the right to proclaim "the divine message of salvation."[57] At a more foundational level, the implications of communio ecclesiology for the life of the Church need further development and articulation, especially in developing Church structures and institutes to reflect the communio that is the Church. For example,

> We are still far from having worked out the rights and duties that flow from such a respect; e.g., in matters concerning freedom

[56] See also J. Provost, "Protecting and Promoting the Rights of Christians: Some Implications for Church Structure," J 46 (1986) 289–342. Provost notes, "At times [a right] may be expressed in terms of an obligation. What I have an obligation to do, I have a right to do. What I have an obligation to provide for you, you have a right to receive" (302).

[57] See "Some General Reflections," 22 where Castillo Lara maintains that the norms in cc. 208–223 are "true duties and rights"; nonetheless, "it is not easy, and perhaps, is not even possible to quantify them and to determine their precise extent or the range of one right's necessity or the concrete exercise of others." For his part, J. McIntyre refers to a "basic ambiguity" present in this title inasmuch as the canons do not adequately answer the question, "Who is obliging the christifideles to do or not to do x?" See "Rights and Duties Revisited," J 56 (1996) 119.

of conscience within the church, regarding the speedy administration of justice, representations of issues before the hierarchy, and so forth.[58]

Despite such difficulties, this title and other rights and duties found in the code offer a significant contribution to the life of the Church. Further progress is needed in understanding such rights and duties as well as supporting and protecting their use. The obligation of maintaining communio (c. 209) requires such progress. All the Christian faithful, whatever their condition, state, or function, must encourage and support one another in their shared mission, both ad extra (to the world) and ad intra (in the Church itself). The exercise of rights and the fulfillment of duties serve the communio that is the Church and guarantee that it fulfills its divine mission.

Fundamental Equality

Canon 208 — From their rebirth in Christ, there exists among all the Christian faithful a true equality regarding dignity and action by which they all cooperate in the building up of the Body of Christ according to each one's own condition and function.

The canon first states a general principle and then clarifies the application of that principle in the Church's life. The general principle states that a "true equality regarding dignity and action" exists among all the Christian faithful. The canon, taken from Lumen gentium 32 and found in the Eastern code in canon 11, marks a significant shift in understanding the nature of the Church as an organized society. In the previous code, the Church was perceived as a society of unequals, depending upon whether one had received ordination or not. This fundamental change in perception reflects a communio ecclesiology and develops theologically the implications arising from the reception of baptism as elaborated in canon 204.[59] Thus, the fundamental equality among all the people of God has a sacramental origin; all the baptized share a personal, individual relationship with Jesus Christ, a relationship which finds visible expression through entrance into a particular faith community by baptism. Through this incorporation into the Body of Christ (c. 204), each of the baptized is a daughter or son of God. In addition, all the baptized share in the priestly, prophetic, and ruling functions (munera) of Jesus Christ; they thereby participate in the mission entrusted to the Church by Christ. At its most fundamental level, participation in the Church's mission arises from baptism and not from a mandate or concession of a competent ecclesiastical authority. Nonetheless, difficulties remain in the activation of this participation; adequate structures are not always available to encourage dynamic involvement of the faithful; and some of the faithful remain unaware of their obligations in this regard.

Moving from the principle to its application in the Church's life, the canon then states that this participation is not univocal but rather differs "according to each one's own condition and function." This phrase refers to the diversity concretely existing among the people of God; differences exist in the means by which particular individuals participate in the Church's mission; different levels of responsibility exist. All the faithful share in one baptism, but their participation in the triple functions (munera) of Christ differs according to the diversity of vocations and charisms in the Church as well as an individual's specific

"condition."[60] All the faithful enjoy the obligations and rights listed in this title; other rights and obligations are listed elsewhere in the code. Together, as one people, the faithful build up the Church and cooperate in its mission. More specific duties come with reception of specific sacraments; the faithful who enter into matrimony assume particular duties. For example, they edify the people of God through their marriage and family (c. 226, §1); each spouse has equal duties and rights within marriage (c. 1135), including that of preserving conjugal life (c. 1151). Parents have added responsibilities: the obligation and right to educate their children, and, more especially, to provide a Christian education (cc. 226, §2; 793; 1136) and they participate in the Church's sanctifying function through their conjugal life (c. 835, §4). Other faithful receive a particular grade of the sacrament of orders (episcopacy, presbyterate, or diaconate—c. 1009), each with its responsibilities.[61] Some of the faithful enter an institute of consecrated life and assume specific obligations.[62] Some people are elected or appointed to an ecclesiastical office and thereby incur specific responsibilities as defined in the code, in particular law, and in the letter of appointment.[63]

In the specific context of obligations and rights, canon 208 declares the requisite foundational principle: obligations and rights as well as their exercise and protection exist within the specific community of faith, the Church as communio, which is both a visible, hierarchically structured society and a spiritual community.[64] The interrelationship of all the faithful within the Church and their common dignity, equality, and participation in mission manifest the fundamental unity constitutive of the one body of Christ.[65]

Obligations of Communion

Canon 209 — §1. The Christian faithful, even in their own manner of acting, are always obliged to maintain communion with the Church.

§2. With great diligence they are to fulfill the duties which they owe to the universal Church and the particular church to which they belong according to the prescripts of the law.

Canon 209 expresses a fundamental obligation incumbent upon the baptized. This obligation refers to two aspects or dimensions of an individual's life: the internal, personal response to the divine invitation to enter into a relationship with God and the external expression of that personal response within the community of faith through reception of baptism. The first aspect may be expressed as the obligation of "being communion";[66] the second as a "right and duty obligation." The Eastern code contains the same obligation in canon 12.

As a juridic instrument, the code places emphasis upon the latter dimension of maintaining communion; nonetheless, this obligation and right presuppose the internal faith dimension, "being communion": the person's continuing and hopefully deepening relationship with God; participation in the communio which is the intra-Trinitarian life; the free and ongoing response to God and cooperation with the means of salvation. When this internal dimension finds external expression through a relationship with a particular ecclesial community or church by means of baptism, the person enters into some degree of communion with the Catholic Church;[67] the extent of the fulfillment of obligations and the exercise of rights [66] The phrase "being communion" is found in the instrumentum laboris of the 1994 special synod of bishops for Africa: "First and foremost the accent must be placed on 'being' communion, and afterward on 'doing' something. Action cannot precede being." Synod of Bishops, "Final Message of the Synod for Africa," 58, Origins 24 (May 19, 1994) 118.

depends upon whether the individual lives in full communion or not (c. 205). In addition to the degree of ecclesiastical communion, canon 96 further nuances this relationship by adding two other qualifiers to the exercise of duties and rights: "in keeping with their condition" and "unless a legitimately issued sanction stands in the way." Inasmuch as the judgment that an individual is not in full communion with the Catholic Church adversely affects that person's exercise of obligations and rights, canon 18 requires that such a determination be based upon clear and unequivocal grounds.[68]

The interrelationships resulting from communio and the consequent obligation to maintain communion affect every aspect of the Church's life and mission. Communio finds particular expression through the communion of the faithful (communio fidelium), the communion of churches (communio ecclesiarum), and hierarchical communion (communio hierarchica). The communio fidelium recognizes the fundamental unity among all the baptized as the one people of God; all share in a common dignity, equality, and mission (c. 208). The unity of those in full communion with the Catholic Church finds specific manifestation through the bonds of profession of the faith, ecclesiastical governance, and the sacraments (c. 205). The communio fidelium is a dynamic reality requiring the active participation of all the faithful in the Church's life and mission. It finds visible expression through public worship, by which the faithful exercise their common priesthood,[69] and through the exercise of obligations and rights.

We may understand the communio ecclesiarum from two different viewpoints. According to canon 368, the communio ecclesiarum exhibits the bond of unity existing among the particular churches (generally dioceses) with one another; this requires the bond of hierarchical communion within the college of bishops (c. 330). From a second viewpoint, the communio ecclesiarum reflects the bond of unity among the "ritual churches sui iuris." These churches are defined as "a group of Christian faithful united by a hierarchy according to the norm of law which the supreme authority of the Church expressly or tacitly recognizes as sui iuris" (CCEO 27). The Latin church is one such church sui iuris.[70] The unity of the Catholic Church arises from the Spirit-founded communio existing among these sui iuris churches; consequently, the Church is not simply an aggregate unity as in an association nor is it a federation of independent churches which chose to unite (and thus could choose to separate).[71]

The communio hierarchica reflects the bond of unity existing within the Church as hierarchically constituted; the pope "is the perpetual and visible principle and foundation of unity both of the bishops and of the multitude of the faithful"[72] and is obliged to maintain communion (c. 333, §2). In its broadest application, hierarchical communion recognizes that the Church is both a spiritual community and a society with hierarchical structures. In a more specific application, this communion reflects the unity within the Church's hierarchical structure, especially among members of the college of bishops. Thus, for example, communio hierarchica is required for a bishop to exercise the functions he received through ordination.[73]

The second paragraph of canon 209 exhorts the faithful to fulfill their duties to the universal and particular church; most often, the exercise of such duties occurs within the particular church and parish to which they belong by reason of domicile or quasi-domicile.[74] According to canon 107, §1: "Through both domicile and quasi-domicile, each person acquires his or her pastor and ordinary." Inasmuch as laws are presumed to be territorial (c. 13), domicile or quasi-domicile determines the applicability of laws (c. 13, §§2–3) as well as the proper ecclesiastical authority for dispensations and permissions.[75] Canon 529, §2 expresses the pastor's duty to work "so that the faithful have concern for parochial communion, consider themselves members of the diocese and of the universal Church, and participate in and sustain efforts to promote this same communion." Canons 383–394 describe the diocesan bishop's responsibility for promoting communion within his diocese.

From one perspective, the duties owed to the universal and to the particular church depend upon a variety of factors: the person's condition, state in life, and functions within the community.[76] At a more fundamental level, underlying these particular responsibilities is the person's obligation to foster his or her relationship with God, responding to God's invitation to participate in the divine communio of Father, Son, and Spirit and to express this participation in the communio of the Church. As Pope John Paul states in Sacrae disciplinae leges, the law exists to serve faith, grace, and charisms, especially charity, in the Church's life. In other words, the obligation "to maintain communion" is a dynamic one; each of the faithful must apply this obligation to his or her particular situation within the Church. Communio requires the active participation of all the faithful in a relationship with God and with other members of the Church; they experience and live this communion through prayer, common worship, service of neighbor, and the fulfillment of their baptismal mission.

Holiness of Life

Canon 210 — All the Christian faithful must direct their efforts to lead a holy life and to promote the growth of the Church and its continual sanctification, according to their own condition.

This canon reflects both the fundamental equality of the faithful (c. 208) and the twofold dynamism of communio which exists on both a personal and communal level (c. 209). The Eastern code contains the same obligation in canon 13. According to Lumen gentium 41, "there is one holiness cultivated by all who are led by the Spirit of God"; no one vocation or state in life is "holier" than another. This one call to holiness arises from a personal relationship—communio—with God. From an individual's personal relationship with God and consequent acceptance of baptism and full communion with the Catholic Church arises the obligation to lead a holy life and thereby promote not only the individual's own growth in holiness but also that of the Church as a whole. Change and growth are intrinsic to the human person, including his or her spiritual life; the faithful must strive constantly to deepen their communion with God and with the Church.

All of the faithful are called to a life of holiness by which they exercise their participation in the sanctifying function (munus) of Jesus Christ the priest. The means by which the individual strives to fulfill this participation depend upon the particular vocation to which one is called by God.[77] This participation can occur either individually or through associations. According to canon 298, §1, one purpose of associations is "to foster a more perfect life." More specifically, canon 387 obliges the diocesan bishop to promote the holiness of the faithful according to each one's proper vocation; further, he is obliged "to show an example of holiness in charity, humility, and simplicity of life"; canons 528–529 specify certain responsibilities of the pastor toward the faithful entrusted to his care. Canon 226, §1 addresses the vocation of the married and canons 774, §2 and 835, §4, the specific vocation of parents. Canon 276 asserts the obligation of clerics to pursue holiness "in a special way" since "they are dispensers of the mysteries of God in the service of His people." Canon 574, §1 states that all institutes of consecrated life pertain "to the life and holiness of the Church." As one consequence, members of institutes should foster their own holiness through means suggested by canons 573, 574, §2, and 662–664 and promote the holiness of the Church as a whole (cc. 673–677). This common pursuit of holiness among all the faithful contributes to the transformation of the world according to God's salvific will.[78]

Proclaim the Gospel

Canon 211 — All the Christian faithful have the duty and right to work so that the divine message of salvation more and more reaches all people in every age and in every land.

Canon 211 expresses a foundational right and obligation arising directly from baptism, which is also found in canon 14 of the Eastern code. Through baptism, each person, whatever his or her condition, participates in the mission of the Church; each person is obliged and possesses the right to proclaim the gospel message.[79] The sacrament of confirmation "strengthens the baptized and obliges them more firmly to be witnesses of Christ by word and deed and to spread and defend the faith" (c. 879). In his apostolic exhortation, Evangelii nuntiandi, Pope Paul VI describes this mission of evangelization as "in fact the grace and vocation proper to the Church, her deepest identity."[80] As such, "evangelizing means bringing the Good News into all the strata of humanity, and through its influence transforming humanity from within and making it new."[81]

[78] See LG 40.

[81] Ibid., 11, #18.

The nature of the Church as missionary originates in the mission of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, according to the salvific plan of the Father.[82] Further elaboration of this mission occurs within the ecclesiology of communio. A relationship with God—participation in the divine communion of Father, Son, and Spirit—cannot remain solely interior but needs visible expression. A relationship with God is also directed outwards, in the proclamation of the good news of salvation and in the cooperation of men and women in the power of the Spirit for the salvation of individuals and of the world.[83]

As one consequence, the right and duty of the Christian faithful to proclaim the gospel arises fundamentally from the sacrament of baptism, not from a mandate of ecclesiastical authority. Such a right and duty reflects the fundamental equality of all the faithful (c. 208) and their participation in the prophetic function (munus) of Jesus Christ. "The first means of evangelizing is the witness of an authentically Christian life, given over to God in a communion . . . and at the same time given to one's neighbor."[84] As with communio itself, evangelization has both personal and communal dimensions: the person must be converted first in a free and ongoing response to God's initiative and then work for the transformation of society as a whole through the gospel.

The code presents evangelization both in a broad and in a narrow sense. Canons 211 and 781 express the broader understanding in which all church activity is missionary.[85] From another perspective, canon 786 defines "missionary action" in a more particular sense as the proclamation of the Christian message in areas where it is not yet known; all the faithful can have a role in this proclamation. Both senses of evangelization are intimately related: specific "missionary action" reflects the Church's fundamental mission in the world.

As noted, the context for all evangelization is the Church as communio. The obligations to maintain communion (c. 209) and to foster the common good (c. 223) remind us that the exercise of this mission occurs within the specific community of faith that is the Catholic Church. Ecclesiastical authority has the right to regulate this participation if done in the name of the Church.[86] Further, the different methods used to proclaim the gospel not only reflect the legitimate diversity of the Church manifested through diverse functions and vocations but also manifest an image of the Church as it exists in the world.

The means of evangelization include the entire life of the Church—its spiritual and sacramental life; the variety of vocations in the world (laity, both single and married; parents; clerics; members of institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life); particular groupings (families; parishes; dioceses; associations, both public and private); different roles through participation in the triple functions (munera) of Jesus Christ priest, prophet, and ruler. Many of the canons in titles I and II of Book II as well as Book III indicate specific responsibilities for evangelization. Through these and other activities, the faithful fulfill their right and duty to proclaim the gospel.

Obedience—Expression of Needs and Desires—Public Opinion

Canon 212 — §1. Conscious of their own responsibility, the Christian faithful are bound to follow with Christian obedience those things which the sacred pastors, inasmuch as they represent Christ, declare as teachers of the faith or establish as rulers of the Church.

§2. The Christian faithful are free to make known to the pastors of the Church their needs, especially spiritual ones, and their desires.

§3. According to the knowledge, competence, and prestige which they possess, they have the right and even at times the duty to manifest to the sacred pastors their opinion on matters which pertain to the good of the Church and to make their opinion known to the rest of the Christian faithful, without prejudice to the integrity of faith and morals, with reverence toward their pastors, and attentive to common advantage and the dignity of persons.

The three paragraphs comprising this canon together express the dynamic nature of the Church as communio. The Eastern code equivalent is canon 15. Each of the faithful actively participates in the mission of the Church in virtue of baptism (c. 204); each person has a particular vocation to fulfill within the Church (cc. 210–211). But this participation is not primarily an individual endeavor; rather, a mutual interdependence exists by which all work together. This canon therefore expresses various aspects of the dynamic relationship which should exist among all the people of God. This relationship includes obedience to sacred pastors (§1), expressing needs and desires to the same pastors (§2), and manifesting opinions on matters concerning the good of the Church to other Christian faithful (§3). These activities strive for common growth in the faith and its practice and also reflect the legitimate diversity within the Church. As noted in the commentary on canon 209, the duty of maintaining communion requires an active, prayerful, and reflective response on the part of the Christian faithful. As one consequence of this obligation, a particular situation requires careful analysis to determine the appropriate response —obedience or expressing one's needs, desires, or opinions. The faithful may disagree with pastors in a particular situation over a specific issue; provided that the faithful maintain communion with and foster the common good of the Church, they have a right to express their opinions to other faithful. Foundationally, canon 212 reflects "the dignity and the responsibility" of the faithful, their "freedom and space to act"[87] and the Church's nature expressed as communio: its organization as a society is directed primarily at fulfilling its mission.[88] The interaction of all the faithful must serve the Church in its mission.

The first paragraph of this canon establishes the specific duty of obedience of the faithful to their sacred pastors as representatives of Christ in two specific areas: in that which pastors declare either as teachers of the faith or as rulers of the Church. A proper understanding of this obligation requires an accurate comprehension of the terms used as well as the context for this obedience, namely, the Church as communio in which all the faithful possess a true equality in dignity and activity (c. 208) and all contribute to the sanctification of themselves, of other faithful, and of the Church itself (c. 210). The dynamic nature of communio requires mutual cooperation, respect, and interdependence of all the faithful.

"Sacred pastors" are those among the faithful constituted as such through the sacrament of orders (cc. 1008 and 207). Canon 386 describes the diocesan bishop's teaching function and canon 391 his multi-faceted governing function. Within his specific competence, canon 519 discusses the pastor's responsibilities in these areas with the cooperation of other presbyters and deacons and the assistance of lay people. The role of "teachers of the faith" is developed more fully in Book III of the code, with the foundational principle articulated in canon 747. This canon expresses the Church's "duty and innate right... to preach the gospel to all peoples."

Not all Church teaching carries the same weight and authority; an order or hierarchy of truths exists within Christian doctrine, dependent upon the connection between a specific teaching and the foundation of the Christian faith.[89] The code reflects this order or hierarchy of truths in canons 750–754 which indicate the specific responses required of the faithful to Church teaching. The canons begin with the obligation to believe "with divine and Catholic faith all those things contained... in the one deposit of faith" (c. 750, §1). The following canons apply to teachings not contained in the one deposit of faith, which therefore elicit different responses: "a religious submission of the intellect and will" to a doctrine of the authentic magisterium concerning faith or morals declared by the pope or college of bishops (c. 752); adherence "with religious submission of mind to the authentic magisterium of their bishops" (c. 753); and observance of constitutions and decrees issued by the legitimate authority of the Church (c. 754).[90] Canon 749, §3 expresses a necessary principle: "No doctrine is understood as defined infallibly unless this is manifestly evident."

Inasmuch as bishops do not always intend to engage the full extent of their teaching authority when they teach on a specific issue,[91] careful examination of each teaching is required to determine the proper response. Thus, the obedience to which the canon obliges the faithful is not a blind, unquestioning reality but rather an intelligent and reflective response, requiring the Christian education expressed in canons 217 and 793–821. Such an education should provide the means by which the faithful may both appreciate and appropriate their faith and the teaching of the Church. In addition, the source for this canon, Lumen gentium 37, suggests that the Christian faithful should model their obedience on that of Christ "who by his obedience unto death opened to all people the blessed way of the freedom of the children of God."

Obedience is also the required response to what sacred pastors prescribe as "rulers of the Church." But the exercise of authority is not an end in and of itself; rather, it must serve the Church as communio and aim at fostering the "common good" (c. 223) as well as maintaining communion (c. 209). "Sacred pastors" also must maintain communion with their fellow believers and this obligation determines the appropriate exercise of authority: to build up the Church as communio. In Sacrae disciplinae leges, Pope John Paul describes "hierarchical authority as service" as a characteristic of the "true and genuine image of the Church."

The second paragraph of canon 212 expressly recognizes the right of all the faithful to express their needs and their wishes to the sacred pastors, with special emphasis given to spiritual needs. Unfortunately, the canon does not explicitly express the concomitant obligation on the part of sacred pastors to listen attentively to the faithful. As with the first paragraph, the context is the dynamic interrelationship among all the Christian faithful, a relationship founded upon mutual respect and trust, with the goal of helping the Church fulfill its mission as sign of and means to salvation. The basis for this right is the "freedom and confidence which befits children of God and sisters and brothers in Christ."[92] Needs and desires may be expressed either individually or through associations[93] or other corporate structures; they may be expressed orally or in writing. The conciliar context for this right is the Church's mission in the world; such needs and desires should reflect the context of the Church as communio in which all the faithful contribute to its mission.[94]

One particular way in which the faithful can express their needs and wishes is through various councils and synods. For example, canon 460 describes the diocesan synod as an assistance to the diocesan bishop for the good of the particular church. Canon 463 allows the bishop great freedom in determining who participates in the synod; he may even include as observers individuals who are not in full communion with the Church. Membership in other assemblies may also include a wide diversity of people; canon 443 discusses membership in particular councils and canon 339, §2 allows the supreme authority of the Church to determine the participation and role of those who are not bishops in an ecumenical council.

The third paragraph unequivocally expresses the right and duty of all the faithful to express their opinion on matters concerning the Church's good to their sacred pastors; the faithful have the right to express their opinion to other Christian faithful as well. Again, the ecclesiology of communio provides the context for a proper understanding and exercise of this free exchange, itself a basic human right.[95] Through the expression of opinions on matters affecting the Church, communio manifests itself as a dynamic interrelationship among all the Christian faithful. At the same time, however, communio also reminds us that no one acts as an individual but rather within a specific community of faith, the Catholic Church, which strives to be faithful to Jesus Christ and to the mission entrusted to it.

In the civil sphere, people have widely divergent experiences of opinions and "opinion polls" as determinative of official policy. These experiences—both negative and positive—have influenced the wording of this paragraph. Each of the faithful has the right and at times the duty to manifest an opinion on matters affecting the Church—including but not limited to the Church's teaching, sanctifying, and ruling functions (munera) as well as its conduct in temporal affairs. "Since the Church is a living body, she needs public opinion in order to sustain a giving and taking between her members. Without this, she cannot advance in thought and action."[96] trusted with the responsibility of teaching the faith and ruling the Church (§1 and cc. 1008 and 207). Sacred pastors should listen carefully and openly to these opinions; the paragraph also qualifies those expressing an opinion so as to assist pastors in assessing specific opinions: key considerations are the "knowledge, competence, and prestige" of the faithful who express opinions. All the faithful are equal in dignity and action (c. 208) and all participate in the threefold functions (munera) of Christ priest, prophet, and ruler in accord with their condition. They therefore have a right to take an active role in the Church. At the same time, however, some of the faithful, availing themselves of the right to a Christian education expressed in canon 217, have obtained the learning necessary to offer an informed and intelligent opinion based upon sound evidence, an opinion which must be taken seriously by sacred pastors.

From the perspective of those exercising the right and at times the duty to express their opinions to pastors and to other Christian faithful, paragraph three adds specific qualifiers of such an expression of opinion: the integrity of faith and morals; reverence toward pastors; common advantage; and the dignity of persons. In other words, expressing opinions occurs within the context of communio and should aim at the edification of the Church as a whole, not at its splintering into various groups. The "integrity of faith and morals" requires an understanding of the hierarchy of truths discussed above in reference to paragraph one; fundamentally, freedom to express opinions does not apply to doctrine contained in the deposit of faith as indicated by canons 750 and 751. The other qualifiers of the right—reverence towards pastors, common advantage, human dignity—reflect the obligation to maintain communion (c. 209), the common equality of all the faithful in dignity and activity (c. 208), and the necessity of fostering the common good (c. 223). This right and duty does not exist in the abstract as an absolute right but rather is concretely situated within the particular community of faith.

In 1996, the National Pastoral Life Center prepared a document, released by Cardinal Bernardin, entitled "Called to Be Catholic: Church in a Time of Peril." To foster the renewal of the Catholic Church in the United States, the document urges the Church's leadership to reaffirm and promote "authentic unity, acceptable diversity and respectful dialogue."[97] The document has elicited a number of responses, some of which raise concerns that the call for a common ground could conflict with the authentic magisterium of the Church. Cardinal Bevilacqua, for example, fears that some American Catholics wish to change Church teaching to foster greater participation in the Church's life. At times, this desire is directed at "divinely revealed truths" which the faithful treat as "outmoded civil institutions: Discard what is old; endorse what is new!"[98] Archbishop Oscar Lipscomb has addressed a number of criticisms directed at the Common Ground project; first and foremost, he affirms that all dialogue "is accountable to Scripture and to the Catholic tradition, witnessed and conveyed to us by the 'Spirit-filled, living Church' and its magisterium 'exercised by the bishops and the chair of Peter.'"[99] The archbishop also cites Communio et progressio: "Those who exercise authority in the church will take care to ensure that there is reasonable exchange of freely held and expressed opinion among the people of God."[100]

A balance needs to be maintained between the right and at times the duty of the faithful to express their opinions on the good of the Church and the concomitant obligation of the Church (as a whole) to remain faithful to the teaching entrusted to it and the more specific function of bishops, including the bishop of Rome, to be "true and authentic teachers of the faith."[101] This balance reflects the "supernatural sense of the faith" (sensus fidei) which does not result from some type of "opinion poll" or "majority vote" but rather "is a gift of grace, given by the Holy Spirit."[102] According to Lumen gentium 12, "The universal body of the faithful who have received the anointing of the holy one (see 1 Jn 2, 20 and 27) cannot be mistaken in belief." But the text continues by situating this "supernatural sense of the faith" within the necessary guiding role of the "sacred magisterium." The Holy Spirit sanctifies, guides, and bestows gifts and special graces upon all the faithful for the edification of the Church; all have a mission in the Church; all have a right to contribute to an ever-deepening appreciation of divine truth.[103]

As important as the expression of the right is the means to ensure its usefulness in the life of the Church. If the right exists, then sacred pastors must provide means for its exercise. Lumen gentium 37 suggests this right be exercised through "institutions set up for this purpose by the Church." Various institutions have already been established on the diocesan and parochial level. Such institutions can provide means for the exercise of this right, to a greater or lesser degree dependent upon the support given to them by lay people, priests, and bishops. For example, the faithful can participate in diocesan pastoral councils (cc. 511–514) and parish councils (c. 536), presbyteral councils (cc. 495–501), and diocesan synods (cc. 460–468); diocesan bishops and pastors may develop other options for the exercise of this right.

In paragraph 30, the document recognizes the possibility that a theologian's objections to a specific teaching of the magisterium "could contribute to real progress and provide a stimulus to the Magisterium to propose the teaching of the Church in greater depth and with a clearer presentation of the arguments" (18–19). Spiritual Assistance Canon 213 — The Christian faithful have the right to receive assistance from the sacred pastors out of the spiritual goods of the Church, especially the word of God and the sacraments.

This right flows from the very origin of communio itself, in the self-communication of God directed to the individual and involving the person's free, personal response to this communication. The Eastern code expresses the same right in canon 16. The response to God cannot remain purely internal or individual; it finds external expression within a particular community of faith, primarily through the reception of baptism. The Church's mission continues the salvific presence of Christ in the world and involves a cooperation with the grace of God for the salvation of men and women. As one consequence of God's self-communication, the Church, in order to fulfill its mission, must provide assistance to the faithful from its spiritual goods, especially the word of God and the sacraments. This assistance aims at encouraging the personal transformation of the individual and his or her personal relationship with God as well as facilitating that person's own role in the transformation of the world and in the community's fulfillment of its divinely given mission.

This right to spiritual nurture in word and sacrament finds a corresponding obligation on the part of sacred pastors to fulfill their ministerial duties in and to the Church community: both diocesan bishops and pastors are to foster the vocations of all the Christian faithful entrusted to them and to rely on their assistance in the Church's mission.[104]

Book IV deals with "The Sanctifying Function of the Church." Canon 834 establishes a basic principle for understanding "spiritual assistance" by describing the "sacred liturgy" through which the Church fulfills the priestly function (munus) of Jesus Christ. According to canon 839, the function of sanctifying includes the sacraments, prayer, works of penance and charity, and pious exercises in addition to liturgy and public worship.[105] The sacraments "contribute in the greatest way to establish, strengthen, and manifest ecclesiastical communion" (c. 840); therefore, sacred pastors are obliged to provide adequate preparation for their reception (c. 843, §2) and not to deny the sacraments "to those who seek them at appropriate times, are properly disposed, and are not prohibited by law from receiving them" (c. 843, §1). Although canon 213 applies primarily to the Christian faithful in full communion with the Catholic Church (c. 205), canon 844, §§3–4 extends the reception of the three sacraments of penance, Eucharist, and anointing of the sick to members of the Eastern churches and other Christians who do not have full communion with the Catholic Church under certain restrictions, more stringent for those persons falling into the latter category.

In Book III, "The Teaching Function of the Church," canons 756–780 deal with "The Ministry of the Divine Word." Canon 756, §1 establishes the basic principle that the proclamation of the gospel "has been entrusted principally to the Roman Pontiff and the college of bishops." Canon 756, §2 further specifies this responsibility within the diocese: "An individual bishop . . . is the moderator of the entire ministry of the word." Canons 757–759 explicate the role of presbyters as "co-workers of the bishops" (c. 757); of deacons "in communion with the bishop and his presbyterate" (c. 757); of members of institutes of consecrated life, who give "witness to the gospel in a special way" (c. 758); and of laity who "cooperate with the bishop and presbyters in the exercise of the ministry of the word" (c. 759). Canons 762–772 regulate preaching, among the forms of which the homily is preeminent (c. 767, §1); bishops enjoy the right (ius) to preach everywhere; presbyters and deacons possess the faculty (facultas) to do so (c. 764), and laity "can be permitted to preach in a church or oratory" if necessary or advantageous according to the norms of the conferences of bishops (c. 766).

Given both the responsibility of sacred pastors to provide for the spiritual needs of the faithful as well as the dearth of clergy in some particular churches, sacred pastors may utilize a number of options for providing spiritual care to the Christian faithful. For example, parishes may be entrusted to a deacon or lay person or group of persons under the supervision of a priest (c. 517, §2). In this particular situation, those chosen can, among other responsibilities, administer communion to the sick and dying; be designated to preach and expose the Holy Eucharist; and lead specific rites for the deceased.[106] Further, laity and members of institutes of consecrated life can exercise a catechetical role (c. 776); lay people may receive general delegation to act as official witnesses at marriages (c. 1112); pastors may utilize married couples to ensure adequate preparation for the sacrament of marriage (c. 1063).

Worship and Spirituality

Canon 214 — The Christian faithful have the right to worship God according to the prescripts of their own rite approved by the legitimate pastors of the Church and to follow their own form of spiritual life so long as it is consonant with the doctrine of the Church.

This canon expresses two rights of the faithful: the right to worship according to a particular rite and the right to follow a particular spirituality. Inasmuch as both these rights are exercised within the Catholic Church, the canon requires approval of a specific rite by "the legitimate pastors of the Church" and the judgment that a particular form of spirituality concurs with Church teaching. The Eastern code expresses these rights in canon 17.

In the Latin church, the word "rite" is used in a variety of contexts: the celebration of a sacrament (for example, the Rite of Marriage) or of a sacramental (for example, the rite of blessing for the site of a new church building) or, more broadly, the way in which liturgy is celebrated (for example, the Roman, Tridentine, or Ambrosian rite). According to canon 28, §1 of the Eastern code, "rite" in the broad sense encompasses "the liturgical, theological, spiritual and disciplinary patrimony, culture and circumstances of history of a distinct people." This patrimony and culture are manifested in a particular church sui iuris, "a group of Christian faithful united by a hierarchy according to the norm of law which the supreme authority of the Church expressly or tacitly recognizes as sui iuris" (CCEO 27). In the latter sense, the Latin church is a church sui iuris, one of twenty-two such churches comprising the Catholic Church.[107]

These churches sui iuris which comprise the one Catholic Church reflect the principle intrinsic to communio that unity does not require uniformity; legitimate diversity should exist within the one Church. As one consequence, the faithful may fulfill certain spiritual obligations in any church sui iuris in communion with the Catholic Church. For example, canon 1248, §1 refers to satisfying one's Mass obligation in any Catholic rite; canon 991 expresses the faithful's right to free choice of a confessor, even one of another rite; and canon 923 allows the reception of the Eucharist in any Catholic rite. These options reflect the unity of the Church while simultaneously encouraging and protecting the diversity manifested through the different churches sui iuris. Canon 383, §2 requires the diocesan bishop to provide for the spiritual needs of the faithful belonging to a different rite within his diocese, and canon 846, §2 requires ministers to celebrate the sacraments "according to [their] own rite."

Further, although the faithful may receive baptism in any Catholic church, such reception does not necessarily include enrollment in that particular church sui iuris.[108] Enrollment in a particular church sui iuris affects the reception of certain sacraments in the Latin church. For example, canon 1109 requires for the validity of marriage that at least one of the parties and the assisting minister belong to the Latin rite. If eparchies[109] of another church sui iuris have been established for a specific territory, then a Latin bishop cannot grant dispensations from matrimonial impediments to persons legitimately enrolled in that church.[110] Canon 1015, §2 requires an apostolic indult for a Latin rite bishop to ordain lawfully a member of an Eastern rite (see also c. 1021). Finally, the right to worship according to the prescriptions of an approved rite carries the concomitant obligation on the part of ministers to follow faithfully the approved liturgical books.[111]

The second right stated in canon 214, to follow a form of spiritual life consonant with Church teaching, also allows for legitimate diversity and flexibility within the unity of the Catholic Church. This right flows from the personal relationship between God and an individual, the basis of Church communio. Various forms of spirituality can contribute to the Church's growth and sanctification as well as to the holiness of the faithful.[112] The qualification "consonant with the doctrine of the Church" is reiterated in canon 839 which obliges local ordinaries to see that "prayers and pious and sacred exercises of the Christian people are fully in keeping with the norms of the Church." Even if certain spiritual practices are congruent with church teaching, tensions may nonetheless arise between an individual's desires and the needs of the community. Compromise is often necessary to foster communion within a particular community; for example, if a group of the faithful wish to pray the rosary together publicly in the church building, the pastor may suggest specific times which do not conflict, for example, with celebrations of the Eucharist.

Association and Assembly

Canon 215 — The Christian faithful are at liberty freely to found and direct associations for purposes of charity or piety or for the promotion of the Christian vocation in the world and to hold meetings for the common pursuit of these purposes.

This canon states two fundamental rights of the faithful: to form associations and to hold meetings.[113] The right to associate finds specific canonical elaboration in canons 298–329 on "Associations of the Christian Faithful." The latter canons reiterate the right articulated here but more clearly situate it within the context of the supervisory role of competent ecclesiastical authority and the varying degrees of recognition, support, or encouragement given to a particular association by the Church. The Eastern code expresses the same fundamental rights in canon 18.

Canon 215 offers examples of the purposes intended by these meetings or associations: charity, piety, or the promotion of the Christian vocation in the world. Canon 298 expands these examples by including the promotion of a more perfect life, public worship, or Christian teaching, as well as "other works of the apostolate." These broadly apostolic purposes, therefore, demonstrate that the right to meet and to form associations is both a natural right arising from the social nature of the person (AA 18) as well as a right derived from baptism, which situates the person within the community of faith and obliges the person to be involved in the Church's mission (c. 205). The right to associate, therefore, is exercised within the specific community of faith and must serve to build up and unify that community; this is one particular application of the obligation to maintain communion (c. 209). "Associations are not an end in themselves but serve the mission of the Church throughout the world."[114]

Associations contribute to the Church's life and to the fulfillment of its mission. Certain canons encourage the creation of associations. For example, canon 604, §2 suggests that consecrated virgins may form an association "to observe their own resolution more faithfully and to perform by mutual assistance service to the Church." Canon 708 encourages major superiors to associate so that "by common efforts they work to achieve more fully the purpose of the individual institutes." Canon 725 allows a secular institute to "associate to itself... other members of the Christian faithful."[115] Canon 278, §1 asserts the right of secular clerics to associate in order to pursue "purposes in keeping with the clerical state."

Inasmuch as the exercise of the right occurs within the Church as communio, church authority has a legitimate role in guiding its use. Canon 305 expresses the general principle that all associations are subject to vigilance by competent church authority. This authority may have more or less involvement, depending on the type of association and its statutes. Canon 300 requires consent by competent authority for an association to use the name "Catholic." Other canons express limitations on the right of association for particular persons; for example, canon 278, §3 forbids clerics [113] Among the conciliar sources for this canon, see AA 18–20, which discuss associations in general as well as the role of laity in founding and directing associations; PO 8 refers to associations of priests; and GS 68, associations of workers.

[114] AA 19.

[115] See also cc. 677, §2 and 303.

from establishing or participating in associations if the latter's ends or activities are incompatible with clerical obligations and duties. Canon 287, §2 forbids clerics from having "an active part in political parties and in governing labor unions" unless necessary to protect the common good or the rights of the Church, in the judgment of competent ecclesiastical authority. This prohibition applies to members of institutes of consecrated life in virtue of canon 672; canon 288 exempts permanent deacons from this prohibition unless otherwise determined by particular law. Canon 1374 requires a just penalty to be imposed on a person who "joins an association which plots against the Church."

Canon 215 also states the right of the faithful "to hold meetings for the common pursuit of these purposes." This right flows from the social nature of the person whose growth and development require such interaction.[116] As with the right to form and direct associations, the exercise of the right to hold meetings occurs within the Church as communio and must serve to build up the Church and to assist in fulfilling its mission. The canon does not specifically include the right to use parochial or diocesan property to hold meetings; in the absence of an official policy, a careful and prudent judgment will be required in each case.

Apostolic Activity

Canon 216 — Since they participate in the mission of the Church, all the Christian faithful have the right to promote or sustain apostolic action even by their own undertakings, according to their own state and condition. Nevertheless, no undertaking is to claim the name Catholic without the consent of competent ecclesiastical authority.

This canon expresses the right of the Christian faithful to exercise the apostolate, a right expressed in the Eastern code in canon 19. This right arises from baptism and the consequent participation of the faithful in the threefold functions (munera) of Jesus Christ priest, prophet, and ruler (c. 205). Canon 211 states that the faithful "have the duty and right" to proclaim the gospel; canon 216 further specifies this duty and right by stating explicitly the right to "promote or sustain apostolic action even by their own undertakings." Apostolicam actuositatem 6 summarizes the apostolate of the Church and of all its members as "primarily directed to making the message of Christ clear to the world by word and deed and to sharing his grace." Apostolicam actuositatem 6–8 further describes the apostolate: it begins with the witness of Christian life from which flows the proclamation of the gospel, the transformation of the temporal sphere, and works of charity.

The apostolate begins with a personal relationship with God which finds visible expression within the community of faith. The faithful must foster their own holiness and that of the Church (c. 210) and this obligation finds energy in the right to participate in the spiritual goods of the Church (c. 213). From this basis, the faithful have the right to proclaim the gospel (c. 211) and they fulfill this right in numerous ways. Canon 761 describes various means used to proclaim Christian doctrine, including preaching and catechesis as well as the press and the instruments of social communication. Lay members of the faithful proclaim the gospel "by word and . . . example" and can "cooperate with the bishop and presbyters in the exercise of the ministry of the word" (c. 759). Canon 225, §2 obliges the laity "to imbue and perfect the order of temporal affairs with the spirit of the gospel." All the faithful are obliged to promote social justice and to assist the poor (c. 222, §2). In his diocese, the bishop is obliged to encourage the faithful in their exercise of the apostolate (c. 394). The pastor requires the aid of the faithful to bring the gospel message to those who do not practice their religion or do not profess the true faith (c. 528, §1); further, the pastor must "recognize and promote" the participation of the lay faithful in the Church's mission (529, §2). The faithful exercise the apostolate by fostering, promoting, and joining associations, both on the national and international levels (cc. 216; 298–329).[117]

Each individual possesses a general vocation—to proclaim the gospel—and a more specific vocation within the community of faith: as a married or single person, cleric, religious, or lay person. These particular vocations help determine the differing modalities in which each individual exercises his or her general vocation. A member of an institute of consecrated life, for example, must remain faithful to the mission and works proper to that institute (c. 677, §1). Canon 774, §2 states the primary responsibility of parents to educate their children in the Christian faith and its practice. Canon 276 obliges clerics "to pursue holiness . . . [as] dispensers of the mysteries of God in the service of His people"; further, "clerics all work for the same purpose, namely, the building up of the Body of Christ" (c. 275, §1). Canon 835 expresses the participation of all the faithful in the sanctifying function (munus) of Jesus Christ.

Two of the sources for this canon, Apostolicam actuositatem 24 and 25, are found in chapter 5, "Preserving Due Order." This chapter recognizes the need for coordination among all forms of the apostolate, to allow "full scope for the special character of each [apostolate]," to promote the spirit of unity and the charity of fellowship, to pursue common ends and avoid harmful competition.[118] Although the right to promote or sustain apostolic action derives primarily from baptism and not from a mandate of ecclesiastical authority (cc. 204 and 759), the exercise of the right occurs within the context of the Church as a communio in which all the faithful exercise their vocation for the good of the Church and its mission.

The canon contains three qualifications of the exercise of the apostolate: the right is exercised by the faithful "according to their own state and condition"[119] and "competent ecclesiastical authority" must consent to the use of the name "Catholic" for a specific work. The use of the name "Catholic" could (at least) suggest that a specific effort represents the Church itself or is officially accepted by the Church. The authority competent to consent to the use of the name "Catholic" would depend on particular circumstances. For example, canons 300 and 312 explain that the authority competent to erect a public association is also competent to allow that association to use the word "Catholic." This competency pertains to the Holy See for international associations; to the conference of bishops for national associations; and to the diocesan bishop for diocesan associations. The same authorities are also competent to allow schools and universities to use the name "Catholic" (cc. 803 and 808).

Two other canons provide a context for the exercise of the apostolate: canon 209 (the duty to maintain communion) and canon 223 (the fostering of the common good). These qualifications of the exercise of the right testify to the diversity present in the Church, in which there is fundamental equality in dignity and in action (c. 208) but also different vocations, roles, and charisms.[120]

Christian Education

Canon 217 — Since they are called by baptism to lead a life in keeping with the teaching of the gospel, the Christian faithful have the right to a Christian education by which they are to be instructed properly to strive for the maturity of the human person and at the same time to know and live the mystery of salvation.

The conciliar declaration Gravissimum educationis succinctly states the "inalienable right to an education" for "all people of whatever race, condition, and age"; this right arises from their human dignity.[121] Canon 217 concerns the fulfillment of this natural right within the Christian community, namely, the right to a Christian education which is also expressed in the Eastern code in canon 20. This specific right is directed toward two interrelated goals: the human maturity of the person and a deepening of the person's relationship with God; the latter is the foundation of communio.[122] The individual's cooperation with God's salvific will is expressed through participation in the triple functions (munera) of Jesus Christ as priest, prophet, and ruler (c. 205) and in the exercise of the Church's apostolate (c. 216). To achieve these goals, the faithful need an appropriate education.

By using the adjective "Christian" to describe this right, canon 217 broadens its scope to include all the baptized, whether or not they live in full communion with the Catholic Church.[123] The reception of baptism and entrance into a particular ecclesial community or church reflects a continuing maturation process both as a human being and as a person in relationship with God and with a community of faith; all the baptized possess the right to an education that fosters their maturity both as human beings and as children of God. Further, this understanding of Christian education presupposes the conciliar teaching that while "elements of sanctification and of truth" are found outside the Catholic Church, these elements impel towards catholic unity.[124]

In various canons, and especially in Book III, the code refers to a particular specification of this right: the right to a Catholic education. For example, canon 226, §2 states that parents "have a most grave obligation and possess the right to educate" their children "according to the doctrine handed on by the Church." The seriousness of this obligation is reinforced in canon 1366 which requires a censure "or other just penalty" for parents or those who take the place of parents if they "hand over their children to be baptized or educated in a non-Catholic religion." In Book III, canon 794, §1 expresses the basic principle: the Church has a "duty and right" to educate the faithful, and paragraph two states that sacred pastors are obliged to arrange for Catholic education. More specifically, the arrangements for such education are spelled out in canons 773–780 which concern catechetical instruction; canons 793–821 on "Catholic Education"; and canons 807–814 on "Catholic Universities and Other Institutes of Higher Studies." Certain consequences can ensue for the faithful when they acquire a Catholic education. For example, greater weight can be given to their opinions on ecclesial issues offered to sacred pastors and to other Christian faithful (c. 212, §3). In certain cases, a specific educational background can qualify lay people to assume ecclesiastical offices or functions (c. 228, §1), to receive a mandate to teach sacred sciences (c. 229, §3), or to be appointed to teach specific disciplines in a seminary (c. 253, §1).

Freedom in Pursuit of Sacred Sciences

Canon 218 — Those engaged in the sacred disciplines have a just freedom of inquiry and of expressing their opinion prudently on those matters in which they possess expertise, while observing the submission due to the magisterium of the Church.

This canon specifies the particular application of rights expressed elsewhere in the code and in the Vatican II documents, especially the participation in the threefold functions (munera) of Jesus Christ priest, prophet, and ruler; the right to Christian education (c. 217); and the right to manifest opinions on issues affecting the good of the Church to sacred pastors and other Christian faithful (c. 212, §3). The Eastern code contains the same application of rights in canon 21. According to Dignitatis humanae, "all people are bound to seek for the truth, especially about God and his church," a right based on the dignity of the human person.[125] One significant application of these rights occurs in the context of interaction between those persons engaged in the sacred disciplines and the magisterium of the Church. The conciliar source for this canon, Gaudium et spes 62, indicates that the term "sacred disciplines" includes all those fields of study which foster a deeper appreciation of the faith and which enable men and women to proclaim the gospel message. Those engaged in these sacred disciplines enjoy a just freedom of inquiry and can prudently express opinions, both of which are necessary to the academic enterprise. The conciliar text also invites theologians "to look for a more appropriate way of communicating doctrine to the people of their time," an invitation based upon the distinction between the deposit of faith and the manner in which this deposit is expressed. Finally, Gaudium et spes expresses the desire that the laity will receive appropriate formation in the sacred disciplines in seminaries and universities (c. 229, §2).

The Eastern code recognizes that the contributions of disciplines other than theology, including literature and the arts (CCEO 603), assist the faithful in being "led to a more conscious and reflective life of faith" (CCEO 602). The Eastern code also explicitly articulates the role of theologians in canon 606. The first paragraph states, > Theologians with their deeper understanding of the mystery of salvation and with their expertise in the sacred and related sciences as well as in current problems, have the role and duty, faithfully complying with the authentic magisterium of the Church, and of equal importance, utilizing their freedom, to illumine the faith of the Church, to defend it and to contribute to doctrinal progress.

The purpose of such endeavors is to preserve and promote the faith and to manifest the catholicity of the Church through legitimate diversity (CCEO 604).

The context for the interaction of theologians and the magisterium is the Church as communio, which begins with a person's personal relationship with God and which finds visible expression through baptism into the community of faith (see cc. 204–205; 209). Persons dedicated to the sacred disciplines—as students, teachers, or in researching various topics of academic-pastoral concern—exercise their freedom of inquiry and expression in the church communio with the goal of bringing the faithful "to a more refined and more mature life of faith."[126] Gaudium et spes 62 also notes the contribution of the secular sciences to the process of deepening Christian formation. This freedom, however, is not without qualifications. While no one can be forced to accept the Catholic faith against his or her conscience (c. 748, §2), once baptized or received into the Church, the person cannot choose to accept or to reject specific articles of the faith. This reflects the bond of the profession of faith, one of the three bonds indicating that a person lives in full communion with the Church (c. 205).[127] The exercise of religious liberty, like the exercise of other rights, occurs within the context of the Catholic Church through which "the fullness of the means of salvation can be attained."[128]

[126] See NCCB, "Doctrinal Responsibilities: Approaches to Promoting Cooperation and Resolving Misunderstandings Between Bishops and Theologians," Origins 19 (June 19, 1989) 97, 99–110. The text emphasizes that the ecclesial context of communio "is critical for understanding the relationship between bishops and theologians, for encouraging cooperation and for constructing an adequate approach to prevent or to address disputes related to church teaching" (99). The text recognizes the responsibilities both of bishops and of theologians: bishops are "charged to preserve and protect the truth of faith, i.e., to transmit the authentic gospel of Christ" (101) while theologians "discharge their responsibility in fidelity to apostolic faith by meditative appropriation of the faith and by critical inquiry" (102). To fulfill this responsibility, theologians "must expect to exchange constructive criticism with other scholars, other Christians and other interested persons of good will" (102).

[127] A clarification is necessary: the bond of the profession of the faith must include accepting the hierarchy of truths within Christian doctrine; that is, not all teaching carries the same weight, depending upon the connection between a particular doctrine and the foundation of the Christian faith. Canons 750–754 recognize this hierarchy of truths by indicating the different responses to be given to various expressions of church teaching. See the discussion below on the third qualification in the canon; UR 11; and commentary on c. 205.

This foundational qualification—that the faithful cannot choose which articles of faith to accept or reject—finds expression in the duty to maintain communion (c. 209); scholarship occurs within the particular faith community and aims at increasing the community's appreciation of the faith, both as a whole and as individuals. This forms one aspect of the obligation to foster the common good of the Church (c. 223). Canon 218 further notes that this freedom of inquiry must be "just" (iusta; in CCEO 21 "lawful"); scholarship is not an end in and of itself but serves the community.[129] Further, opinions are to be expressed prudently, through appropriate journals, meetings of scholars, etc. The aim of such scholarly exchange is to engender discussion and clarification about a specific point, not to sway public opinion to one's side.

A second qualification of academic freedom requires that the individuals must possess expertise in the area under discussion. In other words, these persons have the obligation to secure the appropriate education necessary to investigate various academic-pastoral issues and to disseminate their opinions on such issues; their opinions will hold greater weight in relationship to their academic proficiency and ability to assess the evidence.

A third qualification of this right states that these individuals are to observe the "submission" [obsequium] due to the Church's magisterium. All the faithful participate in the teaching function of the Church (see c. 747); however, sacred pastors have a specific responsibility to ensure the probity of that which is taught. As noted in the commentary on canons 205 and 212, differing gradations of official teaching exist, evoking different responses from the faithful. The obligation to "believe with divine and Catholic faith" applies to the one deposit of faith entrusted to the Church (c. 750, §1). The following canons (752–754) apply to teachings not contained in the one deposit of faith and therefore elicit different responses: "a religious submission of the intellect and will" to a doctrine of the authentic magisterium concerning faith or morals declared by the pope or college of bishops (c. 752); adherence "with religious submission of mind to the authentic magisterium of their bishops" (c. 753); and observance of constitutions and decrees issued by the legitimate authority of the Church (c. 754).[130] Further, "no doctrine is understood as defined infallibly unless this is manifestly evident" (c. 749, §3). Appropriate Christian submission therefore requires a well-founded respect for and attempt to understand a particular teaching of the magisterium; all the Christian faithful, both those doing research and the Church's official teachers, should strive for "an ever deeper understanding of the Word of God found in the Scripture and handed on faithfully by the Church's living tradition under the guidance of the Magisterium."[131]

Nonetheless, disagreement with a particular teaching may be the appropriate response in a particular situation (see c. 212, §3) and, in fact, the theologian may have the duty to inform the [129] Hervada, in Pamplona ComEng, 194, states that the term iusta indicates that this freedom of inquiry is not absolute and is geared to avoiding excessive interpretations of such freedom. He elaborates upon this statement in reference to the submission (obsequium) owed to the magisterium: "In the case of the right with which we are concerned, this means that the scope of freedom is limited to the field of the debatable. There is no freedom of opinion regarding the doctrinal propositions duly established by the magisterium" (195). See also McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 123: "It is a 'just,' or lawful, freedom in that it must avoid unfounded or excessive pronouncements." In other words, scholarship aims at a deeper appropriation of the faith by the Christian faithful and should not lead to a disrespect for the magisterium of the Church.

magisterium of difficulties in a particular non-irreformable teaching, in the way it is presented, or in the argumentation utilized to support it.[132] The Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith recognizes this duty and also makes a clear distinction between this type of disagreement and "dissent" which it defines in a particular and limited manner as "general opposition to Church teaching which even comes to expression in organized groups."[133] Given this distinction, great caution must be used in applying canon 1371, 1° to particular situations in which an individual expresses such difficulties.[134] Furthermore, Gaudium et spes 62 recognizes that "a just freedom of enquiry, of thought and of humble and courageous expression" contributes to the proclamation of the gospel in the contemporary situation.

Choice of State in Life

Canon 219 — All the Christian faithful have the right to be free from any kind of coercion in choosing a state of life.

The conciliar sources for this canon proceed from the exceptional dignity of the human person and the essential equality of all people to the necessity of societies (both civil and ecclesiastical) to provide means and opportunities for people to exercise their "universal and inviolable" rights, including the right to follow their vocation.[135] The Eastern code expresses the same freedom in canon 22. As expressed in canon 219, the Church as communio forms the particular context for both understanding and exercising this right. Positively expressed, canon 219 states that the human per-

[132] Instruction, 18–19, #30. NCCB, "Doctrinal Responsibilities," includes procedures both for formal and informal dialogue between bishops and theologians when theological disagreements arise. These procedures are cited in NCCB, "'Ex corde Ecclesiae': An Application to the United States," Origins 26 (November 28, 1996) 381, 383–384, and adopted "as the appropriate procedure to assure a process acceptable to both bishop and faculty member" (383). Cardinal Laghi, in "Vatican Observations on U.S. Bishops' 'Ex corde Ecclesiae' Application Document," Origins 27 (June 12, 1997) 53–55, raises two difficulties with "Doctrinal Responsibilities": the text "does not address the situation of the teacher of theology at the moment of his appointment" and "does not seem to facilitate the exercise of the rights and duties of the local bishop when problems arise" (55).

[133] Instruction, 19, #32. In #33, the text describes different aspects of dissent, including "its most radical form" which "aims at changing the Church following a model of protest which takes its inspiration from political society." More often, dissent includes the assertion "that the theologian is not bound to adhere to any Magisterial teaching unless it is infallible." The distinction between "difficulties" and "dissent" in the CDF document demonstrates a basic terminological difficulty; see the discussion by L. Örsy in The Church, 90–93. Örsy states, "Thus, 'dissent' is too much of an ambivalent word, with too many existential connotations beyond a purely intellectual significance to be a useful term in theological debates, which by definition are supposed to move on a rational level" (91–92). Nonetheless, he concludes, "All these arguments notwithstanding, it appears that for the time being at least, not only must we live with an unsuitable word, but we have to assert the legitimate right of the faithful to scientific research and to a different opinion through the use of a confusing expression: 'the right to dissent'" (93).

[134] See also c. 18 which states that laws establishing a penalty or restricting the exercise of rights must be strictly interpreted. On August 29, 1997, the CDF issued "Regulations for Doctrinal Examination," with an accompanying "Explanatory Note," Origins 27 (September 11, 1997) 221–224. These regulations establish a procedure to be followed by the CDF in its examination of theological writings. Such examinations result from situations "when the influence of a publication exceeds the boundaries of an individual episcopal conference or when the danger to the faith is particularly grave" (art. 2). Experience is needed to determine the strengths and weaknesses in the procedure, particularly in reference to the possible declaration by the CDF that latae sententiae penalties have been incurred due to heresy, apostasy, or schism and the inability of recourse against such a declaration (art. 28). The "Explanatory Note" addresses this particular article, stating that it would be "pure and unjustified juridical formalism" to initiate a penal trial or to allow for recourse when the CDF has established "with certainty" that an author is a heretic, an apostate, or schismatic.

[135] See, for example, GS 26, 29, and 52.

son needs freedom in order to grow in a relationship with God and to respond to a divine vocation. Communio begins with the relationship between the individual and God, a free response to God's invitation to enter into the divine life and the visible expression of this response through baptism into the Church. Freedom from coercion in fundamental life choices is one key aspect of the fundamental dignity of the sons and daughters of God.[136]

Canon 219 does not express a right to exercise or to fulfill a specific vocation within the Church. Gaudium et spes 29 recognizes that not everyone "is identical in physical capacity and in mental and moral resources." In various places, the code balances the individual's perception of and response to an invitation from God with the pastoral needs and teachings of the community of faith. Canon 214, therefore, states the right of individuals to follow their own form of spiritual life provided it is consonant with church teaching. Canon 1026 requires "due freedom" for the reception of orders and canon 1036 requires from the ordinand a signed and handwritten declaration of his freedom and desire to serve in ecclesiastical ministry. Canon 1025, however, articulates the responsibility of one's proper bishop or competent superior to judge that the individual "is endowed... with the necessary qualities" for ecclesial ministry. Canon 1058 recognizes the basic right of individuals to enter into marriage provided they are not prohibited by law; the consent that brings marriage into existence must be free (c. 1057). A marriage is invalid "if entered into because of force or grave fear from without" (c. 1103). Canon 597 allows any Catholic to be admitted to an institute of consecrated life, provided he or she possesses the right intention and requisite qualities and is not prevented from doing so by an impediment (see also c. 641). Further, canon 643, §1, 4° invalidates admission to the novitiate if one entered the institute as a result of force, grave fear, or fraud. Parents have the obligation of providing for a Christian education of their children (c. 793, §1) and this includes ensuring their children's freedom in choosing a state in life.[137]

Reputation and Privacy

Canon 220 — No one is permitted to harm illegitimately the good reputation which a person possesses nor to injure the right of any person to protect his or her own privacy.

This canon expresses two rights which proceed from human nature, the right to enjoy a good reputation and the right of the person to protect his or her privacy. The Eastern code expresses the same rights in canon 23. According to Gaudium et spes 26, the rights "to one's good name" and "to the protection of one's private life" derive from the "exceptional dignity which belongs to the human person."

The canon protects one's reputation from illegitimate harm. In other words, individuals exercise their rights, including the right to a good reputation, within the Church as communio (c. 209). To protect both the common good (see c. 223) and the Church itself, individuals may act, even though they might thereby damage someone's reputation. The motivating force of such an action should be a desire to protect another value, for example, the good reputation of the Church or of other individuals and not to ruin one person's reputation; all pertinent circumstances must be taken into account before acting. For example, the code presents various options to safeguard reputations and to ensure that penalties are inflicted only as a last resort. In reference to the preliminary investigation process concerning delicts, canon 1717, §2 requires "care" to ensure protection of a person's good name. Canon 1341 suggests diverse "means of pastoral solicitude" be utilized by an ordinary before beginning a judicial or administrative process which is always a last resort measure in dealing with a problematic situation. Other canons strive to protect a person's reputation. For example, canon 1335 does not require an individual to reveal the presence of a latae sententiae censure when one of the faithful requests a sacrament, sacramental, or act of governance. Canon 1352, §2 provides certain conditions under which an undeclared latae sententiae penalty is suspended to preclude "grave scandal or infamy." Canon 1455, §3 gives judges in specific cases the freedom to bind participants to observe secrecy if the danger of damaging the reputation of others is present.

The right to a good reputation is at risk as the Church confronts the issue of sexual misconduct by clerics. The media often accuse ecclesiastical authorities of proceeding too slowly when accusations of sexual abuse, particularly of minors, arise. Church authorities have a responsibility to move expeditiously yet must exercise great caution to protect both the accuser and the cleric involved. At times, a cleric is judged guilty simply due to an accusation; his reputation is damaged and he may experience difficulties in exercising his ministry, even if the accusation is later withdrawn or proven false.[138]

The code contains few explicit references to privacy; indirectly, such a concern for privacy is exemplified in the freedom of seminarians to choose any confessor (c. 240, §1) and the prohibition against securing the opinion of a spiritual director or confessor concerning admission to or dismissal from the seminary.[139] The same freedom of access to a confessor is recognized for members of religious institutes in canon 630, §1 without "prejudice, however, to the discipline of the institute." The latter phrase allows an institute to establish its own norms provided these do not violate an individual's freedom in receiving the sacrament of penance. Canon 630, §5 specifically forbids a superior from inducing a subject to make a manifestation of conscience.

Questions concerning a proper respect for privacy and reputation can arise during the process of admitting individuals to seminaries and to institutes of consecrated life, most often in reference to psychological and medical testing. Canon 642 allows experts to be consulted concerning a person's suitability for admission to a religious institute but also recognizes the right to privacy and to good reputation by explicitly citing canon 220 in this context. In reference to seminaries, The Program of Priestly Formation, paragraph 521, requires throughout the admission process that "the candidate's rights to privacy should be respected and the careful management of confidential materials observed." Officials must carefully balance the right of the institute or seminary to certain information in order to develop an educated judgment as to whether or not they should admit a specific individual and that individual's rights to privacy. Although the individual, by his or her application, agrees to provide certain confidential information, the individual does not thereby forfeit entirely the right to privacy.[140] Finally, seminary and diocesan officials, as well as superiors in institutes of consecrated life, must provide adequate protection of materials placed in the archives, including personnel files, in order to protect the privacy and good reputation of individuals.[141]

Protection of Rights

Canon 221 — §1. The Christian faithful can legitimately vindicate and defend the rights which they possess in the Church in the competent ecclesiastical forum according to the norm of law.

[138] See J. Provost, "Some Canonical Considerations Relative to Clerical Sexual Abuse," J 52 (1992), 615–641. Provost cautions: "Abuse, which can seriously scar the victim for life, does not need to become the source for public voyeurism. When Church officials are approached with reports of abuse by a cleric, they must be very circumspect in order to respect the rights to which all parties are entitled in this situation" (628).

[141] On the diocesan level, see cc. 486–491 on archives, including secret archives (c. 489).

§2. If they are summoned to a trial by a competent authority, the Christian faithful also have the right to be judged according to the prescripts of the law applied with equity.

§3. The Christian faithful have the right not to be punished with canonical penalties except according to the norm of law.

This canon expresses three principles necessary to ensure that rights are not only recognized but also vindicated with the purpose of guaranteeing that rights do not become meaningless. They apply equally to the Church and to civil society. The Eastern code expresses the same principles in canon 24. The three principles are the right to vindicate and defend rights in a competent church forum (§1); the right of due process according to the prescripts of the law "applied with equity" (§2); and the right (rephrased in positive terms) that sanctions be imposed according to law (§3).

The context for the exercise of these principles is the Church as communio, in which all of the faithful enjoy a fundamental equality in dignity and action (c. 208). The source of rights and the basis for their protection is the dignity of the human person as a child of God and a sharer in the divine nature;[142] the Church is empowered by the gospel "to proclaim the rights of humanity" and must promote these rights everywhere.[143] The 1971 synod of bishops acknowledged that for the Church to speak about justice, it must first be just.[144] In 1972, the NCCB approved a resolution stating in part, "The promotion of adequate protection of human rights and freedoms within the Church is central to the bishops' role of service to the people of God."[145] Protecting the rights of the faithful as expressed here in title I, elsewhere in the code, or in any other law is therefore of fundamental importance for the Church to fulfill its mission in the world.

Vindicate and Defend Rights

Expressing a fundamental principle, the code urges all the Christian faithful "to strive diligently to avoid litigation."[146] Canon 1733, §1, in the section on "Recourse Against Administrative Decrees," urges an "equitable solution" between a person who feels injured by an administrative decree and the author of that decree in order to avoid contention; furthermore, paragraph two of that canon allows the conference of bishops or individual bishops for their own dioceses (if the conference has not done so) to establish norms on procedures, a council or office, as well as means for mediation.

Despite this exhortation to avoid litigation, some attempts at amicable resolution of disputes or at mediation processes fail; the faithful therefore have the right to recourse to the competent ecclesiastical court (§1). Book VII on processes establishes a complex series of norms governing the Church's tribunal system. Canon 1400, §1, 1° defines one object of a trial as "the pursuit or vindication of the rights of physical or juridic persons." In practice, however, the Church's tribunal system primarily deals with cases involving declarations of marriage nullity (see cc. 1060 and 1085, §2). Tribunal personnel often have neither access to jurisprudence concerning the vindication of rights nor the expertise to deal with these issues. Limitations in time, personnel, and resources and the volume of marriage nullity claims lead ordinary tribunals to focus solely on the adjudication of such cases.

The introduction to Due Process in Dioceses states as its objective "to aid members of the Society in exploring additional steps toward effective procedures for the protection of rights of persons in the Church" (1).

[146] See c. 1446, §1, in reference to tribunals.

Further, canon 1400, §2 requires that controversies arising "from an act of administrative power can be brought only before the superior or an administrative tribunal"; thus, these disputes cannot be brought to the ordinary judicial forum. If, however, administrative tribunals are established for a particular diocese, these tribunals would function judicially while reviewing administrative discretion.

The majority of cases in which people perceive a violation of their rights arises from administrative acts of church authority.[147] According to canon 35, such actions would include decrees, precepts, and rescripts; canon 59, §1 adds privileges, dispensations, or other favors under the term "rescript." If these acts violate the rights of an individual, the latter must proceed administratively through hierarchical recourse and not through the Church's ordinary tribunal system. All of these acts of church authority require executive power of governance (c. 35); however, challenges to acts which do not involve this power of governance might form the basis for adjudication by an ordinary tribunal. For example, many actions taken by various lay officials within the diocesan curia as well as the pastor within his parish would not involve executive power and an individual who felt aggrieved by a specific action could theoretically initiate a case involving an alleged violation of rights in the ordinary tribunal.

Canons 1732–1739 provide the procedure for taking recourse against administrative decrees. The first step is conciliation (1733, §1). If this fails, then the canons outline a specific procedure for individuals to follow, including a request for revocation or emendation of the decree (c. 1734, §1) and recourse to a superior. The superior would be the bishop, if his subordinate issued the decree; or a pertinent dicastery of the Apostolic See if the bishop were involved.[148] The possibility also exists of recourse to the second section of the Apostolic Signatura against a decision by one of the Roman dicasteries; according to c. 1445, §2, the Signatura "deals with conflicts which have arisen from an act of ecclesiastical administrative power."[149]

Other processes for dealing with the perceived or actual violation of rights are currently being developed, actively encouraged by the Canon Law Society of America. Due Process in Dioceses made a significant contribution to this process by surveying United States dioceses to determine the existence and experience of due process. Two tables outline both allowable and non-allowable cases; most frequently, cases concern employment issues, followed by school and "pastoral issues."[150]

Canons 1400, §2 and 149, §2 refer to administrative tribunals; the Protection of Rights offers models for a proposed diocesan administrative tribunal and regional administrative tribunal. The diocesan administrative tribunal can receive petitions from "any person or group of persons in conflict with a parochial or diocesan administrator or administrative body, other than the diocesan bishop."[151] Two dioceses in the United States—the Archdiocese of Milwaukee and the Archdiocese of Minneapolis-St. Paul—have established administrative tribunals on an interim basis. A regional administrative tribunal has not yet been established. Further analysis and reflection will determine the effectiveness of such tribunals and whether or not other dioceses should be encouraged to establish them.[152]

Due Process Applied with Equity

The second paragraph articulates the right of the faithful to be judged according to the law applied with equity. This right applies both to judicial and to administrative processes and would include specific rights such as the right to a good reputation and the right to protect one's privacy (c. 220). An individual pursuing recourse has the right to canonical advice (c. 1738); time limitations for various procedural steps such as those listed in canon 1734 aim at ensuring a more expeditious response to such a petition. The judicial procedures delineated in Book VII include a number of canons which aim at the protection of the rights of all parties involved. For example, according to canon 1620, 7°, a sentence is vitiated by irremediable nullity if the right of defense is denied; canon 1481 states the right to canonical advice; canon 1598, §1, the right to view the acts of the case (also under pain of nullity); and canon 1628, the right to appeal a sentence.[153]

Canonical equity aims at ensuring that rights are protected or injustices corrected in situations where a strict application of the law might harm these rights or where the law is incapable of correcting an injustice.[154] Equity ensures that the Church's mission of salvation remains paramount (see c. 1752), reflecting the Church as communio in which all the faithful, as sons and daughters of God, strive to promote the holiness of the Church itself and of individuals (see c. 210).[155]

Proper Procedure for Penalties

According to canon 1400, §1 a trial has two objects: to vindicate the rights of persons (physical or juridic; 1°) and to impose or declare penalties (2°). Canon 1311 asserts the Church's "innate and proper right to coerce offending members" by sanctions although canon 1341 urges the ordinary to utilize other means of achieving the goals of the penal system, including fraternal correction and rebuke, before beginning a judicial or administrative penal procedure. Further, canon 1321 requires that no one be punished "unless the external violation of a law or precept, committed by the person, is gravely imputable by reason of malice or negligence." An accusation does not necessarily mean the individual is guilty nor that a penalty must be imposed (see c. 1341).

Book VI, "Sanctions in the Church," begins with a general description of offenses and penalties. Penalties are presented as a final option to preserve good order in the church (cc. 1317 and 1341). Canon 1314 expresses a preference for imposed (ferendae sententiae) rather than automatic (latae sententiae) penalties, thus ensuring the implementation of proper procedure, the protection of individual rights, and the investigation of other, non-penal options in the application of penalties. The Eastern code progresses further by omitting automatic (latae sententiae) penalties (CCEO 1402). Canons 1321–1330 analyze the subjective elements necessary for a person to be punished;

[152] The CLSA Committee on Experiment in Due Process is currently engaged in gathering data to assess the effectiveness of various procedures being utilized in various U.S. dioceses.

[153] For further analysis, see the commentary on Book VII.

[154] Canon 19 addresses such issues in the context of a lacuna in the law; canon 85 provides rules for a dispensation, that is, a "relaxation of a merely ecclesiastical law in a particular case."

[155] For further analysis of canonical equity, see J. Coughlin, "Canonical Equity," Stud Can 30 (1996) 403–435. Coughlin concludes that canonical equity "safeguards the natural justice recognized through human reason. It abets the effort of ecclesiastical law always to be open to the possibility of supernatural evangelical love, compassion and mercy. It manifests the hope of the Church for the future by helping to ground the juridical structure of the present in the Tradition" (433).

canons 1322–1324 present factors which remove or diminish imputability and canon 1326 those factors which increase imputability. Canons 1331–1340 state what penalties and other punishments are possible and canons 1341–1353 govern the application of penalties.

To protect the rights of the accused person, canon 1342 indicates a preference for judicial procedure for the application of penalties, especially those with serious consequences. Further protection of the rights of individuals is presented in canons 1717–1731 which govern the penal process. These canons consistently emphasize the protection of an individual's rights. For example, the ordinary must take care to ensure a person's good name is protected (c. 1717, §2); in an administrative process, the accused has the right to information about the accusation and proofs (c. 1720) and the right to an advocate (cc. 1481 and 1723). Further, canon 1728, §1 requires the application of the canons concerned with trials in general to specifically penal trials; canon 1728, §2 states that the accused "is not bound to confess the delict nor can an oath be administered to the accused." The canons on trials include a variety of means to protect the interests of both individuals and the Church community.[156]

While the code recognizes the need for sanctions, it also recognizes that sanctions should be applied only as a last resort, in order to protect the Church and its mission in the world (see c. 1341).

Support of the Church

Canon 222 — §1. The Christian faithful are obliged to assist with the needs of the Church so that the Church has what is necessary for divine worship, for the works of the apostolate and of charity, and for the decent support of ministers.

The first paragraph expresses the duty incumbent upon the Christian faithful "to assist with the needs of the Church," more specifically, to ensure the Church can continue its divine mission through divine worship, the apostolate, charitable works, and the "decent support" of the Church's ministers. The Eastern code expresses the same duty in canon 25, §1. Canon 1254, §1 states that the Church "by innate right is able to acquire, retain, administer, and alienate temporal goods" for the aforementioned purposes which are explicated in canon 1254, §2.

The conciliar sources for this canon emphasize the necessity of Christians to lead profound Christian lives and to foster the holiness of themselves and of the whole Church (c. 210).[157] This reflects the foundational relationship of communio between an individual and God resulting in the duty to maintain communion with the Church (c. 209). According to this basis, the faithful, including laity, religious, and the hierarchy, are actively to support the Church's mission through their time and personal talents as well as through financial support. Apostolicam actuositatem 21 specifically calls for the promotion and support of associations among all the faithful "in the ways each finds appropriate." The text also encourages the faithful to hold in high regard international Catholic associations and groups (see c. 298). Through these associations and other means, the Christian faithful actively participate in the Church's mission in the world (c. 211).[158]

Canon 1259 expresses the right of the Church to acquire temporal goods "by every just means," and canon 1260 articulates the Church's right to require the faithful to give financial support. Canon 1261, §2 obliges the bishop to remind the faithful of this obligation and to urge its observance. Canons 1260–1261 manifest a preference for free will offerings and legitimate appeals as sources of income; as one example, canon 1266 allows the local ordinary to require a special collection for "specific parochial, diocesan, national, or universal projects." After appropriate consultation, the diocesan bishop can impose a "moderate tax" for diocesan needs on public juridic persons under his authority; he may also impose an "extraordinary and moderate exaction" on both physical and juridic persons (c. 1263). The faithful also participate in the good administration of finances through their involvement in diocesan (cc. 492–493) and parish finance councils (c. 537), following norms established in Book V, "The Temporal Goods of the Church," and by particular legislation.

[156] See, for example, J. Beal, "To Be or Not To Be: That Is the Question. The Rights of the Accused in the Canonical Penal Process," CLSAP 53 (1991) 77–97.

[157] See AA 21; PO 20–21; and especially AG 36.

[158] These themes are echoed in the pastoral letter of the United States bishops, "Stewardship: A Disciple's Response" in Origins 22 (December 17, 1992) 457, 459–471. The letter "recognizes the importance of church support, including the sharing of time, talent and treasure" and situates this support "in its broader context —what it means to be a disciple" (Introduction).

All the faithful are obliged to support the Church to the best of their ability. For example, canon 282, §2 urges clerics to use any extra income to provide for the good of the Church and for charitable purposes. Institutes of consecrated life give "collective witness of charity and poverty" and are to contribute from any surpluses for church works and for the poor (c. 640). Individual members of religious institutes, under certain conditions, can make disposition for the use of, and revenue from, their goods before first profession (c. 668, §1). At the same time, the code recognizes other financial demands placed upon the faithful. For example, married people need to provide for their own needs and those of their families (c. 231, §2).

Canon 222, §1 refers to the "decent support of ministers" which includes persons involved in a wide variety of church services. Clerics dedicated to ministry (including deacons, married or not) deserve remuneration consistent with their responsibilities and conditions of time and place (c. 281). Laity have a right "to decent remuneration appropriate to their condition so that they are able to provide decently for their own needs and those of their family" as well as provision for health, pension, and social security benefits (c. 231, §2). The liturgical ministries of lector and acolyte do not, however, confer on the recipient a right to support or remuneration (c. 230, §1). Canon 1286 expresses the responsibility of administrators of goods to pay employees a just and decent wage, and canon 1290 requires them to follow civil law on contracts and payments.[159]

Social Justice and Charity

§2. They are also obliged to promote social justice and, mindful of the precept of the Lord, to assist the poor from their own resources.

This paragraph obliges the faithful to promote social justice and to provide for the poor from their own resources. The Eastern code expresses the same obligation in canon 25, §2. Apostolicam actuositatem 8 states that the obligation to promote social justice takes precedence over charity: "The demands of justice should be satisfied at the outset, so as to avoid giving in charitable gifts what is due in the name of justice." Individuals must first work at the eradication of the causes of evil and of social injustice so that works of charity truly reflect the Lord's command to love God and one's neighbor. Jesus Christ has gathered all men and women into "a certain supernatural solidarity"; as one consequence, all people, especially those who enjoy prosperity, must support works of charity and works of social assistance. According to Gaudium et spes 26, the social order must favor the good of individuals to allow them to lead "a truly human life." Thus, the dignity of the human person demands social justice; this natural right receives impetus from the teaching of Jesus Christ and the rebirth of men and women as children of God, reflecting the Church as communio.[160]

[159] See NCCB, "Economic Justice for All: Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy," Origins 16 (November 27, 1986) which includes the statement: "We bishops commit ourselves to the principle that those who serve the church—laity, clergy and religious—should receive a sufficient livelihood and the social benefits provided by responsible employers in our nation. These obligations, however, cannot be met without the increased contributions of all the members of the Church" (446, #351). The obligation to support the church "falls on all the members of the community because of their baptism" (ibid.).

The paragraph obliges the faithful "to promote social justice"; this forms part of the Church's mission to proclaim the gospel (c. 211). The specific modality and the best means of fulfilling this obligation are to be determined by the individual, depending upon particular circumstances and resources available. Canon 298 suggests as one role of associations the exercise of charitable works and imbuing the temporal order with a Christian spirit. Canon 287, §1 urges clerics "to foster the peace and harmony based on justice" and canon 528, §1 obliges pastors to promote works of social justice. Vita consecrata 82 urges members of institutes of consecrated life "to denounce the injustices committed against so many sons and daughters of God and commit themselves to the promotion of justice."

The second obligation, to assist the poor, an obligation rooted in "the precept of the Lord," is "a special form of primacy in the exercise of Christian charity, to which the whole tradition of the Church bears witness."[161] Thus, for example, canon 282, §2 exhorts the clergy to use any excess goods for works of charity. Although the specific precept is not specified, Apostolicam actuositatem 8 bases the "law of charity" on the greatest commandment, to "love God with your whole heart and your neighbor as yourself," and on Jesus' identification with all men and women "as the object of charity." Gaudium et spes 88 denounces the scandal occurring in societies comprised of a Christian majority in which some have a superfluity of goods while others are "being crucified by hunger, disease, and every kind of wretchedness." This "option for the poor" cannot remain on the abstract level but "must be translated at all levels into concrete actions until it decisively attains a series of reforms."[162] Further, "Christ's example, no less than his words, is normative for Christians. We know that, at the Last Judgment, we shall all be judged, without distinction, on our practical love of our brothers and sisters."[163]

The obligation to assist the poor is not identified with the evangelical counsel of poverty;[164] not all the faithful are obliged to profess this counsel. Thus, the code recognizes that other just demands are placed on the faithful; for example, canon 231, §2 states the right of the lay persons to have decent remuneration "so that they are able to provide decently for their own needs and those of their family." Nonetheless, Gaudium et spes 88 requires that all God's people must give not only from their surplus but from their substance. "At stake is the dignity of the human person, whose defense and promotion have been entrusted to us by the Creator," and therefore all must implement "measures inspired by solidarity and love of preference for the poor."[165]

The Common Good and Limitations of Rights

Canon 223 — §1. In exercising their rights, the Christian faithful, both as individuals and gathered together in associations, must take into account the common good of the Church, the rights of others, and their own duties toward others.

§2. In view of the common good, ecclesiastical authority can direct the exercise of rights which are proper to the Christian faithful.

This canon provides a necessary corrective to an overly individualistic understanding of obligations and rights, a tendency which often prevails in civil society. This corresponds to canon 26 in the Eastern code. As noted in the introduction to this title, canons 209 and 223 form a framework for the listing of obligations and rights of all the Christian faithful; these duties and rights exist within the Church as communio.

A communio ecclesiology necessarily involves an individual's personal relationship with God but that relationship cannot be seen in isolation, separated from a specific community of faith, the Church. The exercise of rights occurs within the community and must follow "the moral maxim of personal and social responsibility"; that is, both individuals and society as a whole must "have regard to the rights of others, to their own duties towards others, and to the common good of all."[166] Nonetheless, inasmuch as the canon does restrict the exercise of rights, it requires strict interpretation (c. 18).

The canon articulates three factors to be taken into account in the exercise of rights by the faithful: the common good of the Church; the rights of others; and specific duties owed toward other faithful. The second paragraph states the competence of ecclesiastical authority to regulate the exercise of rights "in view of the common good."

Dignitatis humanae 6 describes the common good as "those conditions of social living which enable people to develop their own qualities most fully and easily." In the context of chapter 2, "The Human Community," Gaudium et spes 26 describes the common good as "the sum total of the conditions of social life enabling groups and individuals to realize their perfection more fully and readily." The community that is the Church is situated within this human society; the two should exist in harmony inasmuch as the gospel of Jesus Christ serves to safeguard the personal dignity and freedom of men and women.[167] Consequently, "the common good of the Church" refers to the fulfillment of the Church's mission received from Jesus Christ: the "salvation of souls" (see c. 1752). In other words, the exercise of rights occurs within the specific context of the Church as communio, i.e., the relationship between an individual and God as well as between the individual and the Church (c. 209). Further, this context also includes the mission entrusted to the Church, to proclaim the gospel (c. 211). Thus, the exercise of rights must serve the Church's mission and, as one consequence, any limitation of the exercise of rights to protect the common good must ensure the fulfillment of this mission and the promotion of communion among all the faithful.

This "common good" context explains the second and third limitations on the exercise of rights: the rights of others and duties owed toward others. Human beings are social by nature; they do not exist in isolation. The Church as communio emphasizes the mutual interdependence and cooperation among all the faithful. A responsible exercise of rights presupposes a process of reflection on a number of different factors: the person as an individual with obligations and rights; the person as a member of the community of faith; the person as possessing particular duties toward others arising from a specific office, vocation, or function in the Church; and the exercise of rights by other members of that same community. The exercise of rights must both foster a personal relationship with God as well as facilitate the common vocation of the Church to proclaim the gospel.

The second paragraph allows Church authorities to "direct the exercise" of rights but only to protect and promote the Church's mission in view of the common good. The paragraph does not, therefore, allow or justify the arbitrary exercise of authority; rather, it attempts to ensure that individuals in exercising their rights are mindful of the Church as a communion in which all the faithful are equal in dignity and in action (c. 208) and participate in the proclamation of the gospel (c. 211). Conflicts between individuals and between individuals and the institution can and do arise; canon 221 expresses the necessity of ensuring a proper protection of rights. Individuals who act in some official capacity in the church should strive to avoid contention; for example, canon 50 suggests that, prior to the issuance of a decree, the issuing authority should "hear those whose rights can be injured."

According to one conciliar source for this canon, Gaudium et spes 75: "But where the exercise of rights is temporarily restricted for the common good, once the circumstances have changed then freedom should be restored as rapidly as possible." Although the context of the conciliar text refers to the political community, this minimal restriction of freedom is also applicable to the Church inasmuch as "no human law is able to safeguard the personal dignity and freedom of humans as fittingly as the gospel which Christ has entrusted to his church."[168] The common good helps ensure that the Church not only proclaims the gospel but also lives the gospel message through the relationships among all the faithful and between the faithful and the world as a whole. God desires the salvation of men and women not individually but as the people of God (see LG 9); the common good serves to remind the faithful of the necessity of mutual cooperation both with God and with one another within the one community of faith. According to Gaudium et spes 41:

> The gospel announces and proclaims the liberty of God's children, rejects every slavery as ultimately resulting from sin, reverently respects the dignity of conscience and its free decision, continually teaches that all human talents should be devoted to God's service and the wellbeing of men and women, and commends all to the love of all.

All the Christian faithful, through their lives of faith, including the appropriate exercise and protection of rights, manifest to the world the Church's fundamental nature as communio and thereby proclaim the gospel.

Title II
The Obligations and Rights of the Lay Christian Faithful
[cc. 224–231]

The canons in this title of the code[1] constitute one of the most extensive sections of the law to deal exclusively with the laity.[2] Since the code's promulgation in 1983, many of the issues originally raised by these canons have continued to evolve.[3] The meaning of individual canons remains to be fully discovered, and certain issues, particularly the methods of vindicating lay rights, persist as an important area of canonical development for the future. While many other aspects of the 1983 code have been implemented, the vindication of lay rights has not yet received a great amount of attention, nor have the implications of such rights been clarified to any great extent by any type of canonical process. Many of the faithful do not know of these rights, despite the passage of time. However, as the concept of rights in the Church is further explored and clarified, we will have a clearer idea of the role of the laity.

Unlike the 1917 code, which limited its specific treatment of the laity to two canons affirming the rights of all the Christian faithful to receive the sacraments (CIC 682) and prohibiting them from wearing ecclesiastical garments (CIC 683), the canons under study here reflect an emphasis on the equality of all the faithful. These canons exhibit a relatively new view of rights for the laity in the Church, but much remains to be explored before their implications are fully realized. Defining the concept of ministry for the laity, in contrast to the ministry of the ordained, continues to be a major topic of discussion in the Church.

The 1987 synod of bishops on the laity[4] together with Pope John Paul II's subsequent apostolic exhortation Christifideles laici[5] presented the most extensive treatment of the role of the laity since the promulgation of the 1983 code. Both reaffirm the importance of the laity and highlight the theoretical and practical implications of their baptism in the Church.[6] The Catechism of the Catholic Church deals with the subject in a general fashion and refers to this part of

[1] The extensive commentary written by J. Provost in CLSA Com provides a substantial historical analysis of these canons that will not be repeated here. Rather, the following commentary will specifically highlight the changes made in this area of the law since the promulgation of the 1983 code and summarize the basic concerns addressed in the individual canons. See Provost, in CLSA Com, 159–170.

[2] Canons 208–223 on the rights and duties of all believers also apply to the laity, as well as to clerics. Other canons throughout the code mention the laity. See, for example, cc. 759, 1282, and 1287, §2.

[3] A number of articles concerning the laity were prepared in connection with an April 1987 CLSA symposium on the laity. See J 47 (1987) 1–245. the code in several instances.[7] The most recent Roman instruction, entitled "Some Questions Regarding Collaboration of Nonordained Faithful in Priests' Sacred Ministry,"[8] addresses issues of concern regarding the role of the laity in relation to that of the ministerial priesthood. The canons that follow will be reviewed in light of these documents.

Introductory Canon[9]

Canon 224 — In addition to those obligations and rights which are common to all the Christian faithful and those which are established in other canons, the lay Christian faithful are bound by the obligations and possess the rights which are enumerated in the canons of this title.

This introductory canon makes it clear that this section of the code applies directly to the lay faithful. However, it does not limit the application of the canons only to the laity, as some clerics or religious may be married and be parents, or may have been married in the past.[10]

While this canon does not define the laity, an understanding of the meaning of laity is necessary for an understanding of the canons that follow. A lay person, like a religious or cleric, is a member of the people of God, a baptized member of the Christian faithful with a distinct dignity whose primary function is within the world rather than within the Church's governance structure. Lay persons may have roles in both places, but their primary task is the transformation of the secular world (AA 2, 7). All are called to live out their baptismal promises, but the laity do this in their everyday lives, whether they be mothers, doctors, accountants, or street sweepers. Their call to holiness may be through marriage or the single life, as well as through parenthood.

That is not to say that the rights mentioned here are exclusive to the laity. Married deacons exercise the rights of the married and may exercise those of parents. Members of religious institutes with apostolic charisms may serve in the world, rather than in ecclesiastical structures. The most important fact is that no one within the Church stands alone; laity, clergy, and religious are all inexorably linked in the same goal of building up the whole Church.

Mission

Canon 225 — §1. Since, like all the Christian faithful, lay persons are designated by God for the apostolate through baptism and confirmation, they are bound by the general obligation and possess the right as individuals, or joined in associations, to work so that the divine message

[7] See CCC 873–875 (differences between clergy and laity), 897–913 (definition of laity in terms of their vocation together with their relationship to the munera of the Church), 940–943 (vocation of laity to a mission in the world and to holiness).

[8] See CFC et al., "Some Questions Regarding Collaboration of Nonordained Faithful in Priests' Sacred Ministry" (cited hereafter as "Some Questions"), Origins 27 (November 27, 1997) 399, 400–409, followed by "The Instruction: An Explanatory Note," 409–410. This instruction, approved in forma specifica by Pope John Paul II, was signed by the heads of eight Vatican dicasteries: CFC, PCL, CDF, CDWDS, CFB, CEP, CICLSAL, and PCILT. This document proposes to clarify "new forms of 'pastoral activity' of the nonordained on both parochial and diocesan levels" (400). For a canonical evaluation of the document, see J. Huels, "Interpreting an Instruction Approved in forma specifica," Stud Can 32 (1998) 5–46. Huels views the instruction as a new form of canonical document: a legislative instruction. A short commentary on the document prepared for the Canon Law Society of Great Britain and Ireland looks at the document's relationship to pastoral practices in the United Kingdom. See G. Read, "The Vatican Instruction on Collaborative Ministry," CLS-GBIN 113 (March 1998) 15–31.

[10] Permanent deacons may marry prior to their ordination or afterwards with the permission of the Holy See (cc. 1042, 1°; 1087). Diocesan priests or religious may have been married prior to entering into that state, after their children were of age and if their spouse had died or their marriage (to a living spouse) was annulled or dissolved through the proper church process.

of salvation is made known and accepted by all persons everywhere in the world. This obligation is even more compelling in those circumstances in which only through them can people hear the gospel and know Christ.

§2. According to each one's own condition, they are also bound by a particular duty to imbue and perfect the order of temporal affairs with the spirit of the gospel and thus to give witness to Christ, especially in carrying out these same affairs and in exercising secular functions.

The mission of the laity[11] is derived from their incorporation into the Church through the sacraments of initiation. The roles of the laity in society, whether with their families or as individuals, are viewed as instrumental in bringing others to the Church. This canon[12] is divided into two sections; paragraph one notes the obligation of individuals or groups to evangelize the world through the gospel, and paragraph two highlights the special duty of the lay faithful to transform the world through the gospel.

The secular role of the individual lay person is the basis for these actions, although lay persons may associate themselves with others to accomplish the same goals.[13] It is through the exercise of the laity's various roles in the world that others may be brought to faith in Christ. This secular orientation distinguishes the direction of their mission from that of the clergy, in that it emphasizes their complete immersion in their faith through their wide-ranging occupations in the secular world. The one who cleans the streets is under the same obligation to witness to the faith as the one who heals the sick. The implications of this mission are more specifically enumerated in the canons that follow in this title.

The source for the mission of the laity is their reception of the sacraments of initiation, making God the ultimate beginning of any action. This means that such work does not require the specific formal permission or deputation of church authorities; rather, it is a natural outgrowth of the mission that flows from the grace of the sacraments.[14] That mission may be the evangelization of others through service or the transformation of the secular world into a world permeated with Christ. It can mean inviting a fellow employee to an RCIA session or maintaining moral principles in the workplace. In carrying out their mission, lay persons may work as individuals or as members of teams or organizations. There is no single manner for carrying out the mission of the laity.

Marriage and Family Life[15]

Canon 226 — §1. According to their own vocation, those who live in the marital state are bound [11] See CCC 873–875. Also, M. D. Place, "'In the Manner of a Leaven': The Lay Mission to the Secular World," J 47 (1989) 86–102.

[12] Canons 401 and 406 of the Eastern code are worded in a similar fashion, although CCEO 401 is more specific about the role of the laity in transforming the temporal order.

[13] This transforming action may be carried out with other individuals belonging to official organizations or simply in concert with other persons with similar beliefs.

[14] The laity are "to learn the meaning and value of creation and how to relate it to the glory of God; to assist one another to live holier lives even in their daily occupations; to labor so that human labor, technical skill, civil culture and created goods may be made perfect for the benefit of every last man according to His plan; to work to see that created goods in their own way lead to general progress in human and Christian liberty and so illumine all society with Christ's saving light; to remedy through combined efforts any institutions and conditions of the world which are customarily an inducement to sin and thus imbue culture and human activity with moral values; to seed the world with the Word of God and to open wider the Church's doors so that the message of peace can enter the world" (LG 36).

[15] This canon must be studied in the context of the other portions of the code that address marriage (cc. 1055–1165) and various parental issues (cc. 98, §2 [authority over minors]; 111 [determining the Catholic rite of the child]; 529, §1 [relationship with the pastor]; 774, §2, 776, 793, 796–799, 1252 [education/religious education]; 835, §4 [sanctifying office of the Church]; 851, 2°, 855, 857, §2, 867, 868, 872, 874, §1, 1°, 877 [role in baptism of child]; 890, 895 [confirmation]; 914 [Eucharist], 1063 1°, 1136 [duty of parents]; 1071, §1, 6°

by a special duty to work through marriage and the family to build up the people of God.

§2. Since they have given life to their children, parents have a most grave obligation and possess the right to educate them. Therefore, it is for Christian parents particularly to take care of the Christian education of their children according to the doctrine handed on by the Church.

This canon deals with two related issues. The first paragraph[16] deals with the state of marriage and the duties that this vocation entails.[17] The second paragraph[18] relates to the procreation and education of children,[19] a reality which has long been viewed as a central good of marriage.

Marriage

The vocation of marriage has remained an important theme since the promulgation of the 1983 code. Christifideles laici mentions the importance of marriage and confirms its central role in the life of the laity.[20] Through marriage, the couple is drawn toward holiness; through married love and the building up of the kingdom of God, they are brought closer to their own salvation. This canon touches on the key theological dimensions of the sacrament.[21] Other canons that deal with marriage[22] must be considered in understanding the present canon properly. Christian marriage is viewed as the domestic Church, and the family is viewed as a basic unit of the Church as a whole. It is in those tiny churches of the family that the search for salvation is present each day.

Parents

This canon, which mentions the central role of parents in the education of their children, is the first of a veritable bill of parental rights[23] and obligations in the code. While the canon does not state that parents are the first and principal educators of their children, it does make clear that they are the primary educators of their children.[24] Parents are the ones to determine how this education is to be carried out, although their rights regarding religious education are exercised in relation to the corresponding rights and responsibilities of their pastor or the sacramental minister who will administer a specific sacrament.[25] Because of the [21] See also c. 835, §4, which was mentioned earlier; its second sentence highlights the liturgical significance of marriage and parenting.

[22] See footnote 15 for a list of canons pertaining to marriage.

[23] See P. Baillargeon, "The Rights and Duties of Parents in the Sanctification of Their Children," CLSAP 54 (1992) 55–71. M. Foster, "The Promotion of the Canonical Rights of Children," CLSAP 59 (1997) 163–203. Specific canons that refer to parents are listed in footnote 15. See also CCC 2221–2231.

[24] See also c. 774, §2 which instructs parents to form their children in the Christian life. This obligation is repeated in c. 793 §1, which adds that parents are to select the means for the Catholic education of their children.

[25] See cc. 793, §1; 776; and 777. In some places in North America where there has been an increase in the home schooling of children, there has been controversy concerning the exercise of this parental right. Some parents wish to determine the readiness of their child to receive the sacraments (Eucharist, reconciliation, and confirmation) without the assistance and oversight of the pastor, even where officially sanctioned church programs for preparation are available. These parents have failed to understand properly their right to teach their child about the Church, in light of their obligation to abide by the teachings of their local bishop and pastor. There may also be difficulties in home schooling situations concerning the appropriate texts and sources of Catholic teaching that are to be used in preparation for sacramental initiation. Some might prefer to choose a text that would not be approved by the local bishop, whether it is a catechism originating prior to Vatican II or one not entirely in accord with current Roman teach-specific responsibility of the ordained minister to foster a proper reception of the sacraments in accordance with Church teaching, the parents' educational rights are somewhat conditional.[26]

The education of children in the faith is of paramount importance to the future of the Church. Hence, like canon 797, this canon envisions that parents will be free to determine the particular method of Catholic education with the support and recognition of such a right by the State. Parents are theoretically free to select the schools where they will educate their children. However, in practice, it may not always be possible for them to do so.[27]

Civil Liberties[28]

Canon 227 — The lay Christian faithful have the right to have recognized that freedom which all citizens have in the affairs of the earthly city. When using that same freedom, however, they are to take care that their actions are imbued with the spirit of the gospel and are to heed the doctrine set forth by the magisterium of the Church. In matters of opinion, moreover, they are to avoid setting forth their own opinion as the doctrine of the Church.

This canon recognizes the fact that the Christian faithful possess the same civil liberties as other citizens. While the Church spent many centuries supporting limitations of ordinary civil rights,[29] the popes of this era have proclaimed that the basic dignity of human beings must be recognized and protected with appropriate civil liberties to be guaranteed by secular governments.[30] These rights are to be adopted in civil legislation and applied to all members of a given society. A variety of documents of Vatican II[31] provide the foundation for this canon.

Clergy and religious are also recognized as possessing such liberties, but their exercise of some rights is circumscribed in various ways because of their special ministry within the Church.[32] ings. A number of these issues are addressed by M. Foster in "Promotion of the Canonical Rights of Children"; section four is especially helpful in evaluating diocesan policies on religious education with these concerns in mind.

[26] See, for example, c. 843.

[27] A number of countries (including those with concordats with the Holy See) have a governmentally established church, e.g., the Anglican Church in Great Britain. Some of these countries have regulated what religious faith may be taught in any school (state sponsored or not) within their borders, regardless of the faith of the children and their parents, so there is effectively no freedom truly to choose how one's child is educated.

[28] See also CCEO 402.

[29] Roman Catholic Church history is marked with institutional actions including the Inquisition or the support of secular governments (monarchical or dictatorial) that did not allow freedom of speech, association, worship, etc., although this has not been the stance of the Holy See during much of the late nineteenth century and during the twentieth century.

[30] See GS 26, AAS 58 (1966) 1049 which states, "Therefore, there must be made available to all men everything necessary for leading a life truly human, such as food, clothing, and shelter; the right to choose a state of life freely and to found a family, the right to education, to employment, to a good reputation, to respect, to appropriate information, to activity in accord with the upright norm of one's own conscience, to protection of privacy and to rightful freedom in matters religious too." See also John XXIII, ency Pacem in terris, April 20, 1963, AAS 55 (1963) 257–304. For a fuller discussion of this issue, see D. Hollenbach, Claims in Conflict: Retrieving and Renewing the Catholic Human Rights Tradition (New York: Paulist, 1979). See also P. Bolté, Les droits et la papauté contemporaine: Synthèse et textes (Montreal: Fides, 1975) 15–83.

[31] LG 37 and GS 43 are examples of sources of the rights mentioned in the previous note, together with DH which addresses such issues in more detail.

[32] For example, c. 285, §3 prevents clerics from holding elective or appointed office in a civil government while c. 287, §2 does not allow them to be active in political parties or to direct labor unions without the permission of the competent authority. Such a decision must be founded on the protection of the rights of the Church or the promotion of the common good. Canon 672 applies these prohibitions to members of religious institutes.

Official Positions

Canon 228 — §1. Lay persons who are found suitable are qualified to be admitted by the sacred pastors to those ecclesiastical offices and functions which they are able to exercise according to the precepts of the law.

§2. Lay persons who excel in necessary knowledge, prudence, and integrity are qualified to assist the pastors of the Church as experts and advisors, even in councils according to the norm of law.

This canon recognizes the ability of the laity to hold ecclesiastical office or cooperate in the exercise of such office. The canon must be examined within the broader context of canons 129, 145, and 274, §1 on lay sharing in ecclesiastical jurisdiction, the elements of an ecclesiastical office, and eligibility for offices requiring orders or jurisdiction. All of these complex issues continue to be debated by canonists and others.[33] The first paragraph of the canon refers to the lay person's suitability and capacity actually to hold an office or exercise a specific function, while the second paragraph is concerned with the lay person's ability to give counsel or offer assistance to the pastors of the Church, especially in various conciliar processes.[34]

The competence to hold an ecclesiastical office hinges on a person's abilities and the nature of the office itself as established by law. Such competence is viewed as relating to the duties that will be undertaken as part of the office. Members of the Christian faithful, whether they be laity or clergy, are to possess the requisite qualifications for that office prior to their appointment. Special attention is to be paid to such qualifications as they relate to a specific position, such as diocesan chancellor (c. 483, §2), a judge in the tribunal (c. 1421) or finance officer (c. 494, §1). The manner in which the particular expertise was obtained is especially important. Married persons may speak expertly on the needs of those exercising their vocation[35] simply on the basis of their own lived experience, while a member of the finance council who must be expert in matters of law and economics would have to have acquired those credentials in a more formal fashion, such as receiving a degree in law or business.[36]

The types of ecclesiastical offices that may be held by lay persons have expanded substantially as the number of clergy has continued to decline. A comprehensive list of offices that might be held by the laity is literally impossible to draw up, since individual bishops have the ability to establish them as necessary; they are not limited to those specifically mentioned in the code. Lay persons currently act as diocesan chancellors and notaries (cc. 482–483, 1437), tribunal judges (c. 1421, §2), tribunal directors, assessors (c. 1424), auditors (c. 1428), promoters of justice or defenders of the bond (cc. 1430, 1432), finance officers (c. 494), members of the diocesan finance (cc. 492–493) and pastoral councils[37] (cc. 511–514), [33] For a thorough examination of the complex canonical dimensions of the issue of lay jurisdiction, see J. Beal, "The Exercise of the Power of Governance by Lay People: State of the Question," J 55 (1995) 1–92. This part of the commentary will not deal with these complex issues; however, see the commentary concerning cc. 129 and 145 for a discussion of these issues. See also J. Provost, "The Participation of the Laity in the Governance of the Church," Stud Can 19 (1985) 417–448; J. Myers, "Ecclesial Ministries for Lay Persons Within the Diocese: Development and Integration," CLSAP (1985) 66–83; B. [34] This section is similar to CCEO 408, §1–§3 and 403, §2. CCEO 408, §1–§3 emphasizes the admission of laity to ecclesiastical functions by competent authority. CCEO 403, §2 strictly requires that there be an ecclesial necessity, or great advantage and a lack of sacred ministers, before certain duties may be entrusted to members of the laity.

[35] For example, in pre-marriage preparation (c. 1063).

[36] Canon 492, §1.

[37] "Some Questions" sets out specific clarifications regarding the roles of various types of councils, including parochial pastoral councils, finance councils, and parish councils in art. 5, nos. 2–5. See Origins 27 (November 27, 1997) 405.

as well as pastoral ministers with varying types of authority.[38]

The question of whether lay persons may exercise jurisdiction in the traditional sense of the word is still a difficult one.[39] Lay judges with the requisite credentials (usually a license or doctorate in canon law) do "cooperate" in the exercise of jurisdiction every time they vote as part of a panel of judges (turnus) in a church tribunal. Furthermore, the laity have been granted permission to witness marriages when there is a genuine pastoral need.[40] The precise line limiting the exercise of jurisdiction to the ordained appears to be becoming less distinct with time and pastoral practice.

The counsel offered to ordained church officials, referred to in the second paragraph of the canon, is far more common in practice today with the proliferation of parish pastoral and finance councils established by universal[41] and particular church law, together with the same types of bodies at the diocesan level.[42] Diocesan synods,[43] which have become more prevalent in various places around the world, allow for specific input from the laity on a number of controlled subjects.[44] The laity have had difficulties accepting the advisory nature of many of these councils, since they are used to determining their own fate in everyday life. Their understanding of the theology and mission of the Church has evolved as they shape their vision of the future. Many are seeking formal theological education and an opportunity to bring their own gifts for leadership to the challenges of diocesan and parish governance by agreeing to hold ecclesiastical offices.

Theological Formation[45]

Canon 229 — §1. Lay persons are bound by the obligation and possess the right to acquire knowledge of Christian doctrine appropriate to the capacity and condition of each in order for them to be able to live according to this doctrine, announce it themselves, defend it if necessary, and take their part in exercising the apostolate.

§2. They also possess the right to acquire that fuller knowledge of the sacred sciences which are taught in ecclesiastical universities and faculties or in institutes of religious sciences, by attending classes there and pursuing academic degrees.

§3. If the prescripts regarding the requisite suitability have been observed, they are also qualified to receive from legitimate ecclesiastical authority a mandate to teach the sacred sciences.

This canon is divided into three paragraphs, with the first indicating the obligation of the laity to acquire Christian formation and education in keeping with their role in life so they can live a [38] See cc. 516, §2 implicitly, and 517, §2 explicitly on lay leadership in parishes and comparable juridic structures. In part four of the section on theological principles, "Some Questions" also states: "The non-ordained faithful do not enjoy a right to such tasks and functions. Rather, they are 'capable of being admitted by the sacred Pastors . . . to those functions which, in accordance with the provisions of law, they can discharge'" (Origins 27 [November 27, 1997] 402).

[39] See footnote 33.

[40] The code provides for non-clerics to act as official witnesses to marriages in accordance with c. 1112, §1. "Some Questions," in article 10, addresses the issue of the nonordained witnessing marriages by specifying the three criteria necessary to allow this to happen in special circumstances involving a grave shortage of clergy (Origins 27 [November 27, 1997] 406). Canon 1116 also allows the contractants themselves to marry without the presence of an official church witness in certain situations, since the parties to the marriage are the ministers of the sacrament.

[44] Just as the synod of bishops for the whole Church (cc. 342–348) is under the authority of the pope, a diocesan synod is under the authority of the bishop who called it into being (461, §1) and determines the issues that will be addressed. All other members of the synod have only a consultative vote; the legislative power remains with the diocesan bishop (c. 466).

[45] See CCEO 404.

fuller Christian life. They are also to be prepared to defend the faith in the world. Each person is granted his or her own special gifts from God, whether it be an intelligence suited for advanced theological study or one that is sufficient to assist in the instruction of children as they prepare for the sacraments of initiation. The canon emphasizes the responsibility of the laity to obtain this knowledge, but does not specify the source from which it is to be obtained. That source could be private study, formal instruction, or life experience within the Christian community.[46]

The second paragraph establishes the right of the laity to acquire a formal education at the Church's institutions of higher learning and to receive academic degrees for their work.[47] In the past, ecclesiastical universities and pontifical faculties approved or established by the Holy See[48] have most often been the exclusive domain of clergy and religious rather than the laity. In North America, this situation has changed drastically over the past twenty years. The lay faithful have actively sought additional education for their own spiritual benefit and to allow them to serve their local communities more fully. With the increasing need to educate the laity as fewer clergy are available, many educational institutions actively recruit lay students or tailor their programs to the laity's needs. The number of lay persons preparing to act as professional ministers after receiving extensive graduate education has increased dramatically. The presence of lay students with a variety of life experiences has also enriched educational programs that were once reserved solely for young men. Oftentimes, church educational institutions have established specific programs for the preparation of parish ministers, programs that are separate from the seminary curriculum. The trend is likely to continue as these institutions, concerned with defraying the high costs of training clergy, look to the additional funding generated by the instruction of the laity to lighten that financial load.

The third paragraph establishes a qualified right of the laity to teach the sacred sciences.[49] It is the most restricted of the rights mentioned in this canon. Any person seeking such a position must meet the requirements for reception of a canonical mandate.[50] Lay persons currently teach in seminaries and hold mandates to teach in pontifical faculties.

Liturgical Functions[51]

Canon 230 — §1. Lay men who possess the age and qualifications established by decree of the conference of bishops can be admitted on a stable basis through the prescribed liturgical rite to the ministries of lector and acolyte. Nevertheless, the conferral of these ministries does not grant them the right to obtain support or remuneration from the Church.

§2. Lay persons can fulfill the function of lector in liturgical actions by temporary designation. All lay persons can also perform the functions of commentator or cantor, or other functions, according to the norm of law.

This directory is published bi-annually and is compiled through queries to all dioceses in the United States. It includes accredited and unaccredited programs. The same group also publishes Seminary Formation Directory and Diaconate Formation Directory.

[47] Article 13 of "Some Questions" indicates that proper formation is an important issue and expresses a preference for preparation under proper ecclesiastical authority "in environments other than that of the Seminary, as this is reserved solely for those preparing for the priesthood" (Origins 27 [November 27, 1997] 407).

[51] There is no corresponding canon in the Eastern code.

§3. When the need of the Church warrants it and ministers are lacking, lay persons, even if they are not lectors or acolytes, can also supply certain of their duties, namely, to exercise the ministry of the word, to preside over liturgical prayers, to confer baptism, and to distribute Holy Communion, according to the prescripts of the law.

Interpretations of this canon continue to evolve. Both the laity and the ordained may hold liturgical offices.[52] Much has been written about the differences between the liturgical roles of the laity and the ordained,[53] and there has been some controversy regarding certain official clarifications of the lay-clergy relationship.[54]

Installed Ministries – §1

This paragraph allows only lay men to be installed as lectors and acolytes, without requiring them to be clerics. However, in practice, these ministries continue to be used as steps toward the admission of a candidate to the diaconate or priesthood.[55] One is installed in these ministries by a special ceremony presided over by the appropriate bishop, or the major superior of a clerical religious institute or society of apostolic life. This is the only canon in this title that distinguishes between men and women.

Some priests have refused to apply this law strictly, relying instead on an interpretation of the law that allows for the use of extraordinary ministers.[56] One argument used to justify this practice is that the canon is unjustly discriminatory toward women, since there is no reason for such a distinction at this time. This is particularly true in light of the Holy See's permission for the use of altar girls. A second justification suggested for using only extraordinary ministers is the level of mobility in modern society in North America, that makes establishing a stable pool of installed lectors and acolytes practically impossible. Many dioceses lack specific norms to govern these ministries.

Installed lectors and acolytes acquire a stability in ministry that goes beyond the exercise of their function during liturgical celebrations. Admission to these ministries must be in keeping with the guidelines of the local episcopal conference and will usually involve a rite of installation.[57] The age for admission to the ministries in the United States is eighteen.[58] These ministries do not entitle the holder to financial remuneration or support. In an October 27, 1977 letter, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments permitted conferences of bishops to establish other stable ministries in their own regions.[59]

This canon continues the canonical provisions of Ministeria quaedam[60] which eliminated the tonsure, the minor orders, and the subdiaconate

[55] Canon 1035 requires that a man who is to be promoted to the permanent or transitional diaconate have received the ministries of lector and acolyte and exercised these ministries for a suitable time. At least six months must elapse between the conferral of the ministry of acolyte and the diaconate.

[56] See c. 230, §2. In light of the decision to allow the use of female altar servers (Origins 23 [April 28, 1994] 777–779), the restriction of installation in such ministries to men seems unusual. See footnote 61 for additional comments on this topic.

The NCCB confirmed the provisions specified in this document during its November 1972 meeting. See BCLN 8 (December 1972) 353–354. Under the present NCCB policy, bishops may dispense from the age requirement if the candidate possesses the requisite maturity and judgment to carry out the duties of the ministry. As this commentary is being written, the NCCB is considering establishing norms to govern these ministries.

[60] The canon also expresses the liturgical law found in GIRM, 66–68.

from the Latin church. The document also provided for what was considered a new recognition of lay ministry in the Church's mission, for it allowed episcopal conferences to request the installation of laity in other ministries if it was deemed helpful in the local situation. The current code does not eliminate this possibility, so other installed ministries could conceivably be created.

It should be noted that a ministry differs from an "office" established in accordance with canon 145. One who acts as a minister in this case may change from one parish or community to the next without needing an additional installation ceremony. However, one who holds an office is much more limited in exercising his or her responsibilities. For example, one who is the pastor of one parish may not exercise the same powers and responsibilities in another parish without a proper appointment.

In the United States, the term "ministry" has been applied to the exercise of all the gifts and talents of the faithful for the benefit of the community. Ministries open to the laity are not limited to those established by law. This has been amply proven over the past two decades as functions of all kinds have proliferated to respond to the various pastoral needs present in society today. Many parishes have established a ministry for "greeting" those who arrive for liturgical functions, who "usher" others to places in the church, or who assist with the education of others in a ministry of education. This is not to suggest that the ordained ministry is not respected or that the laity are acting as clerics, but that the concept of "ministering" to others has become synonymous with church "service" in any capacity. Changing the usage of the term "ministry" so that it would apply only to the ministry of the ordained or those officially installed would be a herculean task, given the evolution which began with the Second Vatican Council. It would also serve little purpose, since it appears that there is no confusion regarding the distinction between the functions of the ordained and those of the laity. If there is no confusion, there is no reason to change. For example, there is no confusion regarding the rights attached to the ministerial priesthood vis-à-vis those of one who exercises a "ministry of hospitality" by serving donuts after Sunday Mass.

Extraordinary Ministries – §2

The other ministries of lector, commentator, and cantor mentioned in the canon are viewed in the same informal way, as distinguished from those requiring a formal installation rite as mentioned in paragraph one of this canon. This paragraph of the canon allows for the establishment of other liturgical functions as necessary, depending on the needs of the local church. Such ministries are open to both women and men, and the canon does not place any age restrictions on those who might seek to fulfill these duties.

The term "temporary designation" seems to mean that those who function according to this paragraph of the canon do so in a way that is not stable, as contrasted with the installed ministries mentioned in paragraph one. The needs of the community at the moment are paramount, so a person deemed suitable by the competent authority may exercise the same responsibilities as an installed minister, but only for a limited period.

In the past, acting as an altar server has been restricted to boys and men, whether installed as acolytes or not (CIC 813). However, in 1994 a general permission for the use of female altar servers was granted, subject only to the judgment of the individual bishop in light of the specific circumstances of his own diocese.[61]

[61] The CDWDS decision to grant general permission for the use of female altar servers was based on a June 30, 1992 authentic interpretation of the PCILT, which determined that female altar servers could be permitted under c. 230, but called for additional instructions from the CDWDS. The question posed to the PCILT was: "Can service at the altar also be counted among the liturgical functions that lay people, either men or women, can fulfill according to Canon 230, §2 of the Code of Canon Law?" The answer was in the affirmative. This decision was confirmed by Pope John Paul II on July 11, 1992. See AAS 86 (1994) 541; Origins 23 (April 28, 1994) 777–779. The CDWDS instruction reminds bishops that boys should remain servers at the altar since this has led to vocations in the

Supplying for Ministers – §3

This paragraph of the canon refers to the most extraordinary of circumstances in allowing the laity, whether women or men, to exercise or supply the functions of absent or impeded ministers. In some parts of the Church today, such circumstances are all too common. This canon allows lay persons to act as lectors or ministers of the Eucharist (c. 910, §2), baptism (c. 861, §2), or of the word (c. 759) or to preside over liturgical prayers as established by law. For the laity to act in this way, the Church must need such actions, and clerical ministers must be truly physically or morally unavailable for the exercise of the function.[62] One example of the regulated exercise of such extraordinary ministry is The Directory for Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest.[63]

Formation and Remuneration for Church Service[64]

Canon 231 — §1. Lay persons who permanently or temporarily devote themselves to special service of the Church are obliged to acquire the appropriate formation required to fulfill their function properly and to carry out this function conscientiously, eagerly, and diligently.

§2. Without prejudice to the prescript of can. 230, §1 and with the prescripts of civil law having been observed, lay persons have the right to decent remuneration appropriate to their condition so that they are able to provide decently for their own needs and those of their family. They also have a right for their social provision, social security, and health benefits to be duly provided.

This canon discusses a pertinent obligation and right of those lay persons who serve the Church either permanently or temporarily. It sets standards for formation and remuneration to be observed by church authorities in light of church teachings on the just wage and benefits to be paid to church workers.

Appropriate Formation – §1

This paragraph obliges the lay person who wishes to serve the Church, either permanently or temporarily, to acquire the proper training and skills to accomplish that work.[65] It is not specified whether that education should be obtained prior to commencing the task.

The type of work covered under this canon may include that of the offices described in canons 145 and 228, §1. These are only examples of the types of activities discharged by those bound by this obligation, since the wording of the canon is broad enough to cover various functions that may not be considered offices in the strict sense. The service involved may be paid, volunteer, temporary, permanent, full-time, or part-time. It may be related to the teaching, governing, or sanctifying ministries of the Church.

All must carry out their functions "conscientiously, eagerly, and diligently." These criteria, which differ from the legally verifiable requirements that are most often included in the canons, past. Furthermore, provision must be made to explain to the faithful the reasons for the change.

[62] See "Some Questions," arts. 8 (Eucharist) and 11 (baptism), Origins 27 (November 27, 1997) 405–407. While not specifically mentioning them as extraordinary ministries, this same document also treats the apostolate to the sick (art. 9) and funeral liturgies (art. 12).

[63] This CDWDS document was dated June 2, 1988. See Origins 18 (October 20, 1988) 301, 303–307. On July 9, 1991, the NCCB Committee on the Liturgy issued the statement "Gathered in Steadfast Faith: Statement on Sunday Worship in the Absence of a Priest." See also M. Henchal, "A Ministry for Gathering in Steadfast Faith: Lay Presiding," CLSAP 54 (1992) 130–146. See "Some Questions," art. 7, Origins 27 (November 27, 1997) 405.

[64] CCEO 409 is similar to this canon with the exception of the reference to c. 230, §1, since there is no corresponding canon in the Eastern code.

[65] Canons 234–235 refer to clerical formation prior to ordination, and c. 279 obliges clerics to continue their own education throughout their lives. Canons 646–653 and cc. 659–661 specify the general canonical requirements for the formation of novices and professed members of religious institutes; the constitutions of these institutes may also address this subject. The code also requires the formation of members of societies of apostolic life (cc. 735–736) and secular institutes (cc. 722, 724).

are akin to the admonition that a church administrator charged with the oversight of ecclesiastical goods act with the "diligence of a good householder" (c. 1284, §1) or that a pastor should fulfill his office "diligently" (c. 529, §1). Such criteria should be interpreted consistently in light of other legal provisions.[66]

One must consider the obligation specified in this canon in light of the basic right of all believers to a Christian education (c. 217). Furthermore, this canon must also be read in light of canon 229, §1, which articulates a more general educational obligation for all laity, regardless of their condition. By contrast, canon 231, §1 addresses the issue of formation for a specific ecclesial purpose.

In recent years it has been easier for lay persons to receive the appropriate instruction necessary to fulfill this obligation. Various dioceses and parishes have begun to assist the laity in obtaining the required education, since their exercise of various offices has become more critical due to a shortage of both clergy and religious.

The bishops continue to grapple with their obligation under this canon. On the one hand, they must contend with an increasingly limited number of qualified teachers for an ever growing population. On the other, the funds necessary to sustain any type of educational program are frequently lacking. The great geographic spread characterizing the majority of dioceses in North America presents additional problems, since the faithful may be unable to avail themselves of any kind of educational program a bishop can offer. Practically speaking, while a bishop may establish mandatory educational requirements for church workers, if the faithful will not or cannot attend such training programs, volunteer positions will go unfilled, or other arrangements will have to be made. In places where more formal education is unavailable, alternative programs have begun to emerge so that the right of the laity to receive appropriate formation may be satisfied and they may receive the training they need to take on their responsibilities in the Church.

Just Wages and Benefits – §2

The second paragraph of this canon is grounded in the Church's social justice teachings on a just wage and also specifies certain implications of that teaching regarding employment benefits. Such benefits would include appropriate wages that respect civil law requirements as well as the right to social provisions such as health, disability, and retirement insurance that people need to provide decently for themselves and their families. This "right" under the law has been slow to be realized in practice in many places, since the Church is viewed by many—both within and outside it—as a separate institution immune from the requirements of its own law. In some quarters just compensation and volunteerism are confused. Many lay persons who serve the Church are not aware of this teaching or have been reluctant to bring a case in canonical court for the vindication of this right, since such an action effectively brands them as "troublemakers" and in effect makes them unemployable in the Church.

This canon should be viewed in relationship to canon 1286 in Book V which requires that administrators observe local laws concerning labor in the employment of church workers[67] and are to pay employees a just and decent wage so they can support themselves and their families.[68] Paragraph [66] Additional examples of such criteria include clergy being called to fulfill their functions "faithfully" (c. 274, §2) and bishops being admonished to set an example of charity, humility, and simplicity of life (c. 387).

[67] Canon 1286, 1° states that in the employment of workers administrators "are to observe meticulously also the civil laws concerning labor and social policy, according to the principles handed on by the Church."

[68] Canon 1286, 2° states that administrators "are to pay a just and decent wage to employees so that they are able to provide fittingly for their own needs and those of their dependents." See National Association of Church Personnel Administrators (NACPA), Just Treatment for Those Who Work for the Church (Cincinnati, Ohio: NACPA, 1986) viii–21; CLSA, "Canonical Standards in Labor-Management Relations: A Report," J 47 (1987) 545–575. Both works discuss the practical applications of the Church's teaching on justice in this area.

two of canon 231 does not limit these rights only to those who work full time for the Church, but is tailored to make it clear that these rights extend to persons who work without a contract and provide less formal ministerial service. The bishops of the United States have reiterated the importance of this right in their pastoral letter Economic Justice for All: Catholic Social Teaching and the US Economy[69] which states, "We bishops commit ourselves to the principle that those who serve the Church—laity, clergy, and religious—should receive a sufficient livelihood and the social benefits provided by responsible employers in our nation."[70] This same document also recognizes the rights of employees to organize and bargain collectively with the institution through whatever association or organization they freely choose.[71] The increase in the number of lay persons working in formal positions within the Church has placed a particularly heavy burden on church institutions to honor this right. Many of the post-1983 code disputes that have arisen in the Church are in the area of employment practices.[72] To deal with these cases, some dioceses have implemented a "due process" system similar to that approved by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB).[73] Most have some type of system on record, even if it differs from the NCCB-approved system.[74]

SACRED MINISTERS OR CLERICS
[cc. 232–293]

CHAPTER I
THE FORMATION OF CLERICS
[cc. 232–264]

The Church's Duty and Right to Form Sacred Ministers

Canon 232 — The Church has the duty and the proper and exclusive right to form those who are designated for the sacred ministries.

On the occasion of the commissioning of the apostles, Jesus instructed the eleven as follows:

> Full authority has been given to me both in heaven and on earth; go, therefore, and make disciples of all nations. Baptize them in the name "of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." Teach them to carry out everything I have commanded you. And know that I am with you always, until the end of the world.[1]

The obligations that flow from this command are complemented by the right of the apostles and their successors to carry it out. That fact is expressed absolutely in this canon which introduces the section on the essential work of forming and preparing students in seminaries and religious communities for service to the Church as ordained ministers.[2]

The exercise of the Church's right and the carrying out of this obligation have their roots primarily in the gospel as well as, in more recent years, the documents of Vatican II that offered a standard teaching on the priesthood. These include Lumen gentium, Christus Dominus, and Presbyterorum ordinis, together with the documents that provided formation principles and guidelines for the renewal of priestly formation, Optatam totius and the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education's 1970 Ratio fundamentalis institutionis sacerdotalis. This latter document was a basic plan to assist bishops in formulating their own particular programs for seminary renewal. An updated 1985 edition of it followed the promulgation of the 1983 Code of Canon Law.[3]

All these works provided direction for the National Conference of Catholic Bishops' publication, the Program for Priestly Formation. Its fourth edition reflects the 1990 synod of bishops on "The Formation of Priests in the Circumstances of the Present Day," and Pope John Paul II's post-synodal apostolic exhortation, Pastores dabo vobis.[4]

Central to the life and work of the Church is the appropriately formed and well-educated priest who has received as expert as available human, spiritual, and pastoral formation in a seminary. Toward this end, the Church in the United States under its civil laws enjoys the freedom to establish its own seminaries and form its own seminarians for ordination to the priesthood (DH 4).

The Task of Nurturing Vocations

Canon 233 — §1. The duty of fostering vocations rests with the entire Christian community so that the needs of the sacred ministry in the universal [3] The text of the updated Ratio may be found in Norms I, 15–60.

[4] For the 1990 synod's Lineamenta, see Origins 19 (June 1, 1989) 33–46; for the synod's Instrumentum laboris, see L'Osservatore Romano (in English) 30 (1150) (July 23, 1990) 1–6, 11–14; for PDV see Origins 21 (April 16, 1992) 717–759, esp. n. 4.

Church are provided for sufficiently. This duty especially binds Christian families, educators, and, in a special way, priests, particularly pastors. Diocesan bishops, who most especially are to be concerned for promoting vocations, are to teach the people entrusted to them of the importance of the sacred ministry and of the need for ministers in the Church and are to encourage and support endeavors to foster vocations, especially by means of projects established for that purpose.

§2. Moreover, priests, and especially diocesan bishops, are to have concern that men of a more mature age who consider themselves called to the sacred ministries are prudently assisted in word and deed and duly prepared.

In Pastores dabo vobis 34 Pope John Paul II speaks of the "Gospel of vocation" in reference to John 1:35–42 ("Come, and see"). He describes it as the "paradigm, strength and impulse behind [the Church's] mission to care for the birth, discernment and fostering of vocations, particularly those to the priesthood."[5]

Optatam totius has been called the Second Vatican Council's charter of seminary reform and paragraph two is the foundation for this canon. Under the leadership of the diocesan bishop, who has the ultimate responsibility for fostering vocations (c. 385),[6] and with the active cooperation of the diocesan community, responsible and well-planned public relations efforts must be undertaken to promote vocations to the priesthood. The powerful technological tools of modern communication ought to be utilized in order to awaken all Christians to the need for sacred ministers in the Church in the United States and throughout the world (PDV 41).

While in some parts of the world there is an increase in the number of priestly vocations, a grave shortage of priests is being felt in other parts (PDV 1).[7] "The lack of priests is certainly a sad thing for any Church," said Pope John Paul II (PDV 34). An alarm needs to be sounded so that in accord with this canon all the faithful might dutifully attend to the scarcity of priestly vocations.[8]

The Program for Priestly Formation 95 points to the necessity for organized programs of assistance in the work of awakening these vocations and building up new feeder systems. The call to priestly ministry should come from the local church, from the parish and all its members. Today many dioceses have responded with varying types of programs aimed at helping an individual begin the process of making an informed decision about a vocation to the priesthood.

Paragraph two of this canon highlights another significant fact in the United States and elsewhere. This is the gradually growing number of men of more mature age responding to the call to the diaconate and priesthood later in life. These callings are generally referred to as "delayed vocations" or "second career vocations."[9] Following up on the call for "colleges for late vocations" in Optatam totius 3, this matter was addressed in 1976 by the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education.[10] The present canon directs that such individuals are to be encouraged and provided for in every way possible, ideally by a specific seminary curriculum of formation and academic programs with suitable adaptations tailored to their special talents and needs.[11]

The Eastern code also underscores the shared responsibility of the whole Christian community in becoming involved in the work of fostering vocations. It stresses that the community's outreach must be to boys, young people, and men of "more advanced age."[12]

Minor Seminaries

Canon 234 — §1. Minor seminaries and other similar institutions are to be preserved, where they exist, and fostered; for the sake of fostering vocations, these institutions provide special religious formation together with instruction in the humanities and science. Where the diocesan bishop judges it expedient, he is to erect a minor seminary or similar institution.

§2. Unless in certain cases circumstances indicate otherwise, young men disposed to the priesthood are to be provided with that formation in the humanities and science by which the youth in their own region are prepared to pursue higher studies.

At the other end of the age spectrum are young men studying in minor seminaries or similar institutions (Ratio 11–19). These have played a crucial role as the traditional means for fostering priestly vocations among the young.

The Eastern code expresses a wider purpose for a minor seminary. It describes the minor seminary as a place to serve not only those who show signs of a vocation to the sacred ministry but also others who may not seem to be called to the clerical state but, nevertheless, can be prepared to work in certain ministries and apostolic works.[13]

In the United States, Catholic schools and colleges served in the past as reliable feeder systems for providing seminaries with students, but today they are no longer producing many applicants. Enrollments in high school and college seminaries continue to decline as do the number of seminaries for students at these levels.[14]

Even the term "minor seminary" has in some quarters become an unpopular and controversial one and has been replaced for the most part by the term "college seminary." However, while not all are in agreement on their value, some are beginning to take a second look at minor seminaries. The 1990 synod of bishops recognized them as a valid instrument for formation in the early stages of young vocations.[15]

While this canon does not require the establishment of such an institution in each diocese, it does call on the diocesan bishop to maintain and support such institutions where they exist and even to provide for the erection of one, if he judges it expedient. The "mind of the legislator" (c. 17) is rather clear here as it is in the apostolic exhortation Pastores dabo vobis 63–64, where the Holy Father stresses the advantages of "minor seminaries" or, if it is not possible to have such an institution, then of other "institutions," e.g., "vocational groups for adolescents and young people."

knowledged that formation for "second career" applicants seems to be best accomplished in a seminary setting which is constructed only for older candidates. He noted that pioneers in this area have been the Pope John XXIII National Seminary in Weston, Massachusetts, and Sacred Heart School of Theology in Hales Corners, Wisconsin.

See PPF 94–130 for material on high school seminaries and related programs; similar attention is given to college seminaries and related programs in 131–208 with the addition of requirements for philosophical training and undergraduate study of theology.

[14] A dramatic example of this is the fact that in the last quarter of the twentieth century college seminary enrollment dropped by approximately 90 percent. For current statistics see the yearly publication CARA Seminary Directory, Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University.

As regards preparing and forming these students for priestly ministry, paragraph two of this canon states that their training and education ought to be on a par with that of their peers. This echoes the call of canon 806, §2 for "academically distinguished" formation in Catholic educational institutions. Gravissimum educationis 8 is one of the sources for this canon.

The Eastern code urges even more strongly that the minor seminary's curriculum be such that it can lead to a civil diploma so that students can continue to pursue their studies elsewhere if they choose (CCEO 344, §3).

Major Seminaries

Canon 235 — §1. Young men who intend to enter the priesthood are to be provided with a suitable spiritual formation and prepared for their proper duties in a major seminary throughout the entire time of formation or, if in the judgment of the diocesan bishop circumstances demand it, for at least four years.

§2. The diocesan bishop is to entrust those who legitimately reside outside a seminary to a devout and suitable priest who is to be watchful that they are carefully formed in the spiritual life and in discipline.

The duties proper to the priesthood that require education and preparation are supported by the qualities listed in the Program for Priestly Formation 544 and 545. These include, among others, fidelity to the word of God, commitment to a life of personal prayer, abiding love for the sacramental life of the Church, and acceptance of a lifelong commitment to chaste celibacy. Possession of such qualities, together with manifestations of an apostolic heart, zeal for service, self-awareness, and sound personal identity may provide evidence that a candidate has a sense of ministerial priesthood, that is, a vocation in the Church.

Optatam totius 4 states that major seminaries are necessary for priestly training in the ministries of word, worship, sanctification, and shepherding (PDV 60). Therefore, insofar as it is possible, there is to be adequate formation in these areas in a seminary setting for the whole time of that process. Four years are considered the minimal amount of formation time. Apart from a particular circumstance where the diocesan bishop allows an exception, viz., judging that only four years is sufficient for a candidate,[16] canon 250 calls for two full years to be dedicated to the philosophical disciplines and four to theological disciplines in accord with the local program of priestly formation. A "freestanding seminary" is the ordinary site for this training, but there are also "collaborative seminaries" which have a house of formation where students live while they attend classes at a university.

With due regard for the accepted nature and order of these "collaborative seminaries," a student preparing for the priesthood outside of a seminary would be rare in the United States. Nevertheless, paragraph two of this canon allows the diocesan bishop to grant an exception from paragraph one's requirement that formation and training take place in a major seminary "throughout the entire time of formation" which is six full years. In this case a devout and suitable priest is to be appointed by the diocesan bishop to be the candidate's vigilant formation director.[17]

The Eastern code addresses the same matter except that it speaks neither of a specific number of years nor of those who legitimately reside outside a seminary (CCEO 331, §2 and 344, §4).

Permanent Deacons

Canon 236 — According to the prescripts of the conference of bishops, those aspiring to the permanent diaconate are to be formed to nourish a spiritual life and instructed to fulfill correctly the duties proper to that order:

1° young men are to live at least three years in some special house unless the diocesan bishop has established otherwise for grave reasons;

2° men of a more mature age, whether celibate or married, are to spend three years in a program defined by the conference of bishops.

Lumen gentium 29 and Ad gentes 16 spoke of restoring the diaconate as a permanent rank of the hierarchy. In June 1967 and August 1972, Pope Paul VI promulgated the motu proprios Sacrum diaconatus ordinem and Ad pascendum which provided the developing norms for this restoration.[18] In April 1968 the bishops of the United States were among the first to take action by determining that such a restoration was appropriate for the country and desirable for meeting pastoral needs. In August 1968 they received permission from the Holy See to revive the permanent diaconate. Where needed, and with the consent of the local bishop, the permanent diaconate could be restored for married or unmarried men of mature years, the latter at the time being eligible after age twenty-five. A two-year training program was suggested, but the present code extends it to three years, and some dioceses require even more time.

In March 1998, the Congregation for Catholic Education issued Fundamental Norms for the Formation of Permanent Deacons, and the Congregation for the Clergy issued the Directory for the Ministry and Life of Permanent Deacons. The documents provide universal norms aimed at ensuring consistency in the training and ministry of deacons around the world.[19]

Candidates for the permanent diaconate are bound by the appropriate canons in this chapter on the formation of clerics.[20] The above norm directs the bishops' conference to set up a program for the formation of permanent deacons which is to be governed by norms issued by the same conference. This had been done in 1968 when the U.S. bishops established a Bishops' Committee on the Permanent Diaconate to approve programs established in particular dioceses. In 1971 it published formation guidelines drawing on the experience of a number of existing programs.[21]

Canon 1031, §2 allows an unmarried candidate for the permanent diaconate to be admitted to the diaconate at age twenty-five and a married candidate, with the consent of his wife, at thirty-five. Canon 1031, §3 empowers the conference to set down a norm requiring an older age, and in the United States that has been set for all candidates at thirty-five. When a dispensation from the required age involves more than one year, it is reserved to the Apostolic See.

The conference of bishops decided against requiring a three-year residence for young men in a "special house," but these men are required, along with married candidates, to enter the formation program. At the time of ordination those who are single (both the young and those of more mature years) are bound by the law of celibacy. Celibates and married permanent deacons who later might become widowers are subject to the impediment of sacred orders which would invalidate any attempted marriage, (c. 1087).[22]

The Eastern code calls for adapting the general norms for the formation of clerics to the formation of deacons not destined for the priesthood. It calls for at least three years of formation but "keeping in mind the traditions of their own Church sui iuris concerning the service of the liturgy, the word and charity" (CCEO 354).

Diocesan or Interdiocesan Major Seminaries

Canon 237 — §1. Where it is possible and expedient, there is to be a major seminary in every diocese; otherwise, the students who are preparing for the sacred ministries are to be entrusted to another seminary, or an interdiocesan seminary is to be erected.

§2. An interdiocesan seminary is not to be erected unless the conference of bishops, if the seminary is for its entire territory, or the bishops involved have obtained the prior approval of the Apostolic See for both the erection of the seminary and its statutes.

The spiritual, intellectual, pastoral, and disciplinary training of candidates for the priesthood is to be carried out in a major seminary. In 1997 in the United States there were 77 diocesan and 129 religious seminaries serving 4,645 students.[23] Changes in the last quarter of the twentieth century have radically altered the structure of the seminary. At present there are various types: freestanding, a self-contained institution which provides all the components of formation; university-related, where parts of the program are provided by a college or university other than the seminary; and collaborative, wherein faculty and other resources are shared among several seminaries with each one usually providing its own spiritual formation.

While the legislator prefers, if possible, a major seminary in every diocese, this canon recognizes the fact that many dioceses are not able to establish their own. Optatam totius 7 sees interdiocesan seminaries as meeting the needs of either a group of dioceses or of an entire region or nation. An interdiocesan seminary requires the input of all the bishops concerned and the Holy See's approval of both its establishment and its statutes. According to Pastor bonus 113, 3 this approval is granted by the Congregation for Catholic Education.[24]

The related canon in the Eastern code does not mention the approval of the Apostolic See but, depending on the canonical status of the church in question, it does call for the consent of the appropriate eparchial bishop or bishops, a metropolitan authority with the consent of his council of hierarchs, or a synod of bishops of a patriarchal Church (CCEO 332, §2 and 334).

Juridic Personality

Canon 238 — §1. Seminaries legitimately erected possess juridic personality in the Church by the law itself.

§2. In the handling of all affairs, the rector of the seminary represents it unless competent authority has established otherwise for certain affairs.

This canon and canon 335 of the Eastern code ipso iure constitute all lawfully established seminaries as juridic persons (cc. 113–123), i.e., subjects in church law of appropriate obligations and rights.

Insofar as a seminary is a non-collegial public juridic person (cc. 115, §2 and 116), a physical person, usually the rector, is ordinarily appointed to act as its legal representative. The rector in effect becomes a kind of vicar for the bishop, recommending that the bishop ordain those who have met the requirements of canon 1025 or refuse to do so for those who are "canonically unsuitable" (cf. c. 1026).

The diocesan bishop himself, or the bishops related to an interdiocesan seminary, or even the Holy See could conceivably be the physical person representing a particular seminary.

[24] Pastor bonus (June 28, 1988) originally named this dicastery "Congregation of Seminaries and Educational Institutions." On February 26, 1989, the Secretariat of State changed the name to "Congregation for Catholic Education (for Seminaries and Educational Institutions)" (Protocol number 236.026).

Chief Personnel

Canon 239 — §1. Every seminary is to have a rector who presides over it, a vice-rector if one is needed, a finance officer, and, if the students pursue their studies in the seminary itself, teachers who give instruction in various disciplines coordinated in an appropriate manner.

§2. Every seminary is to have at least one spiritual director, though the students remain free to approach other priests who have been designated for this function by the bishop.

§3. The statutes of a seminary are to provide ways through which the other moderators, the teachers, and even the students themselves participate in the responsibility of the rector, especially in maintaining discipline.

The bishop is present in a seminary principally through the ministry of the rector, who is entrusted with the responsibility for its administration (PDV 60). So much of a seminary's character and spirit depend on his leadership, his willingness to communicate to the faculty, students, and staff and to delegate management responsibilities at various levels where they can be most suitably carried out. A further description of his work and role may be found in Optatam totius 5, the Program for Priestly Formation 459–464, and canons 260 and 262. More detailed norms relative to his role are to be drafted into the statutes that are mentioned here in paragraph three, and especially into the particular rule for an individual seminary.[25]

If needed, a vice-rector may be a valuable assistant. The Eastern code makes no mention of a vice-rector (CCEO 338, §1), but the Program for Priestly Formation 465 mentions a vice-rector "sharing responsibilities for the internal operation of the seminary, especially as the rector attends to external responsibilities."

Our present canon requires a finance officer. The Eastern code qualifies this provision with "if the situation warrants" (CCEO 338, §1). In the Latin code, canons 494 and 636 call for a finance officer in dioceses and religious institutes. The Program for Priestly Formation 478 views this officer as a business manager or treasurer assisting the rector in the stewardship of the financial and physical resources of the seminary, in budget preparation and implementation, and in supervision of service personnel. The provisions of Book V on "The Temporal Goods of the Church" (see c. 1257, §1) need to be considered in administering the seminary's properties and goods since it is a public juridic person (c. 238, §1).[26]

In addition to the agency of the rector on behalf of the bishop, the latter is present in a seminary in the service of co-responsibility and communion fostered by the rector with the other teachers (PDV 60). The bishop is to provide the seminary with its principal administrators and faculty (c. 253) and see to the implementation of Optatam totius and the Program for Priestly Formation in correspondence with the Code of Canon Law (PPF 446; PDV 65).

Teachers and instructors are to meet certain academic and canonical qualifications. A description of the seminary's superiors and professors referred to in this canon can be found in Ratio.[27]

The Program for Priestly Formation 486 indicates that the faculty are appointed by the bishop on the recommendation of the rector in accord with the approved statutes of the seminary. There is a preference for teachers who have advanced degrees in their fields. This preference extends further to those teaching the sacred sciences, including philosophy, who have degrees from an institution recognized by the Holy See. The Program for Priestly Formation 485 also requires that these teachers have a "canonical mission" from the appropriate ecclesiastical authority.[28] The program further states that priests who teach on the seminary faculty should have appropriate experience in pastoral ministry (486).

Under the direction of the rector and in accord with the law, teachers are to work together to draw up a curriculum. Often the rector will appoint an academic dean or dean of the faculty who chairs the cooperative efforts of the teaching staff. Together with the rector, those who teach philosophy and theology and areas that are related to theology, such as scripture, canon law, church history, liturgy, pastoral studies, and the like must make a profession of faith (c. 833) and take an oath of fidelity in accord with the formula published February 27, 1989.[29]

The role and work of the spiritual director are considered by many to be the animating spirit of authentic seminary life.[30] The spiritual director mentioned here in paragraph two is designated by the bishop to assist the rector in coordinating the entire spiritual formation program. The Program for Priestly Formation 479–483 details his responsibilities. In accord with this canon, those who provide spiritual direction must be priests appointed by the bishop, and each student may choose one of them as director of his spiritual life.[31]

The statutes mentioned in paragraph three are the governing documents by which a seminary operates; these could include a charter, constitutional norms, bylaws of the board of directors and trustees, the particular seminary's rule, and other administrative regulations.[32] Such documents are to respect the local culture in accordance with the varying circumstances of time and place. The seminary statutes are to provide for faculty and, in a significant change from the past, students also, to share in the concerns of the rector. The discipline and order of seminary life are significant matters, [31]In the 1980s some women faculty members in seminaries were serving as spiritual directors. However, the 1993 PPF 323 restricted spiritual direction of seminarians to priests recommended by the rector and approved by the bishop. See CDWDS, "Scrutinies Regarding the Suitability of Candidates for Orders," Enclosure V, no. 12, November 28, 1998 (Protocol number 589/97). In its guidelines for the preparation of reports concerning the promotion of a candidate to holy orders, it calls for consideration of the regularity of a candidate's spiritual direction and with whom. For a study of those persons responsible for carrying out the spiritual training of students see M. Bartchak, Responsibility for Providing Spiritual Formation in Diocesan Seminaries according to the 1983 Code of Canon Law with Special Reference to the United States, CanLawStud 540 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1992). With regard to this canon's recognition of the freedom of students to approach other designated priests and any confessor, whether in the seminary or outside it, which is mentioned in the following canon, see G. McKay, "Spiritual Direction in the Diocesan Seminary: An Interpretation of the Canonical Norms," Stud Can 26 (1992) 401–413. The author discusses what he believes to be some confusion in the code's terminology and the present tension between respect for a seminarian's liberty of conscience and the seminary's desire to supervise his spiritual life. He also discusses and interprets the function of the spiritual director mentioned in this canon, the ordinary, and other confessors of c. 240, §1 and the director of one's spiritual life in c. 246, §4. See also Ratio 35; PPF 111, 145, and 323; CCEO 339, §1.

[32]In recent years there has been more diversity in those persons involved in the governance of seminaries. Clergy, religious, and laity more frequently contribute to the makeup of the various seminary boards. While these bodies are not mentioned in the code, they are found in PPF 444, 452, and 453. Such boards are expected to assist the bishop, rector, and faculty in developing a basic seminary policy in accord with church law. For more on these kinds of boards, see Schuth, 62–72.

and the canon calls for student participation in these areas according to the provisions of the rule.

Confessors

Canon 240 — §1. In addition to ordinary confessors, other confessors are to come regularly to the seminary. Without prejudice to the discipline of the seminary, students are always free to approach any confessor, whether in the seminary or outside it.

§2. When decisions are made about admitting students to orders or dismissing them from the seminary, the opinion of the spiritual director and confessors can never be sought.

The spiritual director mentioned in the preceding canon and the other priests designated for this function by the bishop can also serve as confessors. This present canon calls for still additional priests to be made available at the seminary on a regular basis to serve as "external" confessors (PPF 316).

In keeping with the sacred nature of the sacrament of penance and the anonymity that is its hallmark, this canon guarantees the widest liberty to students in the choice of a confessor, in the seminary or outside of it, within the reasonable limits of the good order of seminary life. Canon 630 provides the same freedom to members of religious institutes.

Out of serious concern for the sacramental seal (c. 983) and for the internal forum, even non-sacramental, those who direct the spiritual life of students and those who hear student confessions are not allowed a voice in the faculty council's determination of students' advancement to orders or continuation in the seminary program. Only external forum material may be used in making such decisions (cc. 984, 985, and 1388).

The Eastern code enjoins similar requirements (CCEO 339, §2 and §3).[33]

Admission to the Seminary

Canon 241 — §1. A diocesan bishop is to admit to a major seminary only those who are judged qualified to dedicate themselves permanently to the sacred ministries; he is to consider their human, moral, spiritual, and intellectual qualities, their physical and psychic health, and their correct intention.

§2. Before they are accepted, they must submit documents of the reception of baptism and confirmation and any other things required by the prescripts of the program of priestly formation.

§3. If it concerns admitting those who were dismissed from another seminary or religious institute, testimony of the respective superior is also required, especially concerning the cause for their dismissal or departure.

The rector, with the assistance of a vocation director and an admissions board made up of faculty members or other competent persons, ordinarily is charged by the diocesan bishop, whose responsibility it is to carry out the work of admissions. This involves undertaking the interviews and evaluations that are necessary before making a decision to admit or not to admit an applicant.

In addition to the seven qualities listed in paragraph one, Optatam totius 6 mentions that careful inquiry is to be made into a candidate's freedom of choice and his capacity for undertaking and carrying out the obligations of pastoral ministry.[34]

In order to meet the requirements of this canon, the admissions board and the rector will need the help of spiritual directors for interviews, medical doctors and other professionals for examination of an applicant's health, and a psychological assessment to aid in judging his motivation, stability, and capacity (cc. 642 and 1051).[35] The human limitations of each one of these aids needs to be acknowledged so that no single one should serve as a primary basis for a decision. Rather, all of them together should be taken into consideration with due regard for canon 220's concern for respecting a person's right to a good reputation and to privacy.[36]

The Eastern code does not specify the qualities mentioned in this present canon but calls on the appropriate authority to obtain documentary evidence which attests to a candidate's possession of the "required abilities" (CCEO 342, §1 and §2).

Serious consideration also needs to be given to canons 1041 and 1042 which list irregularities and impediments that would prevent one from receiving orders. Today members of the Church are faced with a considerable amount of proselytizing by both Christian and non-Christian religious sects. Consequently, there can be a candidate for the seminary who has recently "returned to the Church" from one of these groups but had been baptized and to some degree brought up a Catholic. Perhaps canons 751 and 1041, §2, on committing the delict of heresy, apostasy, or schism, might apply in a specific case; but careful attention is to be given to canons 18 and 1321–1330, on the strict interpretation of penal laws and on penal imputability.

Similarly, in a society where drugs, casual sex, and abortions are easily accessible, a candidate could be irregular for the reception of orders because of an attempted suicide, or cooperation in a successful abortion, or the attempted marriage mentioned in c. 1041, §3, or any of the other irregularities or impediments listed in the code. Canon 1047 explains who can dispense from these.[37]

The Program for Priestly Formation 510 calls for caution to be the byword in the admission procedure and states that the benefit of the doubt should be given to the Church. "Notwithstanding the regrettable shortage of priests," Optatam totius 6 states, "due strictness should always be brought to bear on the choice and testing of students." Further, it directs that those candidates judged unsuitable for priestly ministry be guided with fatherly kindness to adopt another calling, suggesting that they zealously engage in the lay apostolate.

Besides the documents mentioned in paragraph two of this canon,[38] the Program for Priestly Formation 510–528 lists more extensive admission requirements such as evaluations and letters of recommendation from candidates' pastors and teachers, academic records, and standardized test scores (513). Some seminaries also require personally written essays in which the candidate provides a profile of his vision of priestly ministry and why he wishes to choose it.

[38] See CDWDS, "Scrutinies Regarding the Suitability of Candidates for Orders," Enclosure I, no. 2, November 28, 1997 (Protocol number 589/97). It states that a candidate's certificates of baptism and confirmation are to be kept in his personal file.

Today the seminary program must call as well for careful screening of an applicant who has obtained a declaration of nullity of his marriage (PPF 527).[39] Such a candidate's admission to a seminary does not depend on the previous approval of the Holy See but on the sponsoring ordinary. The Program for Priestly Formation 527 states, "While such application should be carefully weighed on a case-by-case basis, the presumption normally is against acceptance."[40]

Similar pastoral concerns are pertinent regarding widowed candidates seeking admission to a major seminary. In judging whether or not to admit a candidate, one needs to keep in mind that the seminary is the place for testing and fostering vocations at their start, so the signs of a vocation need not be in full bloom but only need to have the potential to sprout.[41]

Paragraph three requires further testimony from a superior of another seminary or religious institute relative to an applicant who has been dismissed or who departed from such an institution (see also CCEO 342, §3). This requirement is further underscored by the Program for Priestly Formation's statement that the proper authorities have a "serious obligation to consult all previous institutions about the past record of candidates" (525). This required consultation "must be done in every instance" (526).[42]

In the past, admittance of the above mentioned candidates required the approval of the Holy See. This requirement ceased with the entrance into force of the code, and a private letter from the Secretariat of State on June 6, 1983, indicated it did not seem opportune to reinstate it.[43]

Occasionally some carelessness could occur in this area, especially at a time when applicants for the priesthood are in such short supply, but it would be regrettable to neglect the above required consultation given both the strong language of the Program of Priestly Formation and the mandate of canon 242, §2.[44]

National Program of Priestly Formation

Canon 242 — §1. Each nation is to have a program of priestly formation which is to be established by the conference of bishops, attentive to the norms issued by the supreme authority of the Church, and which is to be approved by the Holy See. This program is to be adapted to new circumstances, also with the approval of the Holy See, and is to define the main principles of the instruction to be given in the seminary and general norms adapted to the pastoral needs of each region or province.

§2. All seminaries, both diocesan and interdiocesan, are to observe the norms of the program mentioned in §1.

Optatam totius 1 laid down basic principles for the renewal of priestly formation and mandated each nation and rite to develop its own program to be revised and reviewed by competent authority on a regular basis. In 1970 the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education's Ratio (since revised [39] A. McGrath expresses his concern for the need of a letter from the former spouse stating she has no objection. in 1985) provided the universal guidelines to assist the national conferences in developing their particular programs.

In the United States Interim Guidelines for Priestly Formation were prepared in 1968. These were succeeded by the first edition of the Program of Priestly Formation approved by the Holy See and the conference in 1971 (c. 455, §1). This program was revised in subsequent editions in 1976, 1981, and 1992. All the editions reflected the collaboration among the bishops of the United States, together with personnel involved in priestly formation programs and other experts. The 1992 edition was based on the older ecclesiastical documents in addition to 1986 and 1988 documents from the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education and a joint letter in 1990 from the same congregation and the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life.[45]

This followed an apostolic visitation of seminaries called for by Pope John Paul II and begun in 1983. Additional sources used in preparing the 1992 fourth edition included the 1983 revised Code of Canon Law, the new 1985 edition of the Ratio, and various documents from the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, the 1990 synod of bishops, and the subsequent apostolic exhortation of Pope John Paul II, Pastores dabo vobis.[46]

The Eastern code calls on the proper authorities within the territorial boundaries of their own church or, by mutual agreement, a whole region, nation, or other churches sui iuris, to set forth more precisely the common law for seminaries. The tradition of one's own church sui iuris is to be kept in mind and the same authorities can change the program when needed (CCEO 330, §1). No mention is made of the Holy See's approval.

Particular Seminary Rule

Canon 243 — In addition, each seminary is to have its own rule, approved by the diocesan bishop, or, if it is an interdiocesan seminary, by the bishops involved, which is to adapt the norms of the program of priestly formation to particular circumstances and especially to determine more precisely the points of discipline which pertain to the daily life of the students and the order of the entire seminary.

In an exercise of the principle of subsidiarity, the diocesan or interdiocesan seminary itself is to draw up its own rule for daily life reflecting local or regional pastoral needs. This rule is to be based on the values found in the particular program mentioned in the previous canon. Only the approval of the diocesan bishop or bishops (in the case of an interdiocesan seminary) is required.

As in any formational institute, discipline and right order are central to the good of the seminary and of its members. Recognizing these needs, the Eastern code states that moderators, officials, teachers, counselors, and students are to "participate in the concerns of the rector especially in the observance of discipline of the seminary" (CCEO 337). This broader involvement adds a more inclusive tone to the Eastern code's call for a seminary to have its own statutes as well as its own directory which is to put into effect the norms of the

Integration of Seminary Programs

Canon 244 — The spiritual formation and doctrinal instruction of the students in a seminary are to be arranged harmoniously and so organized that each student, according to his character, acquires the spirit of the gospel and a close relationship with Christ along with appropriate human maturity.

Inasmuch as through baptism the Christian faithful have been "made sharers in their own way in Christ's priestly, prophetic, and royal function" (c. 204, §1), and more so since "priests are commissioned in a unique way to continue Christ's mission as prophet, priest, and king" (PPF 33 and 48), it follows that preparing candidates to teach, to sanctify, and to lead is the object of the seminary formation process.

The importance of this formation and instruction is evident from the fact that before declaring a candidate worthy of the reception of orders, the rector, with the assistance of the faculty, must be able to testify that the candidate manifests evidence of a close relationship with Christ and a personal appropriation of the gospel as seen in his overall manner of living and praying. This presupposes an effort to coordinate the spiritual, intellectual, and pastoral aspects of seminary life, as the Program of Priestly Formation does. They are to be integrated so they may serve to lead each individual student to the human maturity required for the exercise of the threefold ministry demanded of a true shepherd of souls, the priest in the likeness of Christ (OT 4 and 12). E. Gilbert cites canon 1029 on the requisites for promotion to orders and describes it as "the heart of the law on candidates for orders."[47] That canon is linked very closely to this canon.

Spiritual Formation Program

Canon 245 — §1. Through their spiritual formation, students are to become equipped to exercise the pastoral ministry fruitfully and are to be formed in a missionary spirit; they are to learn that ministry always carried out in living faith and charity fosters their own sanctification. They also are to learn to cultivate those virtues which are valued highly in human relations so that they are able to achieve an appropriate integration between human and supernatural goods.

§2. Students are so to be formed that, imbued with love of the Church of Christ, they are bound by humble and filial charity to the Roman Pontiff, the successor of Peter, are attached to their own bishop as faithful co-workers, and work together with their brothers. Through common life in the seminary and through relationships of friendship and of association cultivated with others, they are to be prepared for fraternal union with the diocesan presbyterium whose partners they will be in the service of the Church.

Spiritual formation is given pride of place among the various aspects of seminary training, and this canon (together with canons 246 and 247) richly reflects the conciliar teachings and echoes the Ratio 44–58, especially 47, 49, and 51. It draws liberally on the council's concern for proper spiritual training and formation of those preparing for priestly service.[48]

Reiterating the universal call to holiness and to mission, the first paragraph emphasizes the importance of guiding candidates to appreciate that the way for them to holiness is by faithfully carrying out the duties that characterize their ministerial calling and define their mission. Canon 276, [48] See Schuth, 139. In this nationwide study of theologates, the author found that almost every person interviewed stressed the centrality and importance of the personal and spiritual formation of students. See OT 8–12 and PO passim, especially 3, 8, and 9; C. Merces de Melo, "Priests and Priestly Formation in the 'Code of Canon Law,'" Stud Can 27 (1993) 463–464.

§2, 1° lists this fidelity to duty as the first step in the priest's pursuit of perfection.[49]

As for "those virtues which are valued highly in human relations," Optatam totius 11 describes them as "sincerity, a constant love of justice, fidelity to one's promises, courtesy in deed, modesty and charity in speech." Presbyterorum ordinis 3 provides a similar list, adding Paul's call to the faithful at Philippi to imitate him.[50]

The goals of paragraph two are further stressed in Presbyterorum ordinis 7 and 8 on priestly relations with bishops and the bond of priestly brotherhood. Presbyterorum ordinis 9 speaks of relations with the laity.[51] Canon 273 on the obligation of clerics to show reverence and obedience to the Supreme Pontiff and their own ordinary supports this canon. The "fraternal union with the diocesan presbyterium," spoken of here, "is also a constitutive factor of [the diocesan priesthood's] identity, mission, and spirituality" (PPF 53).

Spiritual Exercises in the Seminary

Canon 246 — §1. The eucharistic celebration is to be the center of the entire life of a seminary in such a way that, sharing in the very love of Christ, the students daily draw strength of spirit for apostolic work and for their spiritual life especially from this richest of sources.

§2. They are to be formed in the celebration of the liturgy of the hours by which the ministers of God pray to God in the name of the Church for all the people entrusted to them, and indeed, for the whole world.

§3. The veneration of the Blessed Virgin Mary, including the marian rosary, mental prayer, and other exercises of piety are to be fostered; through these, students are to acquire a spirit of prayer and gain strength in their vocation.

§4. Students are to become accustomed to approach the sacrament of penance frequently; it is also recommended that each have a director of his spiritual life whom he has freely chosen and to whom he can confidently open his conscience.

§5. Each year students are to make a spiritual retreat.

This canon spells out the initial steps essential to growth in a candidate's vocation and the means to support its exercise throughout life. As in paragraph one here, the Program of Priestly Formation also calls for the daily celebration of the Eucharist as part of every seminary and theologate program.[52]

The Program of Priestly Formation is more specific than paragraph two of this canon. It calls for the celebration of the liturgy of the hours, especially morning and evening prayer, on a daily basis for all programs.[53] Students are to be formed for the future official ministry of praying "to God in the name of the Church for all the people entrusted to them, and indeed, for the whole world."[54]

The norms in paragraph three on acquiring a spirit of prayer and on strengthening one's vocation are reiterated in the Program of Priestly Formation for every level of seminary and theologate life[55] as are those of paragraphs four and five on the sacrament of penance and a yearly retreat.[56]

Later in the code, in the section on the obligations of clerics, canon 276 repeats much of this canon highlighting the means to be used by the cleric in the pursuit of perfection, in addition to the faithful carrying out of the duties of his pastoral ministry.[57]

The Eastern code details the many diverse sources of power for the spiritual life and strength for apostolic labors (CCEO 346). This canon is a treasure trove of riches directed much more to the person of the seminarian than to the seminary's canonical structure. While our present canon rightly centers on the celebration of the Eucharist as the core of the entire life of the seminary, the Eastern code begins with a call for formation in the Holy Spirit, "as a familiar companion," that students might "dwell with Christ and . . . seek God in all things." The Divine Liturgy is "the font and culmination of seminary life as it is of the whole Christian life," and assiduous participation in it is exhorted.

Celibacy

Canon 247 — §1. Students are to be prepared through suitable education to observe the state of celibacy and are to learn to honor it as a special gift of God.

§2. They are duly to be informed of the duties and burdens which are proper to sacred ministers of the Church; no difficulty of the priestly life is to be omitted.

This canon speaks of the commitment to and observance of the obligation of priestly celibacy. It stresses the need for proper preparation of the seminarian during his formation stage and is complemented by canon 277 on the obligation of a cleric to observe celibacy. Seminary education and formation in preparing a candidate to cooperate with this special gift of God must address human, Christian, and priestly maturity, all of which must build on emotional and sexual maturity. After careful seminary training the candidate for holy orders ought to be ready gratefully to "embrace this state, not only as a precept of ecclesiastical law, but as a precious gift of God" (OT 10).[58]

In a general way, paragraph two reminds the seminary rector, spiritual director, and faculty of their duty to inform and prepare candidates for all the challenges the priest will confront, no matter how difficult. The Catholic Church is a visible, often provocative, countercultural sign, and the individual who chooses the priestly state is considered to be an anomaly by those whose values and lifestyles are in opposition to what appears to many to be the prevailing culture. Sadly, as a result of a small percentage of priests who have fallen from grace and the wide notoriety given to sexual sins and crimes, priests in some areas may be looked upon suspiciously and so not be as welcome as they may have been in the past. Moreover, the shortage of priests means that the smaller number are expected to do much which each student has in regard to spiritual direction. For an explanation of the role and function of a "director of his spiritual life," see Bartchak, 298–309; also Ratio 55 and 56 and related canons 239, §2 above and 276, §2, 5°, 528, §2, 664, 719, §3, and 991.

[57] E. Pfnausch in The Relationship Between Ministry and Holiness in the Life of the Diocesan Priest, CanLawStud 543 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1994) reports that in c. 276, §2, 1° the code identified this ministry of the priest as the primary means of fulfilling his obligation to pursue holiness.

[58] OT 10 does acknowledge the dignity of Christian marriage which the cleric chooses to renounce for the sake of the kingdom of heaven and a "greater measure of the blessedness promised by the Gospel." This same OT 10 along with PO 16 serve as conciliar bases for the many documents that address the matter of priestly celibacy. Among them are Paul VI, ency Sacerdotalis caelibatus, AAS 59 (1967) 657–697 and TPS 12 (1967) 291–319; SCCE, A Guide to Formation in Priestly Celibacy, April 11, 1974, Norms I, 155–205; Bishops' Committee on Priestly Life and Ministry, A Reflection Guide on Human Sexuality and the Ordained Priesthood (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1983); NCCB, Statement on Celibacy, November 14, 1969 (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1969); Third General Synod of Bishops, The Ministerial Priesthood (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1972); CFC, Directory, 57–60; Ratio 48; PDV 50.

more. The resulting stresses on pastoral ministry can lead to physical and emotional problems. Also, the priest in the United States will increasingly find himself alone in his residence. Such loneliness is a very real test that needs to be addressed to prevent it from leading to unhealthy and painful depression.[59]

The Eastern code calls for candidates for ordination "to be properly taught the obligations of clerics and led to undertake and fulfill them magnanimously" (CCEO 355). Canons 373 and 374 of the Eastern code address celibacy.

Academic Program

Canon 248 — The doctrinal instruction given is to be directed so that students acquire an extensive and solid learning in the sacred disciplines along with a general culture appropriate to the necessities of place and time, in such way that, grounded in their own faith and nourished thereby, they are able to announce in a suitable way the teaching of the gospel to the people of their own time in a manner adapted to their understanding.

In accord with Ratio 59–81, this canon, together with canons 249–254 and the similar canon in the Eastern code (CCEO 347), is concerned with doctrinal instruction. The very nature of ordained ministry and "the challenge of the 'new evangelization' to which our Lord is calling the church on the threshold of the third millennium" (PDV 51) underscore the importance of intellectual formation. The Program of Priestly Formation 335 describes the goal of this formation as "conversion of mind and heart, which is the only sure foundation for a lifetime of teaching and preaching." In educating candidates for the priesthood it is important also that the seminary take into account the nature of the times as well as the pastoral and cultural needs of the region to be served by the priest in teaching and proclaiming the gospel. On this matter of preaching, canon 769 provides an exhortation similar to what is presented above.[60]

Language Programs

Canon 249 — The program of priestly formation is to provide that students not only are carefully taught their native language but also understand Latin well and have a suitable understanding of those foreign languages which seem necessary or useful for their formation or for the exercise of pastoral ministry.

Several letters and constitutions from the popes and the Holy See have addressed the concerns expressed in this canon.[61] The same demands are made for both high school and college seminary programs in Optatam totius 13, which speaks as well of the necessity of studying the liturgical language of one's own rite and encourages knowledge of the languages of holy scripture and tradition. The Program of Priestly Formation 119 and 178 further recommends in high school seminaries the study of Greek and at all levels the Spanish language and Hispanic culture, as well as other pastorally appropriate languages and cultures. In recent years many seminaries have made available programs of "English as a Second Language" for the various new immigrants to the United States.[62]

Among the linguistic needs seminary authorities must address is the already serious language gap that results from the fact that seminarians today generally have grown up in communities where the vernacular is used extensively and practically exclusively in liturgical celebrations. Latin is no longer heard in the local church and, moreover, is rarely a required course in public or parochial schools. Consequently, the understanding and use of the Latin language have declined dramatically, where they have not disappeared altogether. Candidates come to seminaries today with little or, more often, no background or experience in the Latin language. This is frequently accompanied by lack of a desire to learn it. There are, of course, exceptions and they do take on the challenge.[63]

More to the point, however, this canon once again requires that all candidates for the priesthood understand Latin and that provision be made for such studies in an episcopal conference's program of priestly formation. Articles 119 and 178 of the Program of Priestly Formation comply with this canon.

Time Requirements for Education for the Priesthood

Canon 250 — The philosophical and theological studies which are organized in the seminary itself can be pursued either successively or conjointly, in accord with the program of priestly formation. These studies are to encompass at least six full years in such a way that the time dedicated to philosophical disciplines equals two full years and to theological studies four full years.

The time requirement for proper formation is specified here, and the same is found in the Eastern code with the directive that in the philosophical-theological courses the relationship be shown "between all the disciplines and their coherent arrangement" (CCEO 348). The requirements of this canon cannot be abbreviated except with the explicit permission of the Congregation for Catholic Education (PPF 263 and PB 112–113).

Besides this canon's time requirements for studies of philosophy and theology,[64] a new pre-theology program called for by the Holy Father and the 1990 synod of bishops is in effect in most seminaries. Recognizing the fact that many candidates today enter a seminary later in life with more professional but less church experience, the pre-theology program is structured for college graduates with no or insufficient credits in philosophy as well as those judged in need of basic spiritual and human formation before studying theology.[65]

The Study of Philosophy

Canon 251 — Philosophical instruction must be grounded in the perennially valid philosophical heritage and also take into account philosophical investigation over the course of time. It is to be taught in such a way that it perfects the human development of the students, sharpens their minds, and makes them better able to pursue theological studies.

This canon is taken from Optatam totius 15 which provides directions on fostering the students' human and intellectual growth and, among other things, stimulating them, "to perceive the connection between philosophical arguments and the mysteries of salvation which theology considers in the higher light of faith."[66] Also taken from Optatam totius are the words "the perennially valid philosophical heritage," which are found in Pius XII's encyclical Humani generis. They refer to the patrimony found in the Church's traditional philosophical cornerstones, the principles of St. Thomas Aquinas who is cited by name in the next canon.[67] Appropriate examination is to be made also of contemporary philosophical investigations as well as those of past eras.

The Eastern code has a similar norm but with the added goal of philosophical formation making students "more suitable for carrying out the ministry by a dialogue with the learned people of this age" (CCEO 349).

The Study of Theology

Canon 252 — §1. Theological instruction is to be imparted in the light of faith and under the leadership of the magisterium in such a way that the students understand the entire Catholic doctrine grounded in divine revelation, gain nourishment for their own spiritual life, and are able properly to announce and safeguard it in the exercise of the ministry.

§2. Students are to be instructed in sacred scripture with special diligence in such a way that they acquire a comprehensive view of the whole of sacred scripture.

§3. There are to be classes in dogmatic theology, always grounded in the written word of God together with sacred tradition; through these, students are to learn to penetrate more intimately the mysteries of salvation, especially with St. Thomas as a teacher. There are also to be classes in moral and pastoral theology, canon law, liturgy, ecclesiastical history, and other auxiliary and special disciplines, according to the norm of the prescripts of the program of priestly formation.

This canon is drawn from Optatam totius 16, which provides a more detailed ordering of the wide scope of subjects to be treated in the theological formation of future priests. For the United States, the Program for Priestly Formation 364–396 lays down the norms to be followed in establishing a seminary's curriculum for the intellectual formation of its candidates. These adhere closely to the canon's concerns for a proper and adequate theological formation, guided by the magisterium with a special emphasis on sacred scripture and the teachings of St. Thomas and the requirement in paragraph three that provision be made for various other subjects and disciplines.[68]

The Eastern code speaks of teaching the theological disciplines without enumerating them by name and, along with the Latin canon, stresses sacred scripture, calling it "the soul of all theology" influencing all the sacred disciplines. The canon also highlights the teaching of both liturgy and ecumenism (CCEO 350).

As St. Thomas finds his way into our present canon, the Eastern code calls on teachers of sacred sciences to follow in the footsteps of the "holy fathers and doctors highly praised by the church, especially of the East," and to draw from the eminent doctrinal treasury handed down by them (CCEO 340, §3).

Seminary Professors

Canon 253 — §1. The bishop or bishops concerned are to appoint to the function of teacher in philosophical, theological, and juridic disciplines only those who are outstanding in virtue and have obtained a doctorate or licentiate from a university or faculty recognized by the Holy See.

§2. Care is to be taken that different teachers are appointed to teach sacred scripture, dogmatic theology, moral theology, liturgy, philosophy, canon law, ecclesiastical history, and other disciplines which must be taught according to their proper methodology.

§3. The authority mentioned in §1 is to remove a teacher who is gravely deficient in his or her function.

The concerns of Optatam totius 5 and 18 for competent educators "chosen from among the best" are reflected in this canon. The bishop or bishops are to appoint an able faculty, each member with appropriate academic credentials in his or her own field, together with evident virtue, and evaluate them (PPF 497) in their carrying out of their responsibilities. Seven distinct fields are mentioned in paragraph two with reference to other appropriate disciplines that need to be taught "according to their proper methodology." The specific requirement that these individuals hold a canonical degree from a university or faculty recognized by the Holy See (see cc. 815–821) is reiterated in the Program of Priestly Formation 486 as a condition of service.[69]

If a teacher proves to be gravely deficient, he or she is to be removed, mindful of the protection of rights provided for in canon 221. Each seminary's faculty manual should be more precise regarding this rather general charge. A teacher who is dismissed and considers himself or herself to be aggrieved may have recourse against such an action.[70]

The Eastern code speaks of teachers' qualifications only in terms of "suitable academic degrees." However, it encourages cooperation among all teachers and moderators to bring about unity of faith and formation among all their various disciplines (CCEO 340). Fidelity to doctrine and humble submission to the magisterium and supervision of the Church are required of teachers since they have been given a mandate to teach by ecclesiastical authority (CCEO 351).

Sapientia christiana 27.1 and the Program of Priestly Formation 485 require as well that a canonical mission be given by the appropriate authority following the professor's profession of faith and oath of fidelity.[71]

Integration of Academic Work and Teaching Methods

Canon 254 — §1. In giving instruction in their disciplines, teachers are to have a constant concern for the intimate unity and harmony of the entire doctrine of the faith so that students find that they learn one science. For this to be realized more suitably, there is to be someone in the seminary who directs the entire curriculum of studies.

§2. Students are to be instructed in such a way that they also become qualified to examine questions by their own appropriate research and with scientific methodology; therefore, there are to be assignments in which the students learn to pursue certain studies through their own efforts under the direction of the teachers.

The integration of academic work is one of the concerns of Optatam totius 5 in its call to the seminary faculty to "cultivate the closest harmony of spirit and action." A similar theme is found in this canon.[72]

[69] Ratio 34 speaks of the equivalent to the degree mentioned above. SCCE, Norms of Application for the Correct Implementation of the Apostolic Constitution Sapientia Christiana 17 makes allowance for a teacher with a doctorate that is not a canonical degree as long as he/she has "at least a canonical licentiate." On the canonical degree see Norms I, 248, art. 7 and 250, art. 17. See also CCE, Directives Concerning the Preparation of Seminary Educators (Rome: Vatican, 1993) 6–16. It acknowledges the scarcity of educators and offers initiatives toward pedagogical renewal to strengthen the life of seminaries.

In order to achieve this goal, seminaries ordinarily have an officer who is known as the academic dean or called by some other title. In cooperation with the rector, this dean is to direct the faculty's concerns for unity and harmony of doctrine and the formation of the curriculum into a unified, internally coherent whole as called for in this canon.[73]

Optatam totius 17 further calls for a revision of teaching methods so that doctrinal training is not merely a communicating of ideas. As this canon indicates, students, under the guidance of their teachers, need to be enabled to be more self-reliant in pursuing their studies and research.[74]

There is a related canon in the Eastern code (CCEO 340, §2).

Pastoral Program

Canon 255 — Although the entire formation of students in the seminary has a pastoral purpose, strictly pastoral instruction is to be organized through which students learn the principles and skills which, attentive also to the needs of place and time, pertain to the exercise of the ministry of teaching, sanctifying, and governing the people of God.

This canon, together with canons 256–258, addresses the specific principles and skills related to pastoral ministry that are to be learned by seminarians. Optatam totius 19 speaks of "the pastoral preoccupation which should characterize every feature of the students' training" and lists papal documents on the life, qualities, and training of priests. To this list today can be added the writings of Pope John Paul II, most especially the much studied Pastores dabo vobis.[75]

In the wake of the Second Vatican Council and its emphasis on pastoral formation of seminarians, a significant recent development is the whole new life taken on by this kind of training. An entire industry has grown up in what now is generally referred to as field education. It has become an integral part of the seminary curriculum and is accredited as such.[76]

Field education has been approached in varied ways by different seminaries. Some require a pastoral year apart from the institutional seminary setting, which period of time may be separate from or included in the six-year requirement. Others require parish internship for some months preceding and/or following ordination to the diaconate. Still others require a certain number of pastoral work hours each week in supervised programs throughout the theologate.[77]

The Eastern code adapts the Latin code's canon on pastoral formation to its own students, whether celibate or married (CCEO 352, §1).

Instruction in Matters Pertaining to the Sacred Ministry

Canon 256 — §1. Students are to be instructed diligently in those things which in a particular manner pertain to the sacred ministry, especially in catechetical and homiletic skills, in divine worship and particularly the celebration of the sacraments, in relationships with people, even non-Catholics or non-believers, in the administration of a parish, and in the fulfillment of other functions.

[77] PPF 190 encourages seminarians to see the relationship of this apostolic service to prayer, community life, spiritual formation, and the seminary's academic program. See also the norms in PPF 180–190, 242–244, 397–440.

§2. Students are to be instructed about the needs of the universal Church in such a way that they have solicitude for the promotion of vocations and for missionary, ecumenical, and other more urgent questions, including social ones.

Optatam totius 19 lists various matters in which seminarians are to be instructed, and this canon draws on it, capturing the vast "job" description of the priest who in an appropriate manner must develop competencies that enable him to be, insofar as possible, "all things to all people in order to save at least some of them" (1 Cor 9:22).[78]

Vatican II's concerns that all should generously foster vocational choices which will assist the whole Church in carrying out her essential missionary labors and that all should cooperate in the ecumenical movement's work of restoring unity among the followers of Christ find mention in this canon and in the following one on instructing students preparing for the priesthood.[79]

Other urgent issues, including the many demands of justice and peace in our country and in our world and the need for a distinctly Christian witness in response, are to be addressed. The social doctrine of the Church is a valuable source for such instruction.[80]

The particular needs of a region where priests are to serve in the name of the Church may well suggest other areas in which specialized training needs to be provided and pastoral skills need to be developed.[81]

The Eastern code also mentions the above areas in addition to instruction in the instruments of social communication, psychology, and pastoral sociology (CCEO 352, §2 and §3). The Program for Priestly Formation 163 includes these in the section on intellectual formation in a college seminary or related program.

[81] Paragraph one of this canon together with Ratio 94 strike a practical note in calling for training in parish administration, an area most seminaries have not been addressing, often due to "course overload."

The Missionary and Evangelizing Spirit

Canon 257 — §1. The instruction of students is to provide that they have solicitude not only for the particular church in whose service they are to be incardinated but also for the universal Church, and that they show themselves prepared to devote themselves to particular churches which are in grave need.

§2. The diocesan bishop is to take care that clerics intending to move from their own particular church to a particular church of another region are suitably prepared to exercise the sacred ministry there, that is, that they learn the language of the region and understand its institutions, social conditions, usages, and customs.

Students for the priesthood are to be provided with an awareness, education, and appreciation of both the particular and the universal Church. They must manifest a care and concern for the "universal mission of salvation 'to the ends of the earth'" (Acts 1:8; PO 10) and a consequent willingness to serve where the priest is most needed.[82]

Canon 271 also addresses the needs of a particular region laboring under a grave lack of clergy and the obligation of a diocesan bishop in circumstances where one of his priests, "prepared in spirit to preach the Gospel everywhere" (OT 20), seeks permission to move to such a region. This is in response to Vatican II's emphasis on the universal dimension of the priesthood and its solicitude for a proper distribution of priests. The council called for the rules about incardination and excardination to be revised in order to answer more effectively the pastoral needs of today (PO 10).

[82] See OT 20; LG 17; Ratio 96; SCC, Directive Norms for Cooperation among Local Churches and for a Better Distribution of the Clergy, March 25, 1980, AAS 72 (1980) 343–364, esp. 360–363; CLD 9, 760–787, esp. 782–786.

Paragraph two of canon 257 logically follows paragraph one and faithfully reflects various conciliar and postconciliar documents, e.g., Presbyterorum ordinis 10; Christus Dominus 6; Ad gentes 25; Ecclesiae sanctae I, 1–3.[83]

Field Education Programs

Canon 258 — In order that students also learn the art of exercising the apostolate in practice, during the course of studies and especially during times of vacation they are to be initiated into pastoral practice by means of appropriate activities, determined by judgment of the ordinary, adapted to the age of the students and the conditions of the places, and always under the direction of a skilled priest.

A major component in the seminary's course of studies is the pastoral implementation of what is being learned by the students. As mentioned above under canon 255, given the conciliar emphasis on pastoral concerns, there has been a significant concentration on pastoral field experiences. The responsibility for directing these activities falls to the post-Vatican II programs of field education, through which seminaries attempt to respond to this canon and canon 255. Candidates at all levels are to experience supervised pastoral practice in sites outside of the seminary.[84]

The reference to vacations as times for initiation into pastoral practice is echoed in Ratio 97–99. Summer months often are utilized as opportunities for experiential learning on the part of seminarians, under priestly supervision, as called for by this canon. Ratio 99 further allows for other experts to supervise where necessary or appropriate.[85]

In a similar fashion, the Eastern code calls for strengthening pastoral formation with particular emphasis on a pastoral internship during the period of philosophical-theological formation and a diaconal internship before ordination to the priesthood (CCEO 353).

Administration of the Seminary

Canon 259 — §1. The diocesan bishop or, for an interdiocesan seminary, the bishops involved are competent to decide those things which pertain to the above-mentioned governance and administration of the seminary.

§2. The diocesan bishop or, for an interdiocesan seminary, the bishops involved are to visit the seminary frequently, to watch over the formation of their own students as well as the philosophical and theological instruction taught in the seminary, and to keep themselves informed about the vocation, character, piety, and progress of the students, especially with a view to the conferral of sacred ordination.

The bishop (or, in the case of a regional or interdiocesan seminary, the group of all the bishops concerned) remains central in the making of decisions for his (or their) seminary. The bishop's primary role in this regard has been a tradition that dates back to the Council of Trent.[86]

Over the past century, however, the Holy See more and more has taken on the direction of the diocesan seminary. In 1983 a study of priestly formation mandated by the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education began with a visitation of all seminaries in the United States. In 1986 the congregation's prefect, Cardinal William Baum, wrote to the American bishops, expressing general satisfaction with their theologates and offering useful commendations and recommendations, especially the need for a clearer concept of the meaning of ordained priesthood.[87]

This canon's second paragraph spells out the responsibilities as well as the rights of those bishops mentioned in paragraph one. While the canon calls for "frequent" visitation, in practice this may be more an ideal than a reality since generally in the order of things it is the rector, or perhaps a vocation director or another delegate appointed by the bishop or bishops who will carry out these specific duties. This delegate must report back to those bishops relative to the students' formation and readiness in the light of the canonical requirements for ordination mandated in canons 1026–1039.

The Eastern code speaks of the same kind of vigilance on the part of the appropriate authority (CCEO 356, §2).

The Rector

Canon 260 — In carrying out their proper functions, all must obey the rector, to whom it belongs to care for the daily supervision of the seminary according to the norm of the program of priestly formation and of the rule of the seminary.

The canon is clear: faculty, students, and staff are to obey the rector who is charged with the daily administration of the seminary under the authority of the bishop and in accord with the Program of Priestly Formation and the local seminary rules.[88]

The Program of Priestly Formation 459–464 (and other places listed in the index under "Rector") provides greater detail about the role of the rector; and each seminary's specific rule is expected to do the same.[89] Ultimately, all are responsible to the bishop, who has the authority to hire or remove members of the teaching and administrative staffs (c. 253, §3).

Duties of the Rector, Director of Studies, and Teachers

Canon 261 — §1. The rector of a seminary and, under his authority, the moderators and teachers for their part are to take care that the students observe exactly the norms prescribed by the program of priestly formation and by the rule of the seminary.

§2. The rector of a seminary and the director of studies are carefully to provide that the teachers properly perform their function according to the prescripts of the program of priestly formation and of the rule of the seminary.

The canon emphasizes the need for faithful observance by all of the norms of the Program of Priestly Formation and the rules of the local seminary. The rector, with the cooperation of the faculty and staff, is charged with the responsibility of seeing to this observance on the part of the students.

The rector is further charged, with the help of the dean of studies (c. 254, §1), to supervise the carrying out of duties by the faculty in accord with the prescribed norms and rules. Seminaries ought to have a faculty manual which, among other purposes, provides for evaluation of individual faculty performance by the rector, the academic dean, perhaps some other faculty members, and some representative students. All of these evaluations are to be shared with the faculty member for his or her own consideration and benefit.

Exemption from Parochial Jurisdiction

Canon 262 — A seminary is to be exempt from parochial governance. The rector of the seminary or his delegate fulfills the office of pastor for all those who are in the seminary, except for matrimonial matters and without prejudice to the prescript of can. 985.

"All those who are in the seminary" may be served by the rector, who for them holds the office of pastor. P. Golden observes that this exemption is a territorial one, since the seminary property is exempt from the parochial governance of the territorial pastor. The canon applies equally to those who live in the seminary and those who remain in the seminary for only a portion of the day as staff employees usually do.[90]

Canon 985, which is mentioned here, prohibits the rector from hearing a student's confession unless the latter freely asks in a particular case. The present canon also excepts those matrimonial matters addressed in canons 1063–1072 on preparation for marriage and canons 1108–1123 on required formal assistance at marriage. These remain under the jurisdiction of the territorial pastor. Otherwise, by virtue of this canon, the rector has the power to hear the confessions of others, the right and duty to administer the sacrament of the anointing of the sick and Viaticum, to celebrate funerals, and to dispense from the laws of fast and abstinence, the obligation of observing a holy day (c. 1245), and an oath or a vow (cc. 1196 and 1203).[91]

Canon 336, §2 of the Eastern code is largely comparable to Latin canon 262.

Financial Support

Canon 263 — The diocesan bishop or, for an interdiocesan seminary, the bishops involved in a way determined by them through common counsel must take care that provision is made for the establishment and maintenance of the seminary, the support of the students, the remuneration of the teachers, and the other needs of the seminary.

The obligation to provide for the financing and maintenance of the seminary is to be carried out by the diocesan bishop or, for an interdiocesan seminary, by the bishops involved. In the case of an interdiocesan seminary, the contribution of each should not be based simply on the number of students from a specific diocese but rather on the actual financial resources available to each diocese.[92]

Seminary Tax

Canon 264 — §1. In addition to the offering mentioned in can. 1266, a bishop can impose a tax in the diocese to provide for the needs of the seminary.

§2. All ecclesiastical juridic persons, even private ones, which have a seat in the diocese are subject to the tax for the seminary unless they are sustained by alms alone or in fact have a college of students or teachers to promote the common good of the Church. A tax of this type must be general, in proportion to the revenues of those who are subject to it, and determined according to the needs of the seminary.

The bishop, after having consulted with both the finance council and the presbyteral council, can levy a general tax (c. 1263) on juridic persons (cc. 115–116) to raise money for the seminary. Such a tax must be moderate and in proportion to the income of the persons being taxed and the needs of the seminary.

[92] Comm 14 (1982) 60 at c. 116a. For more on finances see Schuth, 73–82.

Excepted are those supported solely by alms (a contemplative monastery) and those who operate a college for the common good (house of formation or of studies run by a religious community).[93]

Canon 1266 allows the bishop to order the taking up of special collections for specific projects, one of which could be the maintenance of the seminary. Usually a special weekend is set aside for this purpose.

The Eastern code addresses in a similar vein the matters found in canons 263–264 (CCEO 341).

CHAPTER II
THE ENROLLMENT, OR INCARDINATION, OF CLERICS
[cc. 265–272]

Incardination is the canonical institution of permanent attachment of bishops, priests, and deacons to a particular church or other ecclesiastical entity for the primary purpose of the service of the people of God. The root of the word "incardination," cardo, "hinge," provides a general understanding of the canonical implications. Clerics are linked to the church as a door is attached to a wall; the life of the Church hinges, through incardination, on the service of the ordained ministers who provide the fullness of the sacramental life to the people of God. All clerics are ordained for service; they serve in collaboration with one another, under the direction and authority of ecclesiastical leadership, and always in a bond of service of a particular group of the people of God.[1] Book II, part one, title III, chapter 2 presents the current legislation on incardination: its necessity for all clerics beginning at diaconate, the entities to which clerics are attached, procedures and requirements for moving permanently or temporarily to another place or entity for service, and even an automatic method to change incardination.

The 1983 code uses the two terms adscriptio, enrollment, and incardinatio, incardination. The 1990 Eastern code only speaks of "enrollment."[2] The juridic effects are the same. It is first established at diaconate (c. 266) and is changed only with the procedures found in these canons.

Incardination was first articulated in universal church law in canons 111–117 of the 1917 code, but it has been an ancient principle in the history of the Church. Canons 265–272 contain the same basic principles of incardination as the former law, but are innovative in legislating the competent structures for incardinating clerics. This is in response to the teaching of Vatican II.[3] The conciliar sources and principles must be primary in interpreting the current canonical legislation on incardination. The council fathers explicitly insisted that the pastoral ministry of clerics be clearly seen as connected with service, and that this ministry is not only service of the local churches, but also service of the universal Church. Whereas the former law emphasized the disciplinary nature of incardination through the bishop's or superior's vigilance and control, Vatican II returned to the more basic pastoral sense of incardination for the purpose of service. As will be seen, the canons on excardination and temporary service to churches in need are expressions of these conciliar directives.[4] Postconciliar legislation implementing the wishes of the council fathers has been incorporated into the canons on incardination.[5] These canons have indeed provided processes to facilitate the service of priests and deacons in other parts of their countries or the world, and bishops and superiors have found that these processes work well. Although no new legislation has been promulgated since the 1983 code,[6] the Holy See remains concerned about the better distribution of priests throughout the world and continues not only to monitor the proportion of priests to people but to provide priests, bishops, and superiors with means of temporary or permanent service.

Necessity[7]

Canon 265 — Every cleric must be incardinated either in a particular church or personal prelature, or in an institute of consecrated life or society endowed with this faculty, in such a way that unattached or transient clerics are not allowed at all.

Canon 265 states the canonical principle that incardination is absolutely necessary for every cleric (bishop, priest, and deacon).[8] Since earliest times the Church has dealt with the problem of unattached clerics, called vagi, who roamed from church to church with no accountability to ecclesiastical authority, often causing scandal to the faithful.[9] Incardination combines the traditional understanding of ordination as a commitment to service as well as the Church's obligation to support those who serve it in ordained ministries.[10] No "contract" is required for those ordained to serve the Church. However, incardination fosters and protects the rights and obligations of church communities, priests and deacons, and church leaders. It is in this light that three purposes of incardination can be seen.[11]

First, the faith community has a right to the spiritual riches of the Church to be provided by stable ministers committed to serving a particular community. The law assures the presence of clerics, "public servants," who do not move about but who are bound to the community, live there, and get to know their people. Because only those necessary and useful for service are incardinated, the community is assured of properly equipped ministers who are able to serve them well (see c. 266, §1). The community also assumes responsibility to provide for those things to which the clergy are entitled from the Church, e.g., education, remuneration, benefits, etc.

Second, incardination guarantees the cleric permanent employment as long as he possesses the necessary qualities for service. With his dedication to ministry as an incardinated cleric, he is also assured a permanent source of sustenance (c. 281). Incardination, in theory, guarantees that his rights will be safeguarded (c. 384); these are rights based not only in universal law but also in particular law, e.g., personnel policies, formation, continuing education, etc.

Third, bishops and superiors have a right to depend on the assistance and cooperation of a stable group of priests and deacons who will not be absent for long periods of time and who will not abandon service for ambitious or inappropriate reasons.[12] Through incardination the clergy assume the obligations of ordained ministers (cc. 273–289), monitored by the appropriate vigilance of the competent authority. Incardination is an effective structure for providing accountability for the clergy; when corrective measures are taken, they cannot flee elsewhere.

Although there is no mention of the perpetual and absolute character of incardination as in canon 112 of the 1917 code, it is permanent and definitive, while allowing for the flexibility called for by the council.

Original Incardination[13]

Canon 266 — §1. Through the reception of the diaconate, a person becomes a cleric and is incardinated in the particular church or personal prelature for whose service he has been advanced.

§2. Through the reception of the diaconate, a perpetually professed religious or a definitively incorporated member of a clerical society of apostolic life is incardinated as a cleric in the same institute or society unless, in the case of societies, the constitutions establish otherwise.

§3. Through the reception of the diaconate, a member of a secular institute is incardinated in the particular church for whose service he has been advanced unless he is incardinated in the institute itself by virtue of a grant of the Apostolic See.

Diaconate is the "door" through which clerics are incardinated. Paul VI determined that a person becomes a cleric at diaconate.[14] Canon 266 states that original or first incardination occurs at diaconate for all clerics and gives examples for each type of cleric.

The law attempts to ensure that only fitting candidates who are necessary and useful for service are ordained; through incardination they are permanently committed to exercise ministry in the particular church. When first admitting candidates to the seminary, church authority must judge them capable of permanent dedication (c. 241). Before incardination, at ordination to the diaconate, there are several canonical requirements (cc. 1024–1039) which include proper formation, fitting age to assume the responsibilities of the clerical state, possession of necessary qualities, and proof of freedom. If the deacon candidate is married, his wife must give consent. Finally, the candidate must be judged useful for ministry (c. 1025, §2); he is accepted because there is a need for his ministry upon incardination. The candidate himself must be committed "perpetually" to serve the Church (c. 1036). He is free to be incardinated in the diocese of his domicile or to serve in another place of his choice where he intends to "devote himself" (c. 1016).

A secular cleric (diocesan priest or deacon) is incardinated into a particular church, usually a diocese but also its equivalent (i.e., territorial prelature, territorial abbacy, apostolic vicariate, apostolic prefecture, or apostolic administration erected on a stable basis [c. 368]). Although military ordinariates may incardinate clergy, the current practice of the Archdiocese for the Military Services of the United States is not to incardinate. A cleric can also be incardinated in a personal prelature (e.g., Opus Dei, c. 294).

Canon 266, §2 lists the so-called "religious orders" which can also incardinate, such as a clerical institute of consecrated life (cc. 588, §2; 589),[15] or a clerical society of apostolic life (c. 731), unless the constitution states otherwise. The major superior who is competent to incardinate is determined by the constitution and statutes of the institute or society. Although ordination incardinates a religious into the institute or society, this must be seen as an addition to the bond assumed through perpetual vows or definitive incorporation into the institute or society. Through incardination religious become enrolled or attached as clerics to the institute or society.

According to canon 266, §3, secular institutes as a rule do not incardinate unless the Apostolic See has granted an indult; clerics remain incardinated in the diocese and are subject to the diocesan bishop and other ordinaries (c. 715, §1).

[13] Cf. CCEO 358.

[14] Minor orders are now abrogated and the ministries of lector and acolyte are open to laymen. See Lynch, in CLSA Com, 192–193.

[15] A clerical institute of diocesan right remains under the authority of the diocesan bishop, who is the competent authority to issue dimissorial letters (c. 1019, §2).

Formal Process of Incardination[16]

Canon 267 — §1. For a cleric already incardinated to be incardinated validly in another particular church, he must obtain from the diocesan bishop a letter of excardination signed by the same bishop and a letter of incardination from the diocesan bishop of the particular church in which he desires to be incardinated signed by that bishop.

§2. Excardination thus granted does not take effect unless incardination in another particular church has been obtained.

Although incardination binds a cleric to one place, the law provides a means for him to move and to minister permanently elsewhere. The cleric may be incardinated in another particular church (c. 267, §1), or a secular cleric may become incardinated in an institute or society (c. 268, §2).

Canon 267, §1 explains the requirements for the validity of the formal process of incardination and excardination (also called "derived" incardination). The process is the same for priests and deacons[17] and simply consists of two activities: a letter to the cleric from the "sending bishop" (a quo bishop) granting excardination, and a letter to the cleric from the "receiving bishop" (ad quem bishop) granting incardination. The canon clearly states that these are simultaneous provisions—excardination takes effect only at the moment of incardination. The legislator has thus avoided the possibility that, for however short a time, the cleric is a vagus or an unattached, unincardinated ordained minister. The only exception seems to be the dismissed religious who has not found a benevolent bishop (c. 701).

Canon 267, §1 states the elements necessary for the validity of the excardination and incardination.[18] The sending and receiving diocesan bishops (c. 272) respond to the written request of the cleric. The letters of excardination and incardination are to be in writing.[19] The bishops write to the cleric himself; their letters are not from one bishop to another merely referring to the incardinating/excardinating cleric. The receiving bishop is not to issue a letter of incardination unless he has been assured by the sending bishop that a letter of excardination has been issued. This is usually done as part of the required testimonials from the sending bishop.[20] Both dioceses involved must be specifically mentioned in both letters. The letter is to be signed by the bishop himself for the validity of the juridic act; it must also be notarized by the chancellor or notary.[21] For the good ordering of the Church as well as common courtesy, the receiving bishop should duly notify the sending bishop that the letter of incardination has been issued to the cleric.[22]

Church administrators have been attempting to deal fairly with deacons who have moved from one area of the country to another, usually because of employment or retirement. On March 4, 1995, the Administrative Committee of the NCCB authorized the publication of the "Protocol for the Incardination/Excardination of Deacons."[23] It is meant to assist bishops in applying the canonical norms and does not constitute particular law. Its provisions should be followed insofar as they facilitate the deacon's process of moving from one diocese to another. The protocol envisions the eventual incardination of the deacon, rather than the canonical agreement as stated in canon 271. Briefly, the protocol suggests that the deacon, when he decides to move, write to both the sending bishop and the receiving bishop, notifying them of the move. He is to state his intention to visit the receiving bishop or his delegate after he arrives. The sending bishop transmits some initial materials to the receiving bishop. After a possible period of supervision and evaluation (a minimum of two years is suggested), the deacon may write to request incardination, thus activating the procedure of canon 267.[24] Although the protocol suggests that the receiving bishop issue a letter of incardination within one month of receiving a copy of the letter of excardination, he is free to accept or reject the petition. Likewise, a bishop who has not implemented the diaconate in his diocese is not bound to incardinate a deacon who has moved there.[25]

Automatic Incardination[26]

Canon 268 — §1. A cleric who has legitimately moved from his own particular church to another is incardinated in the latter particular church by the law itself after five years if he has made such a desire known in writing both to the diocesan bishop of the host church and to his own diocesan bishop and neither of them has expressed opposition in writing to him within four months of receiving the letter.

§2. Through perpetual or definitive admission into an institute of consecrated life or into a society of apostolic life, a cleric who is incardinated in the same institute or society according to the norm of can. 266, §2 is excardinated from his own particular church.

The 1983 code has three forms of automatic incardination; two are found in canon 268.[27] The canon is taken from postconciliar legislation that implemented the council's desire for a better distribution of clergy and more flexible structures for service.[28] The canon also reflects a private reply of the Apostolic Signatura of June 27, 1978, clarifying the conditions for what it called "tacit" or automatic incardination.[29] The provisions of the canon are designed to protect the rights of both the individual cleric and the bishop. The cleric is able to express his desires, receive a clear response within an appropriate period of time, and know with certainty the particular church to which he is bound. The bishop, who is free to respond as he wishes, need not accept the cleric at the time of the request. The bishop needs only to respond in writing within four months. If he follows the norms, he will not find himself suddenly saddled with a cleric he did not want.

Indefinite residence of clerics in dioceses other than their own for a long period of time harms the stable institute of incardination. A cleric should be bound to a particular church and serve there so that no semblance of acephalous or unincardinated clerics cause scandal to the Church.

There are four conditions for automatic incardination:

1. Five years of legitimate presence in the diocese.

The "clock" starts ticking once the cleric has resided legitimately in the diocese for five years. He does not need to be engaged in pastoral ministry or receive any assignment from the bishop, part-time or full-time. The cleric need not have been granted faculties. In fact, the host bishop might not even be aware that the cleric is residing in the diocese. He must merely spend five years

[24] There is no mention of ipso iure or automatic incardination as in c. 268, although it may apply.

[25] Not explicitly mentioned in the code are incardination and the creation of a new diocese. Incardination is usually determined for priests and deacons in the decree of erection (c. 373). Possible determinants could be their present assignment or the diocese of their domicile, or the issue may be left to the final determination of the bishops, who may even consult with the clergy.

[26] Cf. CCEO 360, §2.

[27] The third form deals with the religious cleric who has legitimately left or been dismissed from an institute of consecrated life or a society of apostolic life. See cc. 693; 701; 727, §2; and 743.

residing there (commoratio) with the consent (or presumed permission) of the two ordinaries. Should either ordinary prohibit residence for any reason, or if the cleric is absent from his diocese or institute against the wishes of his ordinary, the "clock" stops running.

2. Letter written to both ordinaries.

The cleric must express in writing his desire to be incardinated in the diocese where he has resided. Although the letter usually is written after the five years of residence, the cleric may have written to one or both bishops at an earlier time. Such a letter suffices to fulfill the second requirement. The letter must clearly indicate the cleric's desire for incardination.

3. Neither ordinary writes that he opposes the incardination.

The ordinary's mind must be manifest "clearly, certainly, and to be sure, in writing, and not in vague and, perhaps, ambiguous words." It is best that the bishop should respond immediately to the letter of intent, telling of his "mind": total refusal, or perhaps refusal to accept the request at this time but an openness to doing so later.[30] The response can even be conditional.[31] The law is clear: when either ordinary indicates his opposition in writing, the "clock" stops ticking.

4. After four months, no response.

Automatic incardination occurs by the law itself should neither ordinary indicate his opposition in writing after four months of receiving the cleric's letter.

Requirements for Lawful Incardination[32]

Canon 269 — A diocesan bishop is not to allow the incardination of a cleric unless:

1° the necessity or advantage of his own particular church demands it, and without prejudice to the prescripts of the law concerning the decent support of clerics;

2° he is certain from a legitimate document that excardination has been granted and, in addition, has appropriate testimonials from the excardinating diocesan bishop, under secrecy if necessary, concerning the life, behavior, and studies of the cleric;

3° the cleric has declared in writing to the same diocesan bishop that he wishes to be dedicated to the service of the new particular church according to the norm of law.

Canon 269 protects the rights of the faith community and the bishop, who is required to organize the pastoral life of the diocese, especially the administration of the sacraments.

The severe shortage of priests is never a reason to incardinate; the concern of the legislator is clearly "quality" and not "quantity" of clerics. The people of the diocese have a right to ordained ministers who have appropriate preparation, the ability to minister effectively, and the capability to be placed in an assignment which will be useful and necessary to the pastoral life of the diocese. On the other hand, the bishop has the right to rely on stable and competent ordained ministers who are committed to serve him in a spirit of collaboration and mature and responsible obedience. The canon also protects the rights of the cleric. Once incardinated in a perpetual bond of service, he is assured that he will be employed in ministry and receive a just remuneration; he can count on the community and the bishop to support him until he dies.[33]

Because of the difficulties that arise through the misconduct of clergy, bishops are cautious when incardinating a priest or deacon from another diocese or an institute. However, canon 269 provides a thorough checklist—much like the list of requirements necessary before ordination—that assists in ascertaining the suitability of one to be incardinated.[34] The NCCB has developed the "Protocol for the Incardination/Excardination of Deacons" (cited above), which assists in fulfilling the canonical requirements for a deacon's valid and lawful incardination.[35]

The canon lists three matters of concern and investigation, but these are not taxative. There is no chronological order given; it is left to the discretion of the bishop. The following six areas are important to note:

1. Necessity or usefulness (c. 269, 1°).

First, the bishop must judge if the cleric's ministry will benefit the diocese. The bishop can insist that the priest or deacon speak the language well and be familiar with the culture and customs of the people he will serve. This requirement is modified in light of a prospective ministry among the faithful of his own home country or language. The canon does not require that the incardinated cleric exercise a "general ministry"; his usefulness to the diocese is very often in a particular ministry among a specific group of the faithful. The judgment of "necessity or advantage" rests with the bishop himself, although he benefits from the advice of appropriate persons and consultative bodies regarding the possible offices or ministries available to the priest or deacon.

2. Due regard for decent support (c. 269, 1°).

The bishop cannot incardinate a man whom he cannot support (c. 281), even though the need for the cleric's ministry be very great. In such a case the priest or deacon should go to another diocese where he is needed and can also be supported. The canon again closely connects incardination with the right of the cleric to decent remuneration. Although not a requirement of the canon, the receiving bishop would do well to discuss with the sending bishop the details of financial concerns, e.g., reimbursement for educational expenses, retirement benefits, pension, etc.[36]

3. Document concerning excardination (c. 269, 2°).

The canon does not require that the bishop obtain a copy of the actual letter of excardination written to the cleric, nor does it require that the excardination be granted at a particular time. The letter of excardination, once written, does not have a date of expiration unless specified in the letter itself. However, some statement is necessary attesting to the bishop's grant of excardination. Again, the legislator's concern for vagi is evident; at no time should a cleric be without a stable place of service and accountability to legitimate authority for such service.

4. Documents concerning suitability (c. 269, 2°).

Of special concern and importance is clear evidence that the cleric is suitable for ministry and is of good character. Should "secrecy" be necessary, the canon ensures that the rights of the community and the bishop are respected while not compromising the cleric's right to privacy (c. 220). It is essential that open communication between the cleric and both bishops be maintained throughout the process. The canon offers three areas that attest to suitability—life, behavior, and studies.[37] Included in the investigation should be documentation concerning an evaluation of the cleric's ministry and testimony as to his good name, character, and clerical lifestyle. Appropriate transcripts and seminary documentation (called scrutinia) are to be among the materials sought during the investigation. It is permissible to ask the cleric to undergo a psychological evaluation in order to assist in the assessment of suitability. The cleric must agree to release the confidential information, and the names of those who have access to the information must be clearly stated. For example, a priest or deacon who has been accused of sexual misconduct has a right to be evaluated according to the canonical requirements.[38] The troublesome nature of his past should not immediately prevent another bishop from considering him for incardination. During the investigation the cleric must be cooperative and willing to release confidential materials concerning the accusation, psychological evaluation, and aftercare agreement. The receiving bishop is to make a prudent judgment, surely with consultation,[39] that the cleric's studies, life, and behavior are those of someone necessary and useful to his diocese.[40]

[35] The bishop retains the right to accept or reject the petition of the deacon for incardination.

[37] The canon does not mention the 1917 code's demand (CIC 117, 2°) for a background check on the cleric's family.

5. Testimony of dedication to service (c. 269, 3°).

Finally, the canon requires for the lawfulness of the incardination the declaration, in writing, of the cleric's intention permanently to serve the particular church of incardination.[41] This replaces the oath required by the 1917 code, yet the oath is still a legitimate way to fulfill the requirement of the canon. The canon does not demand that the cleric repeat the promise of obedience made at ordination; however, the receiving bishop becomes his proper ordinary when he is incardinated (c. 273).[42]

6. Other elements of the process.

There are other components of the process which are not explicitly included in the canon but which dioceses have found helpful in developing their policy of incardination. For example, many dioceses have instituted a probationary period before a man can begin the formal process for incardination. During that time (three to five years is the usual length)[43] the cleric can experience the atmosphere and life of the local church, and the community can observe in an informal way the ministry and style of the cleric. An initial probationary assignment or assignments can be given.[44] The diocese may screen the individual through the personnel director or the personnel board; this person or persons may handle the entire process and offer a final recommendation to the bishop. An evaluation by the pastor of the cleric's assignment during the probationary period may be helpful. Once the bishop receives the recommendation for incardination, the formal exchange of letters between the two bishops (i.e., excardination and incardination) can take place.

Many dioceses do not have a written incardination policy,[45] even though such a policy need only repeat the requirements of canons 267–269. A written statement is an effective means of expressing the diocese's expectations of those who wish to serve permanently. It outlines the procedure so that the rights and dignity of the priest can be respected during a time of anxiety as to the possible outcome of the process. The canonical requirements can be presented in a clear fashion while being adapted to the needs and experience of the individual diocese and the types of applications for incardination it receives.

[38] The mere fact of an accusation is not tantamount to proof of criminal imputability, which usually presupposes a formal process.

[39] An "incardination committee" is very helpful in these cases.

[40] A bishop is free to take what some would call the "risk" of incardinating a cleric who has been accused of misconduct; in making such a decision, the bishop would benefit from the critical advice of others, e.g., a review board of pastoral, canonical, legal, and psychological experts.

[41] The NCCB protocol for deacons does not explicitly require this. It is not contained in any of the sample letters.

[42] The canonical documents that make the incardination effective can be used to "celebrate" the incardination of the cleric and welcome him for service in the diocese. For example, the cleric may be invited to the meeting of a consultative body of priests or deacons (e.g., priests' personnel board, deacons' advisory council) where the bishop signs the letter of incardination and the cleric signs the required statement of his intention to dedicate himself to diocesan service.

[43] Jarrell, 315. For deacons, the NCCB protocol suggests a minimum of two years of probationary service.

[44] The NCCB protocol suggests that, soon after the arrival of the deacon in the new diocese, faculties and an assignment be given.

Requirements for Lawful Excardination[46]

Canon 270 — Excardination can be licitly granted only for just causes such as the advantage of the Church or the good of the cleric himself. It cannot be denied, however, except for evident, grave causes. A cleric who thinks he has been wronged and has found an accepting bishop, however, is permitted to make recourse against the decision.

Canon 270 complements the previous canon by stating the requisites for lawful excardination. The rights of the cleric to exercise his ministry for the good of another local church or for his own personal needs are protected, while the bishop is granted the right to make a prudential judgment about the request.[47] Canon 270 attempts to balance both sets of rights. However, the canon gives preference to the request of the cleric; the burden of proof to deny the request rests with the bishop. The legislation implements the renewed understanding of the mission of the priest who is, with the bishops, to be solicitous for the welfare of the universal Church (PO 10).[48] The sacrament of orders involves the universality of the priestly mission; the canon provides a certain flexibility in order to put into effect the teaching of the council.[49] There is a subtle shift in the attitude of the legislator: the needs of the wider Church and the personal good of the cleric himself normally take preference over the needs of the local church.

Excardination can be granted for "just causes" only. The canon does not give a taxative list of the just causes, but offers two examples.[50] First, the benefit of the Church may call for the excardination. For example, another diocese may have a serious lack of clergy. The canon does not specify which particular church benefits, only the benefit of "the Church." Thus, the excardination may be for the good of the sending diocese in terms of an expression of generosity to the needs of the universal Church. A just cause for the benefit of the particular church would not be merely to be rid of a troublesome priest. However, the receiving bishop may indeed judge such a priest necessary, useful, and suitable for incardination.

The 1983 code adds a new "just cause" to previous legislation on excardination: the personal good of the cleric himself. This includes all aspects of his well-being—spiritual, psychological, physical.[51] His talents may be better used in another place, or his ministry may have become ineffective or lifeless in his diocese of original incardination. Indeed, this is even a way of leaving behind the tension between himself and his own bishop. For deacons, the permanent transfer to another diocese for reasons of employment or retirement suffices as a just cause to petition for excardination.[52] Of course, personal ambition, avarice, selfish reasons, restlessness, or instability are not just causes for excardination.

While a just reason is required to grant excardination, the canon states explicitly that a serious

[46] Cf. CCEO 365.

[47] Jarrell suggests that it seems more and more bishops and superiors are refusing excardination while the CFC has frequently responded in favor of the priest in conflict situations. The competent authority "can never let the concern for the local church override the rights of the individual (c. 18)" (Jarrell, 320).

[48] CCEO 361 states that this permission is granted to the cleric "mostly for the evangelization of the whole Church."

[49] See also commentary on c. 271.

[50] One diocese's policy states that any one of four reasons will suffice for excardination: serious health problems, desire to be near close family members, desire to enter a religious congregation, desire to work where there is a dearth of clergy (Jarrell, 315–316, n. 6).

[51] See Bishops' Committee on Priestly Life and Ministry, The Health of American Catholic Priests (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1985) and The Priest and Stress (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1982). Although neither document deals explicitly with excardination or temporary service, the issues of health and stress must be taken into account when making a decision about excardination.

[52] The NCCB protocol presumes that the transferring deacon will make his petition to his sending bishop and receiving bishop, yet the deacon retains the right to remain incardinated in his home diocese as well as the right to petition to exercise ministry in the new diocese or not.

reason is necessary to deny it. In practice, the request of the cleric to move should usually be granted unless there are serious reasons in the particular church to reject it. The burden of proof for denial lies with the bishop; however, the canon clearly leaves the decision to him. In other words, the bishop determines the presence of just cause(s) for excardination as well as the serious reason(s) should it be denied. The bishop's decision can never be arbitrary but always is to be made after careful consideration of all the circumstances of the priest and his own diocese. A serious reason could be the more pressing pastoral needs of the original diocese. This needs to be sensitively balanced with the reasons presented in the request of the priest (c. 384).

Canon 270 recognizes, in practice, the right of the cleric to petition for excardination. The canon emphasizes this by including an explicit reference to his right to take recourse against the decision of the bishop; the canon reminds the priest that he can vindicate his right in appropriate fora. The cleric may bring the matter to the diocesan board of conciliation or arbitration, should it exist in the diocese and be competent in such cases.[53] The cleric is always free to have recourse to the Holy See. In this matter the competent dicastery is the Congregation for the Clergy. The petition for recourse should indicate the reasons why the cleric has asked for excardination and the reasons why it has been denied and include all documentation available; a letter from the receiving bishop should be part of the petition.[54]

Few dioceses have an excardination policy, although, like an incardination policy, such a policy assists in fostering a healthy openness regarding the expectations of the diocese and the individual priest or deacon. The legislation on excardination touches on issues concerning the nature of the priestly vocation, which may begin with a calling to exercise ministry in a particular church and change to a calling to serve the universal Church, e.g., service in the Roman Curia or at the level of the episcopal conference. As a result, bishops should not be hasty in denying clerics' requests and should weigh the impact that such denials have on the morale of the presbyterate.[55]

Temporary Service[56]

Canon 271 — §1. Apart from the case of true necessity of his own particular church, a diocesan bishop is not to deny permission to clerics, whom he knows are prepared and considers suitable and who request it, to move to regions laboring under a grave lack of clergy where they will exercise the sacred ministry. He is also to make provision that the rights and duties of these clerics are determined through a written agreement with the diocesan bishop of the place they request.

§2. A diocesan bishop can grant permission for his clerics to move to another particular church for a predetermined time, which can even be renewed several times. Nevertheless, this is to be done so that these clerics remain incardinated in their own particular church and, when they return to it, possess all the rights which they would have had if they had been dedicated to the sacred ministry there.

§3. For a just cause the diocesan bishop can recall a cleric who has moved legitimately to another particular church while remaining incardinated in his own church provided that the agreements entered into with the other bishop and natural equity are observed; the diocesan bishop of the other particular church, after having observed these same conditions and for a just cause, likewise can deny the same cleric permission for further residence in his territory.

[55] See Bishops' Committee on Priestly Life and Ministry, Reflections on the Morale of Priests (Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1989).

[56] The Eastern code parallels to canon 271 are organized differently: c. 271, §1, CCEO 360; c. 271, §2, CCEO 360, §1 and 362, §2; c. 271 §3, CCEO 362, §1.

Vatican II taught that bishops and priests share in solicitude for the good of the whole Church (LG 28), and expressed a deep concern for the just distribution of clergy throughout the world (PO 10). This preoccupation led to the postconciliar norms of Ecclesiae sanctae (I, 3, §2) for temporary service in another part of the world. In 1980 the Congregation for the Clergy issued "Directive Norms for Cooperation Among Local Churches and for a Better Distribution of the Clergy."[57] In 1991, John Paul II established the Interdicasterial Commission for a More Just Distribution of Priests, under the competence of the Congregation for Catholic Education.[58] This commission makes regular reports and sees itself "like an observatory" to detect where a greater presence of clergy is needed. The commission utilizes the services of the Internet in order to facilitate the contact of bishops open to the exchange of priests.[59]

Canon 271 was designed to implement the directives of the council and to meet the needs for the just distribution of clergy, still respecting the stability and permanence of incardination.[60] The canonical institute of temporary transfer, also called aggregation or migration, is found in this canon. The canon is carefully designed to safeguard the rights of the individual cleric who serves outside the diocese of incardination, as well as the rights of the bishops and dioceses involved.

Canon 271, §1 states the basic components of the law on the temporary transfer of a cleric: criteria for the decision, reasons to deny the permission, and the necessity of a written agreement with the receiving bishop. Each of these components needs to be examined separately.

The initiative for the move usually comes from the cleric himself who desires to serve where there is a scarcity of clergy.[61] Note that the canon calls for service in another diocese where the cleric will "exercise the sacred ministry," and not for other reasons, such as secular employment.[62] The cleric may have personal reasons for a request for excardination, such as his health, closeness to family, or even an extended sabbatical or time of renewal. The 1980 norms called for a "special vocation" to serve elsewhere (23), a suitable temperament, and natural gifts, including psychological qualities, constancy of soul, and sincere intent (24). The canon gives the bishop discretion to judge the suitability of the candidate who is "prepared"[63] and fit to serve outside the diocese, and the 1980 norms cautioned ordinaries to exercise great care in finding those who are able and qualified (24). Whereas excardination is granted for "just causes" (c. 270), the permission to transfer hinges on the presence of three factors: dearth of priests, preparedness, and suitability.

The concluding section of the 1980 norms called for the bishop to be solicitous for the good of the universal Church, and even to encourage clerics to serve temporarily elsewhere because of their special gifts and the needs of other churches.[64] As part of his solicitude for the universal Church, the bishop should consider ways in which clerics can serve the Church outside the diocese, e.g., military chaplaincy, service to the Apostolic See, bishops' conference, institutes of study, and interdiocesan seminaries and educational institutions.[65]

However, the reasons to grant the permission are balanced with the concrete needs of the particular church. Again, the bishop has the discretion to make this judgment. The permission may be denied for a case of "true necessity" of the particular church. The reasons for denial of temporary transfer would appear to be less grave than the serious causes needed for a denial of "permanent transfer" through excardination in the previous canon. As in canon 270, the burden of proof is placed on the bishop. However, there has been a shift in mentality in the 1983 code, one that favors the just distribution of clerics and extending help to other particular churches. The bishop, even in the face of the needs of his diocese, should be quite hesitant in denying the permission, for a time, for service outside the diocese where there is a need.[66] Should the cleric request this permission for personal reasons rather than the greater need of another diocese, the bishop has more discretion to deny the permission, since the canon allows him greater latitude to deny in terms of the greater needs of his own diocese. Although not stated in the canon, the receiving bishop presumably also has the right to reject the temporary service of a cleric and has no obligation to accept the services offered, no matter how needy the diocese might be.

As in the 1980 norms, the canon stipulates that an agreement be drawn up between the two bishops.[67] The purpose of the agreement is to safeguard the rights and obligations of all those concerned, while protecting the institute of incardination. The agreement does not presuppose an openness to incardination in the host diocese and should not be construed to imply such openness. The norms insist that, because it is "absolutely necessary" to define the rights and obligations of the cleric, the agreement is to be drawn up with the involvement of the priest himself and "must, in order that it have legal force, be accepted and signed by the priest" (25). Since the purpose of the agreement is to safeguard the rights and obligations of all parties, especially those of the cleric, it is important that all three parties sign the document, i.e., the cleric and the two bishops.

While the canon stipulates, in general terms, an agreement which makes provisions for "the rights and duties of these clerics," the 1980 norms are more complete and should be followed. The elements of the agreement are as follows (27): length of time of service, duties to be performed, place of ministry and residence, means of support and from whom, social security in case of illness, disability, and old age, and even provision for a time to visit home during the period of service. The agreement cannot be changed unless all parties agree.

The renewal of the agreement (c. 271, §2 states it can be renewed "several times") is based on the same criteria of its creation; the cleric's performance of the ministry should be evaluated as well.[68]

The Office for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Refugees (PCMR) of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops has drawn up the "Standardized Agreement for Use with Bishops' Conferences of Other Countries for the Exchange of Clergy."[69] Although the bishops requested this agreement to facilitate the temporary service of foreign clergy, few bishops seem to take advantage of the protocol, and most prefer to make their own arrangements.[70] The "Standardized

[69] The current revision is dated December 12, 1990. In September 1995 the PCMR was authorized by the NCCB Committee on Migration to simplify the agreement yet substantially repeat the provisions of the 1990 version. This latest version is being prepared for approval.

[70] The agreement is not particular law and does not bind the bishops.

Agreement" encompasses certain areas of concern for bishops, especially selection of personnel, immigration papers, determining terms of service, and providing necessary orientation both prior to clergy leaving their home countries and upon their arrival in the United States.[71]

Canon 271, §3 addresses the possible recall of the cleric. The sending bishop retains the right to recall the cleric at any time, always respecting the agreement that has been made and "natural equity." Any arbitrary decision is to be avoided by keeping to the terms of the agreement. However, the canon calls for a "just cause" and not a "serious" one. Normally the cleric is recalled when the time period of the agreement has expired. However, should an exception occur, any unfulfilled obligations should be met by the recalling bishop, who is also to be attentive to the particular situation of the cleric. Likewise, the receiving bishop may terminate the agreement and send the cleric home early; the "just cause" stipulated in the canon could be ineffective ministry, problems with adjustment, or personal difficulties.

Canon 271, §2 reviews the canonical status of the cleric temporarily serving outside the diocese and states that he remains incardinated in his home diocese. As in the 1980 norms, he retains all rights and privileges "as if [he] had been engaged in the sacred ministry there without interruption" (30). While the cleric is away, he is the object of the bishop's special solicitude and personal contact (28).[72]

One final note is in order concerning the transfer of deacons.[73] The canon does not provide for the situation of a deacon who moves to a diocese where there is no diaconate in place. The 1984 NCCB Guidelines on Deacons leave this to the discretion of the receiving bishop,[74] although the deacon's bishop of incardination may try to contact the new bishop and arrange for an assignment. For this reason many deacons choose to work or retire in a diocese where the diaconate is operative so that they can exercise their ministry.

Competent Authority[75]

Canon 272 — A diocesan administrator cannot grant excardination or incardination or even permission to move to another particular church unless the episcopal see has been vacant for a year and he has the consent of the college of consultors.

The canons on incardination are completed with legislation on the competent authority to grant incardination, excardination, and permission to serve outside the diocese. In light of the sacramental bond linking the diocesan bishop, major superior, priests, and deacons and the common care they exercise together for the people of God, it is clear that these three acts are important to the life of the community and the corps of ordained ministers who serve it. Only the diocesan bishop or major superior is competent to grant incardination or excardination or temporary transfer; a vicar general (c. 475) or episcopal vicar (c. 476) is not competent without a special mandate. Should the see be vacant, usually no major changes are permitted (c. 428, §1). The diocesan administrator (generally elected by the college of consultors or appointed by the metropolitan) can grant incardination only under two conditions: the see has been vacant for one year and the college of consultors (c. 502) has given its consent.

[71] The NCCB currently has agreements with other episcopal conferences, i.e., CELAM, Korea, Mexico, Philippines, and Poland. In cases of clergy from these areas, bishops are expected to contact the PCMR. Drafts of agreements have been drawn up with Brazil, Colombia, and Nigeria, while conversations are being held with Haiti and India.

[72] Such contact includes all mailings to clerics and invitations to clerical gatherings and retreats.

CHAPTER III THE OBLIGATIONS AND RIGHTS OF CLERICS [cc. 273–289]

In seventeen canons this chapter treats the obligations and rights of clerics. They are not simple recommendations but binding juridic norms that have validity for the whole Latin church.[1] At the beginning of Book II the code treats the obligations and rights of all the Christian faithful (cc. 208–223). It then takes up the obligations and rights of lay Christians (cc. 224–231) and now turns to the clergy.[2] The clergy and laity enjoy the same fundamental rights and are bound by the same basic obligations. The obligations and rights affirmed here (cc. 273–289) are proper to the clerical state, but must be interpreted in accordance with the obligations and rights of all believers.[3] Certain common rights, such as that of association, are repeated so that there can be no doubt that clerics are entitled to them.[4] Although in the title of the chapter the term "obligations" comes before that of "rights," there was no intention to assign any priority or precedence to one over the other.[5] The rights of the clergy are to be understood as just as important as their obligations.

The study group charged with formulating this section of the code originally considered seven rights, three of which were eventually incorporated in the code: the right of association, the right to a vacation, and the right to fitting and decent remuneration.[6] Of the sixteen obligations proposed, all but one, the obligation to foster vocations, found a place. The rights are interspersed among the obligations. The parallel chapter in the Eastern code is substantially identical, though it is spread over twenty-seven canons (CCEO 367–393) and recognizes also the right to a ministry (CCEO 371, §1) as well as the responsibilities of a married clergy (CCEO 375).

The sources for this chapter are mainly two titles of the 1917 code, "On the Rights and Privileges of Clerics" (CIC 118–223) and "On the Obligations of Clerics" (CIC 124–144). While the ancient but outmoded privileges no longer find a place in ecclesiastical law,[7] the 1983 code affirms certain rights belonging to clerics that were unknown in the former code. These rights were enunciated in the documents of the Second Vatican Council, especially Presbyterorum ordinis

[1] Cardinal Willebrands thought that any precepts regarding the life of clerics should be placed in special statutes outside the code. The Secretariat of the Commission replied that the code would be very incomplete without such an important chapter; and, furthermore, these canons are real juridic norms (Rel, 62). Thus sanctions may be imposed for the violation of certain obligations such as engaging in trade or business (c. 1392), failure to observe continence and celibacy (cc. 1394, 1395), and serious neglect of the duty of residence (c. 1396).

[2] The obligations and rights of religious are found in cc. 662–672.

[3] Comm 14 (1982) 168.

[4] Comm 9 (1977) 245.

[5] Cardinal Bernardin sought to have rights placed first in the title as more in conformity with the sacramental constitution of the Church. The Secretariat responded that rights could indeed precede obligations but that was not necessary since both flowed from the sacraments (Rel, 62).

[6] Four rights were either eliminated or included elsewhere: the right of cooperating with the bishop in the exercise of ministry, the right to obtain an ecclesiastical ministry, the right to sufficient time for spiritual and intellectual development, the right to have recourse (Comm 3 [1971] 195–196 and 16 [1984] 170).

[7] The four were: (1) the privilege of the canon which safeguarded the clergy from real injury; (2) the privilege of the forum which restricted all contentious or criminal cases against the clergy to an ecclesiastical judge; (3) the privilege of immunity which exempted the clergy from military service and public civil offices which are foreign to the clerical state; and (4) the privilege of competence which allowed the clergy burdened with debt to withhold enough resources for their decent support.

(the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests). Even when the 1983 code repeats verbatim the 1917 canon, Pope John Paul II has insisted that "the code is a new law and it is to be evaluated primarily in the perspective of the Second Vatican Council, to which it is intended to conform fully."[8] At the same time, according to canon 6, §2, the restatement of the former law must "be assessed also" in light of "canonical tradition." On the whole, it seems that commentaries on this section of the 1983 code have not been sufficiently attuned to the conciliar spirit. "Rarely do authors follow an emphasis on the responsibility of the priest. The council's insistence on the fundamental dignity of the priest, episcopal-presbyteral cooperation in the Church, and the solicitude of the bishop for the priest is not adequately reflected when the canons are explained."[9]

Clerical Reverence and Obedience

Canon 273 — Clerics are bound by a special obligation to show reverence and obedience to the Supreme Pontiff and their own ordinary.

Unlike the two previous drafts of this section of the code which were circulated, in the 1983 code the cleric's obligation of obedience became the lead canon of this chapter.[10] The Holy Father seems to have been responsible for the change, since he together with a small group of consultors edited the final version. There is no reason to hold, however, that its position implies that obedience takes precedence over the other obligations and rights in this chapter, that it is a primary norm for interpreting the following canons, or that it in any way limits the exercise of a cleric's rights.[11]

The obligation of obedience does not bind only clerics. All the faithful "are bound to follow with Christian obedience those things which the sacred pastors, inasmuch as they represent Christ, declare as teachers of the faith or establish as rulers of the Church" (c. 212, §1). Clerics, however, are bound by "a special obligation." The canon reproduces the 1917 code except for the elimination of the phrase "especially priests" and the addition of the term "the Supreme Pontiff."[12] Yet an identity of formulation must not obscure the freshness of conciliar inspiration. Presbyterorum ordinis and Christus Dominus (the Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office) identified the theological or sacramental basis for the obligation.

According to Presbyterorum ordinis:

> Priests for their part should keep in mind the fullness of the sacrament of order which bishops enjoy and should reverence in their persons the authority of Christ the supreme pastor.... Priestly obedience, inspired through and through by the spirit of cooperation, is based on that sharing of the episcopal ministry which is conferred on priests by the sacrament of order and the canonical mission.[13]

Similarly, Christus Dominus stated:

[8] Address to the Roman Rota, January 26, 1984, Insegnamenti di Giovanni Paolo II 7/1: 167. Translation in TPS 29 (1984) 175.

[9] F. Schneider, Obedience to the Bishop by the Diocesan Priest in the 1983 Code of Canon Law, CanLawStud 533 (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1990) 314. See canon 384: "With special solicitude, a diocesan bishop is to attend to presbyters and listen to them as assistants and counselors. He is to protect their rights and take care that they correctly fulfill the obligations proper to their state...."

[10] In the 1917 code the canon on obedience (CIC 127) was fourth among the obligations. When first discussed by the study group, it was twelfth in a list of sixteen obligations (Comm 16 [1984] 184–185). Canon 132 in the 1977 schema was in fifth place; canon 247 in the 1980 schema was in fourth.

[11] Schneider, 226–228.

[12] CIC 127: "All clerics, but especially priests, are bound by a special obligation to show reverence and obedience each to his own ordinary." The singling out of priests in the old law was apropos since the term "clerics" also included those who had not received the sacrament of orders but only tonsure and minor orders.

[13] PO 7.

All priests, whether diocesan or religious, share and exercise with the bishop the one priesthood of Christ.... The diocesan clergy have, however, a primary role in the care of souls because, being incardinated in or appointed to a particular church, they are wholly dedicated in its service... and accordingly form one priestly body and one family of which the bishop is the father.[14]

The obligation of obedience is based on the relationship between cleric and bishop arising from the reception of the sacrament of orders. The cleric thereby shares in the episcopal ministry. By ordination the cleric becomes incardinated in the diocese and is destined for its service (c. 266, §1).[15] Though the council does refer to the canonical mission, a jurisdictional term, it avoids any connotation of superior and inferior, preferring instead a relationship grounded in ecclesial communion. Nevertheless, the code here seems to have overlooked the spirit of the council in continuing to speak of the "ordinary" with jurisdictional connotations, whereas one finds in canon 384 the more pastoral "diocesan bishop" who "with special solicitude... is to attend to presbyters and listen to them as assistants and counselors."

It may be argued that the code deliberately chose the term "ordinary" because of its greater extension, including, besides the diocesan bishop, vicars general, episcopal vicars, and major superiors of pontifical clerical religious institutes (c. 134, §1). Even so, obedience would be owed primarily to the bishop and to the vicars only as acting in his name. Members of religious institutes and clerical societies of apostolic life at the reception of the diaconate become incardinated as clerics (c. 266, §2) and thereby receive their superior as their own proper ordinary. They do not owe obedience to the diocesan bishop as their proper ordinary.[16]

The 1983 code states that clerics owe obedience not only to the ordinary but also to the Supreme Pontiff. There was some disagreement about including the pope in a canon that dealt with the cleric's relation to his own bishop.[17] It was further objected that such a reference was bound to the theological opinion that the Roman Pontiff was the universal bishop of the Church.[18] The Secretariat, though, insisted that a cleric is held to render special reverence and obedience not only to his own ordinary but also to the Supreme Pontiff, "who is indeed the ordinary for the whole Church."[19] In fact, canon 331 states clearly that "he possesses supreme, full, immediate, and universal ordinary power in the Church, which he is always able to exercise freely." Not only does the Roman Pontiff possess power over the universal Church, he also has "the primacy of ordinary power over all particular churches and groups of them" (c. 333, §1).[20]

The obedience that a diocesan priest owes his ordinary is called canonical obedience—to distin-

[14] CD 28.

[15] Through the reception of the diaconate, religious who are already permanently attached to their communities become affiliated with them as clerics (c. 266, §2). Their obligation of obedience would be in virtue of their religious profession (cc. 601, 654).

[20] Canon 752 requires that "a religious submission of the intellect and will must be given to a doctrine which the Supreme Pontiff or the college of bishops declares concerning faith or morals when they exercise the authentic magisterium," even if not intended as infallible. "The obligation to follow the Magisterium in matters of faith and morals is intrinsically united to all the functions which the priest must perform in the Church. Dissent in this area is to be considered grave, in that it produces scandal and confusion among the faithful" (Directory for the Life and Ministry of Priests, cited hereafter as Directory Priests, n. 62). The observance of liturgical norms "merits special mention in our times." The celebration of the sacraments are acts of Christ and the Church "which the priest administers in the person of Christ and in the name of the Church for the good of the faithful. These have a true right to participate in the liturgical celebrations as the Church wills and not according to the personal likes of a particular minister" (ibid., n. 54).

guish it from the religious obedience owed a religious superior. The obligation of the latter arises from a vow or some other commitment made upon joining a community. Canonical obedience is restricted to those matters that are prescribed by canon law. It is determined by clerical status and office, on the one hand, and by the extent of episcopal jurisdiction, on the other. The bishop is empowered to enforce the universal law that regulates the clerical state, and the clergy are bound to obey in whatever pertains to their state as such.[21] Religious obedience is more extensive in that it embraces all phases of the member's life.

The authority of the bishop to enforce the common law regarding clerical discipline (cc. 273–289) includes the right to interpret the law in accordance with local circumstances. His commands must be in conformity with the spirit of the law. He cannot command anything prohibited by it. A deacon, for example, who is unwilling to be promoted to the priesthood cannot be forced to do so, nor, absent grave cause, can he be forbidden to exercise his diaconal orders (c. 1038). Conversely, the bishop cannot prohibit what the code clearly permits;[22] he cannot, for example, command his priests not to accept Mass offerings (c. 945, §1).

Areas that are not directly connected with the government of the diocese are not inherently within the ambit of episcopal jurisdiction. In civil matters the cleric enjoys all the liberties of every other citizen. Canon 285, §3, however, limits his right to hold public office. He may join any political party, unless it is condemned by the Church; he may vote for any candidate he deems fit. On a debatable political issue, such as a specific constitutional amendment, he may sign petitions and take a position that is at variance with that of the bishop.

Private matters, too, are not subject to episcopal direction. Provided that the priest is not incurring debts, the bishop may not interfere in his personal finances or the disposition of his inheritance, let alone dictate his last will and testament.[23] A bishop is exceeding his power when he legislates that assistant pastors are not to own automobiles.[24] Similarly, a bishop has no right to force a cleric before ordination to take a pledge to abstain from alcoholic beverages for a certain period of time, as was commonly done before the council.

With regard to the personal appearance of clerics, the authority of the bishop is limited to enforcing clerical dress as provided for in canon 284. The 1917 code (CIC 136, §1) required that clerics have a simple hair style. The Second Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1866 had legislated in greater detail, forbidding clerics to grow beards. Since this particular legislation was not opposed to the 1917 code, it remained in effect and could be enforced by the bishop, according to a decision of the Sacred Congregation of the Council.[25] The 1983 code says nothing about hair or beards. In view of widespread acceptance of longer hair and beards, as well as civil court decisions about individual rights in this matter, contemporary custom has evidently prevailed over any restrictions. The former prohibition against clerics wearing rings (CIC 136, §2) no longer applies. Only in extreme cases in which there is danger of genuine scandal may the bishop impose canonical obedience on a cleric to modify his appearance.

[21] A particularly difficult question is the right of a bishop to command a cleric to undergo a psychological examination. Canon 220 states that no one may violate the right of another person to protect his privacy, yet canons 1041, 1° and 1044, §2, 2° require the ordinary to consult with experts before judging a cleric who "labors under some form of amentia or other psychic weakness" unfit or fit to fulfill the ministry properly. See J. Provost, RRAO 1995, 43–45.

[23] The universal law does not oblige a cleric to make a last will and testament, but particular law may well require it (Rel, 68).

For clerics who after a warning persistently refuse to obey in a serious matter, the code prescribes the imposition of a just penalty (c. 1371, §2). The penalty would depend upon the gravity of the offense.

It should be noted, in sum, that the special obedience the cleric owes his bishop is based on his sharing in the episcopal ministry through the sacrament of orders and the bond of incardination. The priest or deacon is to cooperate with the bishop in the service of the faithful of a particular church. Canon law does not require unquestioned, let alone joyful obedience. As a recent study has maintained, one "is not bound to conform his mind to the thinking and reasoning of the bishop; he is simply to carry out the order." Canonical obedience, though connected to the virtue of obedience, is quite different from the virtue, which should inform the spiritual life of a cleric just as any one of the faithful. Furthermore, to have recourse against commands which are perceived as unjust is not a sign of "a lack of priestly generosity or spirituality, or of questioning the will of God."[26]

Certain Offices Restricted to Clerics

Canon 274 — §1. Only clerics can obtain offices for whose exercise the power of orders or the power of ecclesiastical governance is required.

By placing this paragraph in the present chapter, the framers of the code indicate that a right is under consideration. The text states that only clerics may receive offices requiring the exercise of orders or the power of government in the Church. Yet it stops short of affirming that clerics have a right to obtain from their bishop "an office, ministry or function [munus] to be exercised in the service of the Church" as does canon 371, §1 of the Eastern code. Nevertheless, every cleric when physically and mentally capable does have the right to exercise his orders so long as useful, unless barred by law. Canon 1008 declares that by the sacrament of orders one is deputed to fulfill the functions (munera) of teaching, sanctifying, and ruling; canon 1025, §2 requires that no one be ordained unless his ministry be considered useful for the Church.

An ecclesiastical office is defined in canon 145, §1 as "any function [munus] constituted in a stable manner by divine or ecclesiastical ordinance to be exercised for a spiritual purpose." The council itself in reforming the system of benefices proposed this definition (PO 20). There is little controversy over the first part of the paragraph limiting offices that require the exercise of orders to clerics. The power of orders of its nature directly promotes the sanctification of the faithful through public worship, especially the Mass, and through the administration of the sacraments. The offices of bishop (c. 375, §1), pastor (c. 521, §1), and parochial vicar (c. 546) are obvious examples of responsibilities requiring the administration of the sacraments. The law itself specifies presbyteral orders for the offices of parochial administrator (c. 539), vicar forane or dean (c. 553, §1), and diocesan administrator (c. 425, §1). To be a member of the presbyteral council (c. 495, §1) or the board of consultors (c. 502, §1) one must also have such orders. Within the diocesan curia the following offices must be filled by priests: moderator of the curia (c. 473, §2), vicar general and episcopal vicar (c. 478, §1), judicial vicar and adjutant judicial vicar (c. 1420, §4).

Offices and Functions Open to the Laity

The last phrase of paragraph one has occasioned great controversy: only clerics can obtain offices for whose exercise "the power of ecclesiastical governance is required." This restriction restates canon 118 of the 1917 code to the effect that "clerics alone are capable of obtaining the power of order or of ecclesiastical jurisdiction." Canon 129, §2 of the 1983 code, however, seems to modify the exclusivity of this clerical prerogative by declaring that lay members of the Christian faithful "can cooperate [cooperari]" in the exercise of this same governance or jurisdiction "according to the norm of law." The apparently conflicting canons represent a compromise in relation to the as yet unresolved theological dispute about the nature and origin of sacred power in the Church and the accessibility of that power to the laity.[27] One opinion holds to the unity of sacred power which embraces both orders and jurisdiction and is transmitted only through the sacrament of orders so that the participation of the laity in the power of governance is merely extrinsic. The other opinion maintains that the mission of the Church is carried out through three separate powers, the power to sanctify, to teach, and to rule. Through baptism the laity have a capacity to exercise jurisdiction or governance in a subordinate and dependent way.

According to some theologians the council was not wholly successful in defining the precise relationship between the powers of orders and jurisdiction. In Lumen gentium it taught that through ordination the offices (munera) of teaching and governing were conferred along with that of sanctifying (LG 21, 18). The source of governing authority, then, is ordination and not canonical mission (or commission). Canonical mission merely determines the sphere in which jurisdiction may be exercised (LG 24). The council further taught that the ministries of the ordained and the laity "differ from one another in essence and not only in degree" (LG 10); some functions are reserved exclusively to the ordained. Yet later in the same document one finds that the laity through their baptism and confirmation receive "the capacity to assume from the hierarchy certain ecclesiastical offices [munera] that are to be performed for a spiritual purpose" (LG 33).[28]

Since the council's position is somewhat of a compromise and, therefore, ambiguous, there is no commonly accepted theological explanation for lay ministry. The Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, in its "Declaration on the Question of the Ordination of Women to the Ministerial Priesthood,"[29] insisted that "it is the Holy Spirit given in ordination who grants participation in the ruling power of the supreme pastor Christ" (n. 6), adding that "the pastoral charge in the Church is normally linked to the sacrament of order." In the official commentary on the document the congregation noted that the participation of some medieval abbesses in ecclesiastical jurisdiction was an abuse. While canonists in the past had admitted the possibility of separating jurisdiction from orders, the council, the document continued, "has tried to determine better the relationship between the two; the council's doctrinal vision will doubtless have effects on discipline."[30] One wonders how this position of the congregation can be reconciled with the fact that the papal motu proprio Causas matrimoniales in 1971 permitted a lay man to serve on a panel of three judges in marriage cases. The Pontifical Commission for the Revision of the Code of Canon Law recognized that such lay judges did exercise "jurisdictional power of governing."[31] The commission argued that classical canonists had long held that the pope using his plenary authority could bestow such power and that the lay man's capacity to receive it was affirmed by Lumen gentium 33.

The formulation of canons 129 and 274 of the present code was not resolved until the end of the revision process. The participation of the laity in the exercise of governmental power was a special question on the agenda of the last plenary meeting of the commission, October 20–29, 1981. A dossier sent to all the participants beforehand included: (1) the observations of several cardinals on this issue, most notably Cardinal Ratzinger; (2) the opinion of Alfonsus Stickler, Prefect of the Vatican Library and Professor of the History of Canon Law at the Salesianum University, a consultor to the commission; and (3) the opinion of another consultor, Jean Beyer, Dean of the Faculty of Canon Law at the Gregorian University.[32]

Cardinal Ratzinger objected: (a) to the distinction in governmental power between that founded on sacred orders and that not so founded; (b) to the participation of the laity in the exercise of ruling power not based on orders. To say that there was a power not based on sacred orders would be inconsistent with Lumen gentium (LG 21, 2), which maintained the essential unity of ecclesiastical authority (sacra potestas) founded exclusively on the sacrament of orders. He thought it a contradiction to hold, furthermore, that an unordained person is incapable of holding a power but that he may participate in its exercise.

At the final plenary congregation of the commission, the participation of lay persons in the exercise of jurisdiction—in particular as lay associate judges (c. 1421, §2)—was overwhelmingly approved by vote of fifty-two to nine.[33] The definitive formulation of canon 129, though, is a compromise, deliberately ambiguous: "Lay members of the Christian faithful can cooperate in the exercise of this same power [of governance] according to the norm of law." It may be interpreted either that the laity do not have jurisdiction, that all jurisdiction comes only with the sacrament of orders, or that they can indeed be given jurisdiction by the supreme legislator.

As was approved at the plenary congregation, the present code states (c. 1421, §1) that diocesan judges are to be clerics; thus deacons are eligible. The episcopal conference, however, may permit the laity to be appointed judges and, when necessary, one of them can be selected to form a collegiate tribunal (c. 1421, §2). The laity are also eligible to be defenders of the bond and promoters of justice (c. 1435), as well as advocates (c. 1483). They may be assessors (c. 1424) and auditors (c. 1428, §2). They may hold the offices of chancellor, vice chancellor, and notary. The chancellor as defined by law is an archivist, but in many American dioceses the chancellor functions with extensive delegated powers. (See the commentary on c. 482 for a discussion of the difficulties associated with such delegation.)

In financial matters the expertise of the laity is clearly recognized. They may serve on the finance council that must be established in every diocese (c. 492, §1) and fulfill the office of administrator of the temporal goods of a juridic person (c. 1279). A lay person may also be named finance officer, a position that every diocesan bishop must fill (c. 494, §1). The laity similarly serve on the financial council required to be set up in every parish (c. 537). They are to constitute the majority of the diocesan pastoral council (c. 512, §1) and the parish council (c. 536, §1) where these groups are established.

In situations in which there is a scarcity of priests, a bishop may entrust a participation in the exercise of pastoral care to a lay person or group of lay persons (c. 517, §2). The Church's annual statistical report (Annuarium Statisticum Ecclesiae) reported that on December 31, 1994, in the United States there were 63 parishes entrusted to permanent deacons, 9 to men religious who were not priests, 188 to women religious, 55 to lay persons, and 58 parishes which were vacant.[34] The laity are authorized to exercise the ministry of the word, to preside over liturgical prayer, to baptize, and to distribute Holy Communion (c. 230, §3). Lay women are not disadvantaged here as they are in receiving the ministries of lector and acolyte (c. 230, §1). The laity may prepare couples for marriage and formally assist at weddings (c. 1112, §1). They are also allowed to bring

Even in parishes where there is a priest, the laity can be admitted to preach in church if, in certain circumstances, it is necessary or useful (c. 766). In Masses for children, for example, with the consent of the pastor one of the adults may speak after the gospel, especially if the celebrant finds it difficult to adapt to the mentality of children (Directory for Masses with Children n. 24). In other liturgies the homily is reserved to the priest or deacon (c. 767, §1).

In a 1988 apostolic exhortation after the promulgation of the code, John Paul II seems to have offered his own commentary on canon 129, §2, which is also repeated in canon 979, §2 of the Eastern code.

> When necessity and expediency in the Church require it, the pastors, according to established norms from universal law, can entrust to the lay faithful certain offices and roles that are connected to their pastoral ministry but do not require the character of orders. ... The task exercised in virtue of supply takes its legitimacy formally and immediately from the official deputation given by the pastors as well as from its concrete exercise under the guidance of ecclesiastical authority.[35]

Clerical Duty to Accept Assignments

§2. Unless a legitimate impediment excuses them, clerics are bound to undertake and fulfill faithfully a function which their ordinary has entrusted to them.

The obligation to accept and faithfully fulfill an assignment flows from the fact of incardination and the commitment to serve the diocese; sacred orders are conferred that they may be used for the good of the people of God (c. 1025, §2). The obligation of canonical obedience may be imposed only by the bishop or the diocesan administrator. Although the canons on obedience refer to the "ordinary," a term broader than "diocesan bishop," the texts of Vatican II, as noted above, clearly have in mind the special relationship of the diocesan bishop to his priests. The bishop should personally and carefully review decisions of a personnel board. The assignment or duty (munus) is to be taken in a wide sense, not necessarily limited to the care of souls. It includes such positions as pastor, assistant pastor, chaplain in a hospital, seminary teacher, or director of a religious institution. For the bishop to impose obedience, according to the interpretation of the Code Commission Secretariat, it is understood that the necessity of the Church truly requires it.[36] The judgment concerning the existence and the duration of the necessity belongs to the ordinary. He could, for example, delay for a time the entrance of a cleric into a religious community.[37]

A cleric with a legitimate impediment cannot be forced to accept an assignment. Poor health, whether physical or psychological, as well as advanced age would be obvious obstacles. The greater the pastoral need to be met, the greater should be the excusing cause. Again, it is up to the ordinary to judge the validity of the reason. A cleric who thinks that he has been aggrieved may have recourse to the Congregation for the Clergy,[38] but meanwhile he should accede to the bishop's command. One who does not comply with the legitimate precepts of the ordinary but persists [36] Rel, 63. The bishop should as far as possible bear in mind the morale of his clergy and appreciate that a "source of stress occurs when a priest is given an assignment that does not fit his interests and abilities or match his expectations" (Bishops' Committee on Priestly Life and Ministry, The Priest and Stress [Washington, D.C.: USCC, 1982] 11).

[38] The only other remedy would be mediation or arbitration (c. 1733). The code does provide, however, special procedures for the removal (cc. 1740–1747) and transfer (1748–1752) of pastors.

in disobedience after a warning is to be punished with a just penalty (c. 1371, 2°).

In making assignments, indeed, in exercising authority over his clerics, the bishop is to be guided by the principles of the Second Vatican Council. An intimate relationship is established between them by the sacrament of ordination which confers on priests a share in the episcopal ministry (PO 7). The bishop is "to regard his priests, who are his co-workers, as sons and friends, just as Christ called his disciples no longer servants but friends" (LG 28). Since priests have a joint responsibility to advance the cause of the Church, obedience to Christ demands that while "they confidently propose their plans and urgently explain the needs of the flock entrusted to them, they should always be prepared to submit to the judgment of those who exercise the chief function in ruling God's church" (PO 15).

The bishop for his part has a "sacred duty" to know his priests individually and intimately—"their character and talents, their likes and dislikes, their spiritual life, zeal and plans, their health and economic situation, their family and whatever concerns them . . . in sincere, friendly dialogue, he converses with them about their work, the offices entrusted to them and also about matters pertaining to the life of the whole diocese" (Directory for Bishops, n. 111). With a real appreciation of the principles of co-responsiblity the bishop must enter into a serious consultation before making an assignment that will have a significant impact on the life of a priest.

In the appointment of a permanent deacon the bishop is to ascribe duties "which are congruent with his personal abilities, his celibate or married state, his formation, age, and with his spiritually valid aspirations." The decree of appointment is to clearly specify "the territory in which his ministry is to be exercised or those to whom he is to minister"; it is also to indicate "whether the office conferred is to be discharged on a partial or full-time basis" and to name "the priest who has the cura animarum" of the people concerned (Directory for the Ministry and Life of Permanent Deacons, n. 8).

Clerical Cooperation

Canon 275 — §1. Since clerics all work for the same purpose, namely, the building up of the Body of Christ, they are to be united among themselves by a bond of brotherhood and prayer and are to strive for cooperation among themselves according to the prescripts of particular law.

This canon, which is new to the 1983 code, is taken from the conciliar document Presbyterorum ordinis 8 which stresses the intimate sacramental bond uniting them; though the document does not speak of deacons, they, too, share in the same sacrament. No matter how diverse the apostolates in which they labor, all clerics contribute toward the building up of the Body of Christ. The older should welcome the younger, assisting them to fit into the ministry, and both groups should try to bridge the generation gap through mutual understanding. "They should be particularly concerned about those who are sick, about the afflicted, the overworked, the lonely," in short those experiencing difficulties. The decree notes that apostolic enterprises "must often overstep the boundaries of one parish or diocese": "No priest is sufficiently equipped to carry out his own mission alone and as it were single-handed" (PO 7). Parish priests "should therefore collaborate both with other parish priests and with those priests who are exercising a pastoral function in the district (such as vicars forane and deans) or who are engaged in works of an extra-parochial nature" (CD 30, 1). The precise nature of the cooperation may be worked out in particular law. Permanent deacons are also held to collaborate with each other and with the bishop to foster the mission of the Church (Directory for the Ministry and Life of Permanent Deacons, n. 9).

§2. Clerics are to acknowledge and promote the mission which the laity, each for his or her part, exercise in the Church and in the world.

Again echoing the council, the law calls upon the clergy sincerely to appreciate and promote the place of the laity in the mission of the Church (PO 9). The sacred pastors should "confidently assign offices to them in the service of the church, leaving them freedom and scope for activity" (LG 37). Whereas an earlier draft of the code was satisfied with clerics "recognizing" the role of the laity, the promulgated version adds the responsibility of positively "promoting" it. This duty is stressed even more forcefully with respect to pastors of parishes (c. 529, §2). The right that the laity have to participate in the Church's mission (c. 225, §1) is paralleled here by the obligation of clerics to see that this right is accorded them and that institutions are available to enable that right to be exercised.

In December 1981 the Pontifical Council on the Laity issued a study document explaining the identity and mission of priests within associations of the laity. It sees the priest as the "architect of unity" both within the association and within the Church at large. He is to guarantee that its goals are essentially religious and not political or social or economic.[39]

Holiness of Life

Canon 276 — §1. In leading their lives, clerics are bound in a special way to pursue holiness since, having been consecrated to God by a new title in the reception of orders, they are dispensers of the mysteries of God in the service of His people.

The formulation of the basic obligation incumbent upon clerics is taken from the conciliar decree Presbyterorum ordinis. All Christians through their baptismal consecration are "enabled and obliged even in the midst of human weakness to seek perfection." Clerics, "consecrated to God in a new way by their ordination and made the living instruments of Christ the eternal priest," are bound by a special claim to acquire this perfection (PO 12, LG 39). "It is through the daily sacred actions, and through the whole of their ministry, which they carry out in communion with the bishop and their fellow priests that they are set on the right course to perfection of life" (PO 12). The 1917 code expressed this duty to acquire holiness in comparative terms: clerics ought to lead a holier life than the laity, both interiorly and exteriorly, and surpass them by example in virtue and good deeds. The council, however, insisted that "all Christians in any state or walk of life are called to the fullness of Christian life and to the perfection of love" (LG 40). Though the forms and duties of life are many, "holiness is one" (LG 41). The distinctive way for clerics to acquire holiness is through the zealous exercise of their ministry.[40]

§2. In order to be able to pursue this perfection:

1° they are first of all to fulfill faithfully and tirelessly the duties of the pastoral ministry;

2° they are to nourish their spiritual life from the two-fold table of sacred scripture and the Eucharist; therefore, priests are earnestly invited to offer the eucharistic sacrifice daily and deacons to participate in its offering daily;

3° priests and deacons aspiring to the presbyterate are obliged to carry out the liturgy of the hours daily according to the proper and approved liturgical books; permanent deacons, however, are to carry out the same to the extent defined by the conference of bishops;

4° they are equally bound to make time for spiritual retreats according to the prescripts of particular law;

5° they are urged to engage in mental prayer regularly, to approach the sacrament of [39] "Identity and Mission of Priests within Associations of the Laity," Origins 11 (1982) 533–547.

[40] Canon 368 of the Eastern code states this more succinctly. "Clerics are bound in a special manner to the perfection which Christ proposed to his disciples, since they are consecrated to God in a new way by sacred ordination, so that they may become more suitable instruments of Christ, the eternal priest, in the service of the people of God, and at the same time that they be exemplary models to the flock."

penance frequently, to honor the Virgin Mother of God with particular veneration, and to use other common and particular means of sanctification.

Closely following Presbyterorum ordinis (PO 13), the canon indicates the means clerics are to use in striving for perfection.[41] After the 1990 synod of bishops on the ministry and life of priests, John Paul II published an apostolic exhortation, Pastores dabo vobis.[42] It was followed in 1994 by a Directory for the Life and Ministry of Priests issued by the Congregation for the Clergy. Chapter 2 of this instruction, "Priestly Spirituality," elaborates upon the present canon and treats extensively the priestly ideal and the means to achieve it.

Faithful Service of the People

In the pursuit of holiness clerics must first of all strive faithfully and untiringly to fulfill the obligations of their pastoral ministry.[43] What Lumen gentium affirmed of bishops can equally be applied to all clerics who share in the episcopal ministry. That ministry zealously fulfilled "will also be for them an outstanding means of sanctification" (LG 41). Presbyterorum ordinis similarly teaches that priests who dedicate themselves completely to the service of the people "are able, in the holiness with which they have been enriched in Christ, to grow towards the perfection of humanity" (PO 12). The 1971 synod of bishops, which is also cited as a source for this part of the canon, summed up the connection of holiness with the fulfillment of the ministry. "The activities of the apostolate for their part furnishing an indispensable nourishment for fostering the spiritual life of the priest: 'By assuming the role of the Good Shepherd, they will find precisely in the pastoral exercise of love the bond of priestly perfection which will unify their lives and activities' (PO 14). In the exercise of ministry the presbyter is enlightened and strengthened by the action of the Church and the example of the laity."[44]

Preaching and Eucharist[45]

As preachers of the word they must first make it part of their lives by prayerful meditation upon the scriptures. As dispensers of the mysteries of God it behooves them to seek nourishment at the eucharistic table.[46] "In the mystery of the Eucharistic sacrifice, in which priests fulfill their principal function, the work of our redemption is continually carried out. For this reason the daily celebration of the Eucharist is earnestly recommended. This celebration is an act of Christ and the Church even if it is impossible for the faithful to be present" (PO 13). The code adopts this strong recommendation about the daily celebration of the eucharistic sacrifice (c. 904). Note also that deacons are "earnestly" (enixe) encouraged to participate in Mass every day.[47]

The conciliar document Sacrosanctum Concilium (the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy) taught that "communal celebration involving the presence and active participation of the faithful" is to be "preferred," as far as possible, to a celebration that is individual and quasi-private. This rule applies with special force to the celebration of the Mass and the administration of the sacraments, even though every Mass has of itself a public and social nature (SC 27). The code, therefore, provides: "Except for a just and reasonable cause, a priest is not to celebrate the eucharistic sacrifice without the participation of at least some member of the faithful" (c. 906). If such a participant were not readily available, the priest's devotion would be sufficient reason for him to celebrate alone. Whereas an earlier draft of the code "commended" concelebration of the Mass, canon 902 states merely that priests "can" concelebrate unless the good of the faithful urges otherwise.

The Liturgy of the Hours

Among the means for pursuing holiness the council recommended praying the liturgy of the hours. "By praying the Divine Office[48] priests themselves should extend to the different hours of the day the praise and thanksgiving they offer in the celebration of the Eucharist. By the Office they pray to God in the name of the church for the whole people entrusted to them and in fact for the whole world" (PO 5).[49] One of the main objectives of Sacrosanctum Concilium was to restore the traditional sequence of the hours so that the day would be sanctified. "Lauds as morning prayer and Vespers as evening prayer are the two hinges on which the daily office turns. They must be considered as the chief hours and are to be celebrated as such" (SC 89).[50]

In fulfillment of the conciliar mandate, a reformed Divine Office, known as The Liturgy of the Hours, was promulgated in 1971. The instruction (printed at the beginning of vol. 1) speaks of the obligation "to recite the whole sequence of Hours each day, preserving as far as possible the genuine relationship of the Hours to the time of day."[51] It introduces distinctions, however, and suggests priorities among the different hours (n. 29). Morning prayer and vespers, as the two hinges on which this liturgy turns, are not to be omitted "unless for a serious reason"; certainly their omission is to be exceptional. Clerics are to "carry out faithfully the Office of Readings, which is above all the liturgical celebration of the word of God" in order to become more perfect as disciples by welcoming that word in themselves. A lesser reason would justify the omission of the Office of Readings. "That the day may be completely sanctified they will desire to recite the middle Hour and Compline, thus commending themselves to God and completing the entire Opus Dei before going to bed."[52]

The code, in the spirit of the council and the instruction, imposes on bishops, priests, and deacons the juridic obligation of fulfilling daily the liturgy of the hours (cc. 276, §2, 3° and 1174, §1).[53] The rationale is clear from the council: the sacred ministers are to offer prayer in the name of the Christian community. Far more than a rule of canon law or a specific duty of clerics, the practice of reciting the Office sets up a pattern of prayer in their lives. Canon 1175 requires that "in carrying out the liturgy of the hours, the true time for each hour is to be observed insofar as possible." The canon, like the instruction, leaves to the discretion of the ordained minister the judgment of circumstances permitting any exceptions. "There is of course a danger of self-deception in this kind of decision, but there are certainly reasons or causes which, considered objec-

[48] The term "Divine" is used in the sense of "praise of God": "Office" (officium) means "a charge, an occupation," a public ritual activity of the community. Sometimes the term "canonical hours" is used.

[49] The code treats the liturgy of the hours in title II of part two of Book IV.

tively, do excuse from the Office as from other precepts of Church Law."[54]

The extent to which permanent deacons are required to pray the liturgy of the hours is left to the determination of the episcopal conference.[55] In the United States this obligation to recite the canonical hours extends to morning and evening prayer. The Bishops' Committee on the Liturgy has urged: "In view of the particular style of life and circumstances of most permanent deacons, it is appropriate that this [prayer] be done with their families."[56]

As of November 27, 1977, The Liturgy of the Hours became the single official version for use in the United States, approved by the NCCB and confirmed by the Holy See. That translation, as it appears in several authorized editions, or the Latin Liturgia horarum, must be used to fulfill the canonical obligation whether prayed in common or by individuals.[57] When non-English texts are used in the United States for the celebration of the liturgy (the Eucharist, the sacraments, and the Divine Office), they must have the approval of the episcopal conference of the country where they are published and have been confirmed by the Holy See.[58] One could use, for example, approved texts in the French, Spanish, Italian, German, or Slovenian languages.

Retreats

Like the requirement of the Divine Office, the requirement of a retreat is juridically imposed rather than merely commended.[59] It is left to particular law to specify the frequency and length of the obligation.[60] In the United States, the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1884 decreed that bishops must schedule retreats for their clergy every year or at least every two years (n. 75). The diocesan bishop was to determine whether it was to be annual or biennial, where it was to take place, its duration, and the method to be followed. This particular law from the nineteenth century remains in effect under the new code just as it did after the 1917 code. In virtue of his legislative power (c. 391, §2) the diocesan bishop can establish particular law regarding retreats for the clergy. "The two most usual modes which may be prescribed by the Bishop in his own Diocese are the day of recollection (possibly monthly) and the annual retreat."[61] In view of the diversity of spiritual needs, it is desirable that some options be made available. Even the former law did not require that the retreat be in common.[62]

Other Recommended Means of Holiness

Unlike the former code (CIC 125) which made the diocesan bishop directly responsible for seeing that his clergy carried out such devotional practices as frequent confession, the 1983 code leaves this responsibility to the clerics themselves.

[54] BCLN 13 (1977) 88. The conciliar Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy declared that "in particular cases, and for adequate reasons, ordinaries may dispense their subjects, wholly or in part, from the obligation of reciting the divine office, or they may change it to another obligation" (SC 97). Certain religious superiors are considered ordinaries with regard to their own subjects (c. 134, §1).

[55] The NCCB determined as follows: "Although they are not bound by universal church law to say the whole of this prayer every day, permanent deacons should not hold themselves lightly excused from the obligation they have to recite morning and evening prayer" (Complementary Norms, 3). The episcopal conferences of Australia, Belgium, England and Wales, France, and Scotland have also made the recitation of morning and evening prayer obligatory (CLD 11, 30–31). The Canadian conference has established the same norm (Code of Canon Law Annotated, Appendix III, 1314–1315).

They are to apply themselves regularly to mental prayer.[63] They are to approach the sacrament of penance frequently (PO 18). The code does not offer here or elsewhere any further guidelines on penance. The Sacred Congregation for Religious and Secular Institutes in the Decree on Confession for Religious on December 8, 1970, did indicate that "frequently" meant "twice a month."[64] In view of the opinion of commentators on the former law, once a month could be considered frequent. While special devotion to the Blessed Virgin is recommended, the rosary is not singled out. Other more particular norms may be established by the episcopal conference.[65]

Clerical Celibacy

Canon 277 — §1. Clerics are obliged to observe perfect and perpetual continence for the sake of the kingdom of heaven and therefore are bound to celibacy which is a special gift of God by which sacred ministers can adhere more easily to Christ with an undivided heart and are able to dedicate themselves more freely to the service of God and humanity.

The Directory for the Life and Ministry of Priests defended this canon as follows: "Convinced of the profound theological and pastoral motives upholding the relationship between celibacy and the priesthood, and enlightened by the testimony which confirms to this day, in spite of painful negative cases, its spiritual and evangelical validity, the Church has reaffirmed in Vatican Council II and repeatedly in teachings of the Pontifical Magisterium the 'firm will to maintain the law which requires celibacy freely chosen and perpetual for candidates to priestly Ordination in the Latin rite.'"[66] After considerable discussion at the council, the law of celibacy was sustained in Presbyterorum ordinis. The decree noted in article 16: "Perfect and perpetual continence for the sake of the kingdom of heaven was recommended by Christ the Lord (Mt 19:12)... and has always been highly esteemed by the Church as a feature of priestly life.[67] For it is at once a sign of pastoral charity and an incentive to it as well as being in a special way a source of spiritual fruitfulness in the world." Still, it must be acknowledged, celibacy is not demanded of the priesthood by its nature, as the practice of married clergy in the primitive church and the tradition of the Eastern churches bear witness.[68] Furthermore, since the 1950s the Latin [63] "Regular time each day for prayer, meditation, and spiritual reading is a sine qua non for the unfolding in a priest's life of authentic Christ-centeredness" (Bishops' Committee on Priestly Life and Ministry, The Priest and Stress, 18).

[65] Rel, 64. The Eastern code (CCEO 369) repeats most of the recommendations. While it does not mention mental prayer, it does stress the daily examination of conscience and the importance of spiritual direction.

W. Bassett and P. Huizing, Con 78 (1972) 57–75.

[68] The Eastern code, while affirming the value of celibacy, asserts the ancient practice of married clergy: "Clerical celibacy chosen for the sake of the kingdom of heaven and suited to the priesthood is to be greatly esteemed everywhere, as supported by the tradition of the whole Church; likewise, the hallowed practice of married clerics in the primitive Church and in the tradition of the Eastern Churches throughout the ages is to be held in honor" (CCEO 373). A requirement for the episcopate, however, is that a person "not be bound by a matrimonial bond" (CCEO 180, §3).

On December 23, 1929 the Sacred Congregation for the Eastern Church decreed: "Secular priests who have a wife shall not be admitted to exercise the sacred ministry in those countries [the Americas and Australia] but only celibate priests or widowers" (CLD 1, 20–21). The Eastern code states in canon 758, §3: "With respect to married men to be admitted to sacred orders, the particular law proper to each autonomous church or the special norms issued by the Apostolic See shall be observed." There is some doubt whether or not the 1929 norms of the Apostolic See are still in effect after the promulgation of the new Eastern code (D. Hamilton, "A Crucial Test for Optional Celibacy," America 176 [April 19, 1997] 13–15).

church has cautiously but increasingly permitted the ordination of former Protestant clergymen who are married.[69]

The appropriateness of celibacy to the priesthood rests on theological and spiritual grounds. It very effectively symbolizes the essence of the ministry. The priest is one entrusted with the ministry of Christ; the more complete his dedication, the more credible his work. Through celibacy the priest is consecrated in a new and excellent way to Christ, "for his sake and for the sake of the gospel" (Mk 10:29). "It is a special gift of God through which sacred ministers may more readily cling to Christ with undivided heart and dedicate themselves more freely in him and through him to the service of God and of men."[70]

The last section of article 16 of Presbyterorum ordinis attempts to answer the question of how the charism of celibacy that God gives to some (Mt 19:11) can be made obligatory for all priests.

> This sacred Council approves and confirms this legislation so far as it concerns those destined for the priesthood, and feels confident in the Spirit that the gift of celibacy, so appropriate to the priesthood of the New Testament, is liberally granted by the Father, provided those who share Christ's priesthood through the sacrament of Order, and indeed the whole Church, ask for the gift humbly and earnestly.

In the words of one commentator: "Priestly celibacy cannot be fully explained purely theoretically; in the end it is a matter of faith and spiritual experience, otherwise it cannot be fully lived out."[71]

> This argumentation makes sense only to the believing Christian; and it becomes all the easier to understand the more one sees the charisma of celibacy as something not extraordinary, but perfectly normal within the framework of God's gracious guidance. Moreover, one may not think of this charisma, that is so deeply embedded in a man's life, as something self-contained, complete, and given all at once, as something a man either has or has not. It should be conceived, rather, as something put by God into a man's concrete historical, anthropological and psychological situation, itself possessing a history and being an adventure—the adventure of faith.[72]

The positive focus of celibacy—"for the sake of the kingdom of heaven"—in the conciliar teaching as well as in the code, is a great improvement over past presentations. "All untenable motives for celibacy—arising from notions of cultic purity or from a subliminal depreciation of the body and of sexuality—are avoided, motives still commonly mentioned until quite recently in official documents."[73]

Under the present discipline, canon 1037 requires that before the reception of the diaconate a candidate who is not married must, in a prescribed rite, assume publicly before God and the Church the obligation of celibacy or have previously made a perpetual vow in a religious institute.

[69] R. Hill, "Ordination of Married Protestant Ministers," CLSAP 51 (1989) 95–100. In the United States a number of married former Episcopal clergymen have been ordained. For the process followed see the then Bishop Bernard Law, the delegate of the SCDF, in Origins 11 (1982) 517–519. The Bishops' Conference of England and Wales drew up statutes for admitting married former clergymen of the Church of England to the Roman Catholic priesthood. These statutes were approved by Pope John Paul II June 2, 1995 for a period of four years (Origins 25 [1995] 145–148).

According to canon 1042, 1° "a man who has a wife, unless he is legitimately destined to the permanent diaconate," is impeded from receiving orders. Canon 1031, §2 also envisions married men being ordained to the permanent diaconate. Canon 1087 declares flatly, "Those in sacred orders invalidly attempt marriage." The current discipline of the Latin church is, therefore, that only those married men intended for the permanent diaconate may receive orders and that no one already in orders may subsequently be married.

The 1980 draft of the code would have exempted widowed deacons from the aforementioned impediment sacred orders poses to marriage. Because the arguments for the retention and the suppression of the impediment for the widowed deacons were so difficult to evaluate, the Secretariat referred the decision to the Plenarium of the Commission in October 1981. Several reasons were listed for permitting widowed deacons to remarry. Since they had not chosen celibacy but had manifested a vocation to marriage at the time they were ordained, this burdensome obligation ought not be laid upon them. Often, moreover, there were children whose care by a hired servant would pose grave economic difficulty and the danger of incontinence. Other arguments were presented to preclude such remarriage. To permit an ordained minister to marry would be going against a millenarian and even an apostolic tradition;[74] it would thus be prejudicial to ecumenism insofar as it was at odds with the discipline of the Orthodox churches and contrary to the practice of the Eastern Catholic churches. Such an innovation was also seen as gravely injurious to sacerdotal celibacy. After weighing these considerations, the Plenarium by a vote of thirty-eight to thirteen affirmed that a widowed deacon could remarry and continue to exercise his order without special permission or dispensation.[75]

When the 1983 code was promulgated, however, it made no exception for widowed deacons: "Those in sacred orders invalidly attempt marriage" (c. 1087). In order for a deacon who has lost his wife to remarry, a dispensation must be sought from the Apostolic See (c. 1078, §2, 1°).[76] The dispensation has not been granted routinely. In a circular letter of June 6, 1997, the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments announced that the Holy Father had modified the "current norm which requires three cumulative and simultaneous conditions" to constitute "motivating exceptions for the granting of a dispensation from the prohibition of can. 1087." Henceforth "any one of the three following conditions taken singly" is sufficient "for a favorable consideration of the dispensation from this impediment, namely: (1) the great and proven usefulness of the ministry of the deacon to the dio-

[74] The early councils permitted the ordination of married men but did not allow the ordained to marry. At first there was a temporary concession. The Council of Ancyra (314 A.D.) in c. 10 declared: "If deacons at the time of their ordination declare they must marry, and that they cannot be continent, and if accordingly they marry, they may continue in their ministry, because the bishop gave them permission to marry; but if at the time of their ordination they were silent and received the imposition of hands and professed continence, and if later they marry, they ought to cease from their ministry" (Corpus Iuris Canonici, c. 8, Dist. 28). Shortly afterwards the Council of Neocaesarea (314–319) affirmed: "If a presbyter takes a wife, he ought to be deposed from the order" (Corpus Iuris Canonici, c. 9, Dist. 28). In 692 A.D. the Council of Trullo which established the basic law for the Eastern churches legislated: "If any ordained person contracts matrimony, let him be deposed; if he wishes to be married, he should become so before his ordination (c. 6, Apostolic Canons 26).

[75] Plen, 138–149, 292–308.

[76] In danger of death the local ordinary could dispense from the impediment in the case of deacons but not of priests (c. 1079, §1). The NCCB secretariat reported that on December 31, 1996 out of 11,868 permanent deacons in the U.S., 3.7 percent were widowers, and some of these were widowers before their ordination. The secretariat unofficially estimated that about half of the approximately forty petitions for widowed deacons to remarry which are submitted annually receive favorable action.

cese to which he belongs; (2) the fact that he has children of such a tender age as to be in need of motherly care; (3) the fact that he has parents or parents-in-law who are elderly and in need of care."[77]

As noted above, in recent years former Protestant clergymen have been ordained to the priesthood, even though they were married. The Canon Law Society of America has on several occasions addressed the issue of the ordination of married men in the Latin church. A report on the canonical implications of such ordinations was prepared for the society in 1996 by James A. Coriden and James H. Provost.[78] It "presumes the general law of the Church as it applies to all candidates for orders and all ordained ministers in the Church" as it considers the "specific issues raised when married men are being considered for ordination, or have been ordained." The first part of the report treats entrance into sacred ministry: discernment of vocation, formation for ministry, irregularities and impediments, the need of the Church, and assurance of support. The second part studies obligations and rights: the obligation to undertake an assignment; continence and celibacy; community of life; financial support; benefits; stability; and forbidden activities. The report concludes: "Some adjustments for these implications are already possible under the present canon law. The practice of the Roman curia provides guidance for other adjustments to meet these implications."

§2. Clerics are to behave with due prudence towards persons whose company can endanger their obligation to observe continence or give rise to scandal among the faithful.

Since clerics have committed themselves to perfect and perpetual continence, they are warned to be careful about those with whom they associate lest their commitment be endangered and the faithful scandalized.[79] The former code (CIC 133) was much more detailed. So as not to give rise to suspicion on the part of others, clerics were not to live under the same roof with or to frequently visit women. Clerics were permitted to dwell only with those whose natural kinship (mother, sister, aunt) or whose irreproachable character and maturity obviated any skepticism about the relationship. The present code does not single out women as the likely cause of scandal; the association with certain males could be just as harmful.

In view of the terrible scandals occasioned by child abuse, clerics must avoid any physical contact with minors that would provoke legitimate comment from reasonable people, such as hugging, tickling, or wrestling. Clerics should not invite children to their rooms or allow them to stay overnight in the rectory. It would also be very imprudent for clerics to go on outings, field trips, or vacations with children unless the parents or other adults were present. The civil law in most jurisdictions defines a minor as one under the age of eighteen.

§3. The diocesan bishop is competent to establish more specific norms concerning this matter and to pass judgment in particular cases concerning the observance of this obligation.

This paragraph affirms the possibility of the direct intervention and judgment of the diocesan bishop in matters concerning the observance of celibacy. The code refrains from establishing more determinate norms for the whole Church because circumstances vary so much from place to place. It is left to the bishop, therefore, to do so if he considers additional regulations to be necessary or useful. Earlier drafts called upon him to consult the presbyteral council before so acting. Presumably this requirement was seen as an infringement on the bishop's legislative power,[80] yet he is obliged, for example, to consult the council before issuing regulations on the allocation of stole fees (c. 531). In any event the bishop is still free, certainly, to seek advice from any source. The diocesan bishop also has the right to pass judgment on the observance of the obligation of celibacy in particular cases.

Provost, "Offenses against the Sixth Commandment: Toward a Canonical Analysis of Canon 1395," J 55 [1995] 650). The parallel canon in the Eastern code is expressed in more positive terms, emphasizing the virtue of chastity: "Clerics, celibate or married, are to excel in the virtue of chastity; it is for the particular law to establish suitable means for pursuing this end" (CCEO 374).

It is well within the competence of the bishop to enact norms regarding the association of clerics with minors and to judge inappropriate conduct. If penalties are to be imposed, he must carefully observe the law on sanctions in Book VI, especially canons 1394 and 1395.[81]

Clerical Associations

Canon 278 — §1. Secular clerics have the right to associate with others to pursue purposes in keeping with the clerical state.

The right of secular clerics[82] to form associations is acknowledged for the first time in canon law. Although canon 215 declares that the Christian faithful—which certainly includes clerics—are at liberty to establish organizations, special notice is taken of the clerical right to do so because of its importance and to remove any doubts about it.[83]

Even the right of the faithful to form associations with supernatural objectives was recognized only implicitly in the former code which commended them for joining organizations established by the Church (c. 684). The Sacred Congregation of the Council declared that this was indeed an authentic and natural right.[84] On December 10, 1949, the United Nations in its Universal Declaration of Human Rights asserted: "Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association. No one may be compelled to belong to an association" (art. 21). Pope John XXIII in his 1963 encyclical Pacem in Terris 24 offered a fuller explanation of the right.

> From the fact that human beings are by nature social, there arises the right of assembly and association. They have also the right to give the societies of which they are members the form they consider most suitable for the aim they have in view, and to act within such societies on their own initiative and on their own responsibility in order to achieve their desired objectives.... It is most necessary that a wide variety of societies or intermediate bodies be established, equal to the task of accomplishing what the individual cannot by himself efficiently achieve. These societies or intermediate bodies are to be regarded as an indispensable means in safeguarding the dignity and liberty of the human person, without harm to his sense of responsibility.[85]

The right of association is a natural right not dependent upon positive law or human concession. The council, too, insisted that since people are social by nature, they are called upon to exercise an apostolate not only as individuals but in groups. "The group apostolate is in happy harmony therefore with a fundamental need in the faithful, a need that is both human and Christian" (AA 18) and "while preserving intact the necessary link with ecclesiastical authority, the laity have the right to establish and direct associations, and to join existing ones" (AA 19).

[82] The term "secular" rather than "diocesan" clerics was used to distinguish them from clerics belonging to an institute of consecrated life or a society of apostolic life who may be engaged in the parochial ministry of a diocese (Comm 14 [1982] 171).

During the debate on Presbyterorum ordinis, one of the last conciliar documents to be approved, the commission charged with its drafting noted: "Priests cannot be denied what the council attentive to the dignity of human nature declared as belonging to the laity since it corresponds to natural law."[86] In presenting an intermediate draft of the decree, the commission rejected a proposal that associations of priests be placed under the diocesan bishop or the conference of bishops. These associations pertain to the personal life of priests and the exercise of their legitimate liberty.[87] From a juridical point of view, furthermore, such an exercise of episcopal power would give rise to confusion between the internal and external fora. Practically speaking, also, many priests, out of respect for their ordinary, would be morally forced to join associations directed by him. A polarization would result between diocesan priests who joined associations run by the bishop and those who did not.[88]

§2. Secular clerics are to hold in esteem especially those associations which, having statutes recognized by competent authority, foster their holiness in the exercise of the ministry through a suitable and properly approved rule of life and through fraternal assistance and which promote the unity of clerics among themselves and with their own bishop.

Paragraph two of the canon, without diminishing in any way the unqualified right of clerics to form associations, cites Presbyterorum ordinis in singling out certain associations. It especially commends those which by means of statutes recognized by the competent authority "foster priestly holiness in the exercise of the ministry through a suitable and properly approved rule of life and through brotherly help, and so aim at serving the whole order of priests" (PO 8).[89] They thus provide the clergy with fraternal support, encouragement to holiness in the ministry, and a means of promoting unity among themselves and with their bishop. These associations may be diocesan, national, or international in scope. Clerics are not asked to promote such approved societies or forbidden to form organizations whose statutes are not submitted to any authority for approval. This paragraph again refers to "secular" clerics and repeats the conciliar text except that it speaks of "competent authority" instead of "competent ecclesiastical authority."

§3. Clerics are to refrain from establishing or participating in associations whose purpose or activity cannot be reconciled with the obligations proper to the clerical state or can prevent the diligent fulfillment of the function entrusted to them by competent ecclesiastical authority.

Here clerics are prohibited from establishing or participating in organizations incompatible with their status or duties. Certainly groups that advocate or practice violence are antithetical to the clerical commitment. On March 8, 1982, the Congregation for the Clergy issued a Declaration on Associations of Priests, Politics and Labor. It identified as "irreconcilable with the clerical state, and therefore prohibited to all members of the clergy," those associations of clerics "which directly or indirectly, in a manifest or clandestine manner, pursue aims relating to politics, even if presented under the external aspect of wanting to [86] AcSynVat IV, pars 7, 168, responsum ad Modum 129.

[87] The Eastern code adds a qualification of the clerical right of association: "Clerics are free... to associate with others for the purpose of pursuing ends suitable to the clerical state. However, it belongs to the eparchial bishop to judge authentically concerning this suitability" (CCEO 391).

[88] AcSynVat IV, pars 6, 395.

[89] The qualification "statutes recognized by competent authority" was added to distinguish them from so-called "patriotic associations" in socialist states. The responsum ad Modum 30 noted that the associations the decree was promoting had their own juridic journey: they generally began with the approval of the bishop and finally in most instances ended with the sanction of the Apostolic See.

favor humanitarian ideals, peace and social progress." It saw these groups as sowing division in the Christian community and blurring the priestly mission. The declaration also stigmatized as "irreconcilable" with the clerical state those associations > which intend to unite deacons or presbyters in a type of "union" thus reducing their sacred ministry to a profession or career comparable to functions of a profane character. Such associations, in fact, compare the exercise of the functions of the ministerial priesthood to a relationship of work and thus can easily place the clerics in opposition to their holy pastors who become considered only as givers of work.[90]

At one time it was considered "not expedient" for clerics to become members or even attend meetings of the Rotary Clubs (CLD 1, 617; 3, 284). Today, however, they may participate fully in these organizations. In an allocution to the Rotary Clubs of Italy, Paul VI explained that previous "reservations" of the Church were based on a fear that the clubs might "either be infiltrated by false ideologies or come to be offered as an all-sufficient guide to life, to the exclusion of Christian ideals" (CLD 6, 511).

In 1973 the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith noted that "episcopal conferences have from the Apostolic See the faculty of permitting the inscription of clerics in the Rotary Club" but not in Masonic organizations (CLD 8, 456). The congregation reaffirmed the same point the next year: "The prohibition remains in every case against clerics and religious as well as members of secular institutes enrolling in any kind of Masonic association" (CLD 8, 1211). Canon 1374, however, forbids only in a general way membership in those associations which plot against the Church and does not single out the Masons in this connection. In an effort to settle the question, the congregation on November 26, 1983, shortly after the promulgation of the code, issued a "Declaration on Masonic Associations," which stated that the Church's position had not changed, that Catholic membership in Masonic lodges was still prohibited.[91]

Permanent deacons also have the right to form associations to "promote their spiritual life, to carry out charitable and pious works and pursue other objectives which are consonant with their sacramental consecration and mission." They, too, are forbidden to be involved with any association or group "even of a civil nature which is incompatible with the clerical state" or which impedes the fulfillment of their duties. Completely irreconcilable with the clerical state are associations which, "under the guise of representation, organize deacons into a form of trade(s) unions or pressure groups, thus reducing the sacred ministry to a secular profession or trade" or "would prejudice the direct and immediate relationship between every deacon and his bishop" (Directory for the Ministry and Life of Permanent Deacons, n. 11).

Continuing Education

Canon 279 — §1. Even after ordination to the priesthood, clerics are to pursue sacred studies and are to strive after that solid doctrine founded in sacred scripture, handed on by their predecessors, and commonly accepted by the Church, as set out especially in the documents of councils and of the Roman Pontiffs. They are to avoid profane novelties and pseudo-science.

§2. According to the prescripts of particular law, priests are to attend pastoral lectures held [90] Origins 11 (1982) 647. "Italian newspapers said the directive was aimed specifically at organizations like Priests for Peace in Hungary, Christian Reality in Yugoslavia, and Pacem in Terris in Czechoslovakia. These organizations were said to work in close collaboration with the Communist government and often to be in open conflict with the bishops of the nation" (ibid.). The English translation is also found in CLD 10, 15–19.

[91] See the commentary on c. 1374 and also R. E. Jenkins, "The Evolution of the Church's Prohibition against Catholic Membership in Freemasonry," J 56 (1996) 735–755.

after priestly ordination and, at times established by the same law, are also to attend other lectures, theological meetings, and conferences which offer them the opportunity to acquire a fuller knowledge of the sacred sciences and pastoral methods.

§3. They are also to acquire knowledge of other sciences, especially of those which are connected with the sacred sciences, particularly insofar as such knowledge contributes to the exercise of pastoral ministry.

The Second Vatican Council in several documents stressed the importance of the ongoing training of the clergy. Bishops were urged to encourage institutes and special congresses where priests might come for a renewal of life and "to acquire a deeper understanding of ecclesiastical studies, especially sacred scripture, theology, the more important social problems and new approaches to pastoral work" (CD 16). The fullest treatment of the subject is found in Presbyterorum ordinis. Priests are exhorted to study the scriptures as the primary source of sacred knowledge. They are to know the tradition of the Church as seen in the teachings of the councils and popes. It is also important for them to keep abreast of developments in secular culture.

Various means are suggested to facilitate study: "courses or congresses, the establishment of centers designed for pastoral studies, the founding of libraries and the proper direction of studies by suitable persons" (PO 19). To implement the conciliar directives, Paul VI in his motu proprio Ecclesiae sanctae (I, §7) in 1966 required special training for those newly ordained and a program of lectures on pastoral and theological matters for all priests. The Congregation for Catholic Education in January 1970 published a Ratio fundamentalis that included a section on post-seminary training (nn. 100–101). The 1973 Directory for Bishops stressed the need for a pastoral year immediately following ordination and periodic renewal courses for all priests (n. 114).

The bishops of the United States in The Program of Continuing Education of Priests (1972) affirmed "the right and obligation" of every priest "to continue his spiritual growth and education."[92] The Bishops' Committee on Priestly Life and Ministry in As One Who Serves (1977) noted that a priest's "right to strong support" in furthering his education included financial assistance.[93]

The first paragraph of canon 279 stating the obligation of clerics to continue their sacred studies is taken almost verbatim from the previous code (CIC 129) except for two concerns emphasized in the council: that the source of doctrine is sacred scripture, and that the tradition of the Church is to be found especially in the documents of the councils and of the popes. The Directory for the Life and Ministry of Priests explains the need for ongoing formation:

> Rapid and widespread transformations and a secularized social fabric typical of the contemporary world are what make unavoidable the priest's duty of being adequately prepared, so that he not lose his own identity and so that he might respond to the demands of the new evangelization. To this grave duty corresponds the specific right of the faithful, who feel the effects of priests' solid formation and sanctity in a definite way.[94]

This paragraph places the obligation of continuing education on all clerics, on bishops and permanent deacons as well as on priests. The NCCB Secretariat for the Diaconate conducted a survey in 1995. Almost 70 percent of the dioceses reported having a requirement for the continuing education of permanent deacons. The number of hours of education prescribed per year averaged slightly over twenty.[95] The Directory for the Ministry and Life of Permanent Deacons (nn. 63–92) treats extensively the indispensable obligation for both bishops and deacons to pursue an "adequate, integral formation" (n. 63). "With the approval of the bishop, a realistic program of ongoing formation should be drawn up in accordance with the present dispositions, taking due account of factors such as the age and circumstances of deacons, together with the demands made on them by their pastoral ministry" (n. 79).

The second paragraph of the canon requires priests[96] to attend pastoral lectures and theological meetings or conferences in order to develop their knowledge and pastoral techniques. If continuing education is to be effective, structures or programs must be established. It is imperative that they not only be planned but also actually implemented. "A clear work structure is called for: with objectives, specific topics and instruments to carry them out."[97] Particular law is to determine the specifics of the program. Some dioceses have also made available to the clergy more elaborate options such as the sabbatical.[98] After seven years of service one may be permitted to spend an extended period of time away from normal pastoral duties for purposes of enrichment. On an annual basis clergy may also be entitled to a certain number of days off to attend workshops or other continuing education courses. The priests' Directory insists that the priest himself is "the person primarily responsible for ongoing formation." Based on his capacities and specific talents, he "will strive to furnish himself with books and magazines with sound doctrine and of proven utility, for his spiritual life and the fruitful development of his ministry."[99] The continuing education obligation of the priest carries with it the right to be accorded sufficient time and resources for its fulfillment.

The last paragraph of the canon calls for priests[100] to cultivate other disciplines, especially those that will further their ministerial activity. The priests' Directory notes that "a special treatment must be reserved to the questions posed by scientific advances, which are especially influential to the mentality of contemporary men. Priests must be up-to-date and prepared to respond to questions that science may pose in its advancement."[101] The Eastern code succinctly charges clerics to acquire "as much knowledge of profane sciences, especially those sciences connected more intimately with the sacred sciences, such as those which cultured people ought to have" (CCEO 372, §3).

Common Life

Canon 280 — Some practice of common life is highly recommended to clerics; where it exists, it must be preserved as far as possible.

Although common life among diocesan clergy had been encouraged by regional councils and popes from the early Middle Ages, the 1917 code for the first time recommended it as a universal norm with specific application to the pastor and his assistants. Commentators agreed that the directive that a parochial assistant live in the rectory was a recommendation rather than a precept except where common life had been customary.

[96] Here the canon specifies priests (sacerdotes), the only canon among the obligations and rights that does not refer generically to clerici. The priests' Directory (n. 93) stresses the need for carefully organized formation in the first years of priesthood.

Some even held that a bishop could not impose it where a contrary custom prevailed.[102]

The common life is generally understood as living under the same roof and sharing the same table. It is not to be confused with the common life of religious that connotes especially a sharing of goods or property. No juridical bond arises as in a society with rules and a superior. The practice of clerics living together is a safeguard of celibacy and a means of fostering other virtues.

The Second Vatican Council, the first ecumenical council to treat the common life of the clergy, took up the subject in Presbyterorum ordinis. The bishops were sharply divided over how strongly to recommend community life. One group pointed out how difficult this type of life would be if love and forbearance were lacking. Thus the proposal that it be observed "to the greatest extent possible" was rejected. Another group sought a more emphatic formulation than that in the 1917 code, even if it were not yet feasible to prescribe a vita communis for all the clergy. The final text read:

> Moreover, in order to enable priests to find mutual help in cultivating the intellectual and spiritual life, to promote better cooperation amongst them in the ministry, to safeguard them from possible dangers arising from loneliness, it is necessary to develop some kind of common or shared life for them. This can take different forms according to varying personal and pastoral needs: by priests' living together where this is possible, or by their sharing a common table, or at least meeting at frequent intervals. (PO 8)

The Directory for Bishops also took note of the dangers of a solitary ministry. Bishops were warned to take "special care that priests, especially the young, are not left to work isolated or all alone, as can happen in small or almost deserted places, where for several days a week there is no opportunity to exercise the ministry." It is "very opportune that the bishop suggest ways for them to have community life."[103] Where no form of community life can be maintained, the bishop is urged to arrange "conferences at certain times for the sake of studies, piety and fraternal joy."[104] It is important for priests to experience and foster the sense of communion and solidarity.

The sources listed for canon 280 are the 1917 code (CIC 134), Presbyterorum ordinis 8, and the bishops' Directory, n. 112. The first example of community of life is a common residence. Several new canons in the code offer a means for fostering such a life-style. Although a pastor is ordinarily to live in a parish house close to the church, the local ordinary in particular cases may permit him to live in a house shared by several presbyters (c. 533, §1). Similarly, the parochial vicar, ordinarily obliged to live in the parish, may be permitted to reside in a house common to several priests. Where possible, some manner of common life between the pastor and the parochial vicars is to be encouraged (c. 550). The desire of several priests to live a common life could justify establishing a team ministry (c. 517, §1), "thus making the communio ministeriorum of the presbyterium a reality at the parochial level."[105]

When sharing a residence is not feasible, some measures of common life can still be realized. It is especially important for newly ordained priests and deacons to experience some form of common life in their pastoral year (Directory Priests, n. 82). Canon 275, §1 requires the clergy "to be united among themselves by a bond of brotherhood and prayer and to strive for cooperation among themselves." Bishops are urged to favor priests' associations that promote holiness "through a suitably regulated life and fraternal charity" (Directory for Bishops, no. 109c); the clergy are to hold such societies in high regard (c. 278, §2). Meetings that bishops must arrange for continuing education (c. 279, §2) are opportunities for the clergy to experience fraternal support and brotherhood. Communal participation in liturgical prayer is particularly recommended (Directory Priests, no. 29).

At the 1990 synod of bishops devoted to the formation of priests in contemporary circumstances, it was suggested that every diocese have a "kind of mother house for priests in which they could always feel welcome and be supported by their bishop and priest brothers."[106] Accordingly, the priests' Directory recommends a "House for Clerics" for holding meetings or gatherings and "also as a reference place for other various circumstances. Such a house should offer all the organizational structure which will make it comfortable and attractive."[107] In summary, one may define common life among diocesan priests as "a number of modes of living a shared life in which the sacramentally-based communion among priests is manifested."[108] Although the conciliar and later documents refer to priests and the presbyterate, the canon itself is addressed to all clerics. Some provision, therefore, must be made for community life among permanent deacons whether married or not.[109]

[109]"The mutual support and fraternity of deacons are not just sociologically or psychologically useful things; they are integral parts of the meaning of their vocation. Deacons are, therefore, encouraged to cultivate a sense of community among themselves. They have a diaconal ministry toward one another, too, which they can exercise in countless ways, both informally and formally, as, for example, by establishing regional or diocesan diaconal communities. In these communities, they can meet regularly to pray and to reflect together about their work, to address common problems, to study together, and to support one another." Clerical Remuneration and Support

Canon 281 — §1. Since clerics dedicate themselves to ecclesiastical ministry, they deserve remuneration which is consistent with their condition, taking into account the nature of their function and the conditions of places and times, and by which they can provide for the necessities of their life as well as for the equitable payment of those whose services they need.

Based on their dedication to the ministry, priests, according to the council, are entitled to a just remuneration; "the laborers deserve their wage" (Lk 10:7) and "they who proclaim the Gospel should get their living by the Gospel" (1 Cor 9:14). If, therefore, provision is not forthcoming from another source, "the faithful are duty bound to provide a decent and fitting livelihood for their priests." The obligation "arises from the fact that the priests are working for the benefit of the laity." Bishops should ensure "the decent support of those who hold or have held any office in God's service" (PO 20).

The council deliberately chose the term "remuneration" rather than "pay or salary" (merces) in order to avoid the usual association of "job and wages."[110] The performance of the ministry establishes a claim to remuneration but not in the same way that a laborer's work creates a right to wages. There could be situations in which the cleric's right would have to give way to the salvation of souls—"which must always be the supreme law in the Church" (c. 1752). The 1917 code, for example, permitted a parish to be erected even if fitting support of the pastor were unavailable, as long as at least the necessities of life could be met (CIC 1415, §3). The Pontifical Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code decided in 1945 that a bishop may not leave a parish unfilled because of the financial difficulties of the diocese.[111] The Third Plenary Council of Baltimore urged priests in charge of missions to be content with their income if it fell below that prescribed by the diocesan statutes. The bishop was not obliged to make up the difference later, if the pastor had received from church income sufficient funds for his shelter and sustenance (n. 273)

The Second Vatican Council went on to elaborate specifics of the support to which priests are entitled. With due regard for differences of time and place as well as the nature of the office held, "the remuneration to be received by each priest should be fundamentally the same for all living in the same circumstances." The amount should be in keeping with their status and "sufficient to ensure that they are able to pay those who work in their service and also are able to give to those in need" as well as to enjoy a vacation for themselves (PO 20).

The 1971 synod of bishops insisted that the fitting support of priests was a matter of justice. It declared that their remuneration, which "must be as far as possible, equitable and sufficient, is a duty of justice and must also include social security. Excessive differences in this matter must be removed, especially between priests of the same diocese or jurisdiction."[112]

Canon 281, which seeks to implement the conciliar texts on compensation, is applied to all clerics and not just to priests. It states that "since clerics dedicate themselves to ecclesiastical ministry, they deserve remuneration." It reiterates the conciliar direction that the remuneration be consistent with the nature of the office and in accord with conditions of time and place. The amount, then, would vary for a bishop, pastor, assistant pastor, transitional deacon, and so forth. What would be considered adequate in a Third World country would not be appropriate in the United States. Because of inflation and other economic fluctuations, adjustments should be made from time to time. Increments based on length of service may also be allowed. In general, a cleric's income should be sufficient to enable him to live with fitting dignity in conformity with the general economic conditions of his locality as well as meet the obligations to which he is subject.[113]

In addition to basic necessities, a suitable livelihood includes sufficient income for continuing education (c. 279), vacation (c. 283, §2), hospitality, charitable giving (c. 282, §2), and provision for the future. The canon further specifies that the cleric should be able to pay a just wage to those who provide him service. John Paul II, referring to clerics employed by the Holy See, noted that they should have the means "to carry out the duties of their state, including responsibilities which they may have in certain cases toward parents or other family members dependent on them."[114]

The context of this canon, in the chapter on rights and obligations of clerics, indicates that the remuneration of the clergy is indeed a matter of right, but it is difficult to determine whether or not it is a right in the strict sense. In fact, nothing is said here about who has the obligation of providing the remuneration. Note that neither the conciliar text (PO 20) nor the canon affirms a right on the part of the cleric.[115]

Another difficulty presents itself. Is the remuneration due to the fact that the cleric performs ministerial work or due simply to his incardination into the particular church "for whose service he has been advanced" (c. 266, §1)? The answer has been advanced" (c. 266, §1)? The answer would seem to rest on the meaning of the introductory clause, which begins with the Latin "cum" and has the verb in the indicative mood. Is the "cum" to be translated "since" (causal sense) or "when" (temporal sense)? The approved translation above has decided in favor of the causal "since." According to the rules of Latin grammar, however, "cum," when followed by a verb in the indicative mood, indicates "when" (temporal); while "cum" with a verb in the subjunctive mood indicates "since" (cause). The 1977 draft used the subjunctive mood, which clearly called for the translation, "since they dedicate themselves to the ministry." The final promulgated text uses the indicative mood and the main verb was also changed from the forceful "they must receive remuneration" (1977 version) to the present weaker "they deserve remuneration." Unless an authentic interpretation of the canon rules otherwise, one could make the argument, at least on the basis of grammar, that a cleric deserves remuneration from the Church when he devotes himself to ecclesiastical ministry. The canon "bases remuneration on the fact that the cleric performs an ecclesiastical office, independently of whether or not he is incardinated into the diocese or institute in which he performs this office."[116]

If clerics who are engaged in the ministry deserve remuneration, what may be said of those who are not so engaged? Do all the clergy deserve remuneration or only those who actively engage in the ministry? (Sick and retired clergy are covered in the next paragraph.) The code distinguishes between "remuneration" (as treated in this canon) and "decent support."[117] Canon 269, 1° forbids a diocesan bishop to incardinate a cleric unless "the necessity or advantage of his own particular church demands it, and without prejudice to the prescripts of the law concerning the decent support of clerics." Similarly, canon 384 states that the diocesan bishop "is to take care that provision is made for [the] decent support and social assistance [of his priests], according to the norm of law." Remuneration, on the other hand, is a term that extends beyond what is necessary to meet basic needs. As defined above, it is an amount sufficient to allow, in accordance with the cleric's condition, for continuing education, a vacation, and other reasonable amenities.

Though the Latin code does not assert specifically a cleric's right to ministry, as does the Eastern code (CCEO 371, §l), the right to exercise the ministry to which one has been ordained is clearly understood in the law. Rincón Pérez maintains that so long as a cleric is willing to accept an assignment, "the bishop is obliged to provide him not only with basic decent support, but also with remuneration in keeping with his condition."[118]

The "right to exercise orders can be limited only in one of two ways: the imposition of a penalty, or the declaration of an impediment from the exercise of a sacred order which has been received" (cf. c. 1044).[119] Canon 1336, §1, 2° provides that a cleric's right can be restricted by means of an expiatory penalty. Here the right to exercise ministry and the right to remuneration are at issue. Thus, through the infliction of a penalty the remuneration of a cleric could be severely impacted. Canon 1350, §1, however, insists that when penalties are imposed, except that of dismissal from the clerical state, "provision must always be made so that he [the cleric] does not lack those things necessary for his decent support."

The canon on remuneration clearly does not require that the amount be the same for all clerics.

[116] V. De Paolis, "The Maintenance of the Clergy," in Latourelle I: 683.

[117] CCEO 390, §1 clearly distinguishes the two: "Clerics have the right to a suitable sustenance and to receive a just remuneration for carrying out the office or function committed to them."

[118] T. Rincón Pérez, Manual de Derecho Canónico, ed. Instituto Martin de Azpilcueta (Pamplona: EUNSA, 1988) 197–198 cited in J. Provost, "Effects of Incardination," Clergy Procedural Handbook (Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1992) 48. It would seem that a cleric "who stubbornly refuses to accept any and all assignments from his bishop has no claim on remuneration," translator's note, Pamplona ComEng 234.

[119] G. Ingels, RRAO 1997, 37.

The remuneration is to be "consistent with their condition, taking into account the nature of their function and the conditions of places and times." It is left to particular law to determine the circumstances and conditions that will affect it. "Thus, a diocesan bishop does have the right to establish policies regarding the remuneration of clergy who are unable to exercise the ministry or are impeded from that exercise."[120]

The case of a cleric who has become ineligible for assignment because of culpable criminal activity is particularly complicated. As noted above, complete clerical support may be withdrawn only through the penalty of dismissal from the clerical state (canon 1350, §1). If the cleric is able to support himself in a secular job, the bishop, according to canonists, would fulfill the obligation of support by helping him during the transitional period. "It does not seem that it is the diocese's responsibility to care for the rest of his life for a priest who committed serious crimes, especially if he was informed beforehand of their gravity and the consequences. The priest must assume responsibility for his own actions."[121]

§2. Provision must also be made so that they possess that social assistance which provides for their needs suitably if they suffer from illness, incapacity, or old age.

After considering clerics actively engaged in the ministry, the canon in its second paragraph requires that provision be made for those who are ill, incapacitated, or elderly. The law is merely applying to the clergy a right which John XXIII affirmed as belonging to every human being: "the right to security in case of sickness, inability to work, widowhood, old age, unemployment, or in any other case in which he is deprived of the means of subsistence through no fault of his own" (Pacem in terris 11). "In countries where social security has not yet been adequately organized for the benefit of clergy, episcopal conferences are to make provision... for the setting up of diocesan organizations... for the proper support of priests who suffer from ill health, disability or old age" (PO 21).[122] The NCCB on November 18, 1987, adopted "Norms for Priests and Their Third Age," which deal with retirement and health care issues.[123] "The bishop normally should allow any priest to retire when he has reached the age of seventy-five." "Each diocese should guarantee that priests be given adequate support through a long-range, financially independent, and professionally managed pension fund." The dioceses are advised to avail themselves of the resources and expertise "provided by national organizations both within and outside the Church."

§3. Married deacons who devote themselves completely to ecclesiastical ministry deserve remuneration by which they are able to provide for the support of themselves and their families. Those who receive remuneration by reason of a civil profession which they exercise or have exercised, however, are to take care of the needs of themselves and their families from the income derived from it.

This paragraph concerns married deacons.[124] Those who work full time in the ministry are to receive remuneration sufficient to maintain themselves and their families.[125] This provision specifies one implication of the first paragraph to the effect that clerics deserve remuneration in accord with their condition, which in this case is that of a married person. The paragraph also includes the exception made in the motu proprio restoring the permanent diaconate to the effect that those who practice a secular profession should support themselves and their families from its income. However, the important qualification that they support themselves from secular income "insofar as possible" which appears in the motu proprio is omitted in the canon.[126] Number 119 of the 1984 NCCB diaconate guidelines restates this text of the code.[127] It then continues: "Expenses incurred by deacons in the exercise of their ministry should be recompensed by the agency, institution, or diocese for which the ministry was undertaken." Nothing is said about deacons whose secular income is not enough to provide sufficient remuneration to support their families. Nor is anything said either in the canon or in the Guidelines about remuneration for deacons who serve on a part-time basis or about the support that is due those deacons who lose their secular jobs or the support of their families in case of death.[128] If, however, according to canon 231, §2 lay persons who devote themselves to special service of the Church have the right to remuneration to provide decently for themselves and their family as well as a "right for their social provision, social security, and health benefits," deacons, too, must be so entitled. Canon 1274, §1 requires, furthermore, that a special fund be set up in every diocese "for the support of clerics who offer service for the benefit of the diocese, unless provision is made for them in another way." Paragraph two of the same canon mandates the episcopal conference in an area where no other provision exists to establish a fund "which provides sufficiently for the social security of clerics."

The Directory for the Ministry and Life of Permanent Deacons requires deacons who are professionally employed "to provide for their own upkeep from the ensuing emoluments" (n. 15). Both celibate and married deacons who minister full time "have a right to be remunerated according to the general principle of law (c. 281.1) should they have no other source of income" (nn. 17–18). The Directory acknowledges the difficulty in attempting to draw up general norms concerning the upkeep of deacons "which are binding in all circumstances, given the great diversity of situations in which deacons work, in various particular churches and countries (n. 15). "It is for particular law to provide opportune norms in the complex matter of reimbursing expenses, including, for example, that those entities and parishes which benefit from the ministry of a deacon have an obligation to reimburse him those expenses incurred in the exercise of his ministry" (n. 20). "Particular law may also determine the obligation devolving on the diocese when a deacon, through no fault of his own, becomes unemployed. Likewise, it will be opportune to define the extent of diocesan liability with regard to the widows and orphans of deceased deacons. Where possible, deacons, before ordination, should subscribe to a mutual assurance (insurance) policy which affords cover for these eventualities" (n. 20).

[125] SDO, IV, n. 19, CLD 6, 581. The employment of permanent deacons in the United States was included in the 1995 survey. About 5 percent of the deacons receive some compensation for diaconal ministry, 5 percent for other ministries. Some 3.4 percent are salaried in full-time ministry, 1.6 percent in part-time ministry; 5.5 percent are salaried in positions such as diocesan director of finance, director of the diocesan diaconate program, and director of religious education (National Study, 18).

[126] SDO, IV, n. 21, CLD 6, 581. The canon also omits the provision in SDO n. 20 that "it will be up to the episcopal conference to make specific rules on the decent support of a deacon and of his family if he is married, in accordance with local circumstances." The responsibility is left, therefore, to the diocesan bishop.

[127] Bishops' Committee on the Permanent Diaconate, rev. ed. (Washington, D.C.: NCCB, 1984).

[128] RRAO 1995, 45–50. The Eastern code recognizes the right that families of clerics have to support: "[Clerics] also have the right that there be provided for themselves as well as for their families, if they are married, suitable pension funds, social security as well as health benefits" (CCEO 390, §2).

Canon 282 — §1. Clerics are to foster simplicity of life and are to refrain from all things that have a semblance of vanity.

After affirming their right to a decent livelihood, the law considers how the clergy ought to use temporal goods. This canon is based on Presbyterorum ordinis 17 which invites priests to "embrace voluntary poverty" in order to "become more clearly conformed to Christ and more ready to devote themselves to the sacred ministry." Priests and bishops alike are "to avoid everything that might in any way antagonize the poor"; "they are to put aside all appearance of vanity in their surroundings" so that "nobody, even the humblest, is ever afraid to visit."

The canon interprets the council's call to voluntary poverty to mean a simple life-style, one that avoids ostentation and luxury. As in the previous canon concerned with clergy support, circumstances of time and place must be taken into account. What would be considered a luxury in one age or locality might be commonplace in another.

§2. They are to wish to use for the good of the Church and works of charity those goods which have come to them on the occasion of the exercise of ecclesiastical office and which are left over after provision has been made for their decent support and for the fulfillment of all the duties of their own state.

Whatever monies bishops and priests receive from the exercise of an ecclesiastical office they are to use primarily for their own decent support and the fulfillment of their duties of state. Any surplus, according to the council, they "should be willing to devote" to the good of the Church or to works of charity. They are not to regard "an ecclesiastical office as a source of profit and are not to spend the income accruing from it for increasing their own fortunes" (PO 17).

The canon, therefore, exhorts clerics to use any funds derived from an ecclesiastical office which are not necessary for the maintenance of their status for the good of the Church and for charitable purposes. The 1977 draft of the canon was more preceptive in character, "they should use" (destinent), but was deliberately adjusted to "they are to wish to use" (velint impendere).[129] Clerics are thus urged rather than obliged to use superfluous funds in this way. Such monies should not be used for personal enrichment or for investment as capital. The canon is referring to all emoluments received by clerics in the performance of their official duties. Certainly what a cleric inherits or earns by use of his talents in writing or musical composition may be freely accumulated. Clerics, like all the faithful, are bound to assist the poor from their own resources (c. 222, §2). The universal law does not speak of the obligation to make a will in view of varying circumstances throughout the world;[130] however, particular law may well provide suitable norms in this matter.[131]

Clerical Residence and Vacation

Canon 283 — §1. Even if clerics do not have a residential office, they nevertheless are not to be absent from their diocese for a notable period of time, to be determined by particular law, without at least the presumed permission of their proper ordinary.

A cleric must ordinarily reside within his diocese. Since one is ordained for the good of the diocese, he is supposed to have some assignment or at least be at the disposition of the bishop should a need for his services arise. A bishop may permit individual clerics to reside outside the diocese for the good of the Church (c. 271), for personal reasons such as health or continuing education (c. 279, §2), and for any reason he judges justifiable. Particular law will determine the length of time beyond which a cleric needs the permission of his bishop in order to be legitimately absent. Presumed permission means the prudent judgment of the cleric that under the circumstances the bishop would approve his leaving the diocese. The Commission Secretariat noted that this canon also applies to permanent deacons.[132]

[131] The Eastern canon 385, §1 is quite similar to this canon in the Latin code but speaks of all the temporal goods a cleric possesses and not just those acquired through the exercise of an ecclesiastical office.

Pastors and parochial vicars responsible for the pastoral care of the faithful are bound by special regulations.[133] Canon 533, §2 requires a pastor who will be away from his parish beyond a week to inform the local ordinary of his absence.[134] According to canon 550, §1 the parochial vicar is obliged to live within the parish or, if appointed for different parishes jointly, in one of them. Nevertheless, for a just cause, the local ordinary can allow him to reside elsewhere, especially in a house shared by several presbyters.

§2. They are entitled, however, to a fitting and sufficient time of vacation each year as determined by universal or particular law.

Presbyterorum ordinis states forcefully: "Priests' remuneration should be such as to allow the priest a proper holiday each year. The bishop should see to it that priests are able to have a holiday" (PO 20). In the 1977 draft of the canon the annual vacation was explicitly called a right (ius) of clerics.[135] Without explanation the text was later changed to "clerics are entitled to" a vacation.[136] The length of the vacation was to be determined by general or particular law.

The code specifies certain norms for those who hold residential offices. It permits a pastor to take a month's vacation every year, not counting the time spent on retreat (c. 533, §2). The same amount of vacation time is granted the parochial vicar (c. 550, §3). The month may be continuous or spread out in several periods during the year. This time is in addition to the one or two days off each week that clerics enjoy by custom, at least in the United States. The diocesan bishop may not be absent from his diocese beyond a period of one month, whether that period be a continuous one or an interrupted one; the time spent at the bishops' meetings is not counted (c. 395 §2). As for the coadjutor bishop and the auxiliary bishop, "except for the fulfillment of some other office outside the diocese or for the sake of vacation, which should not extend beyond one month, they should not leave the diocese but for a short period of time (c. 410). Particular law will regulate the vacations of those who do not hold residential offices."[137] The canon says simply that it be annual, fitting, and sufficient (debito et sufficienti quotannis gaudeant). To be fitting it should conform to the simple lifestyle called for in the previous canon.

Clerical Dress

Canon 284 — Clerics are to wear suitable ecclesiastical garb according to the norms issued by the conference of bishops and according to legitimate local customs.

On September 8, 1982, Pope John Paul II wrote to the papal vicar of Rome instructing him to promulgate norms regarding the use of clerical and religious garb in the Diocese of Rome. The pope acknowledged that although there are "motivations of an historical, environmental, psychological or social order which can be proposed to the contrary," "motivations of an equal nature exist" in favor of a distinctive attire. He added that the arguments against clerical garb "appear more of a purely human than ecclesiological character." In the pope's view a distinctive sign is valuable "not only because it contributes to the propriety of the priest in his external behavior or in the exercise of his ministry but above all because it gives evidence within the ecclesiastical community of the public witness that each priest is held to give of his own identity and special belonging to God."

[132] Rel, 63.

[133] "Even if a diocesan bishop has a coadjutor or auxiliary, he is bound by the law of personal residence in the diocese" (c. 395, §1).

The modern secular city where "the sense of the sacred is so frighteningly weakened" needs "the sign value that religious dress constitutes."[138]

The 1994 Directory for the Life and Ministry of Priests treated the obligation of ecclesiastical attire in article 66. It referred to the pope's letter which stressed how important it was in a secularized and materialistic society "that the community be able to recognize the priest, man of God and dispenser of his mysteries, by his attire... which is an unequivocal sign of his dedication and his identity as a public minister." Certainly the priest should be primarily identifiable through his conduct, but his manner of dress also makes known to everyone that he belongs to God and the Church. The priests' Directory then clarifies what the canon means by clerical attire: it must be different from lay dress, and conform to the dignity and sacredness of his ministry; its "style and color should be established by the Episcopal Conference" in accord with universal law. "Because of their incoherence with the spirit of this discipline, contrary practices cannot be considered legitimate customs and should be removed by the competent authority. Outside of entirely exceptional cases, a cleric's failure to wear this proper ecclesiastical attire could manifest a weak sense of his identity as one consecrated to God."[139]

Shortly after the appearance of the priests' Directory, a Brazilian bishop wrote to the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts inquiring whether the section on clerical dress is merely pastoral and exhortative or whether it is also juridically binding. The council responded that though the priests' Directory is permeated by a profound pastoral spirit, as a general executory decree it has prescriptive force, obliging those who are bound by the laws with which it deals (c. 32). General executory decrees "more precisely determine the methods to be observed in applying the law" (c. 31, §1). Thus article 66 of the priests' Directory contains a general norm which complements canon 284: clerical dress must be distinct from that of the laity; its style and color are to be determined by the episcopal conference. Contrary practices cannot be considered legitimate custom and must be removed by competent ecclesiastical authority. The diocesan bishop is the competent authority to urge obedience to this discipline and to remove contrary practices (c. 392, §2).[140]

In November 1998 the NCCB enacted legislation for the United States which will need final Roman approval. "A black suit and the Roman collar are the appropriate attire for priests, especially in the exercise of their ministry. The use of a cassock in church or at home is at the discretion of the cleric." Rules for wearing the religious habit will be determined by each clerical institute or society.[141]

Inappropriate Clerical Activity

For the last five canons in this chapter on the obligations and rights of clerics, the sources listed in the annotated version of the 1983 code are almost all taken from the 1917 code and pre-Vatican II documents. The canons consider certain negative obligations of clerics, such as avoiding unbecoming and alien pursuits, civil office, trade and business, partisan and political activity, and military service. In the absence of conciliar guidance, when the code repeats the former law, it is to be assessed in accord with the canonical tradition (c. 6). Exceptions from many of the restrictions binding clerics are made in the case of permanent deacons and are noted in a separate canon.[142]

Canon 285 — §1. Clerics are to refrain completely from all those things which are unbecoming to their state, according to the prescripts of particular law.

Certain activities are forbidden, not because they are evil in themselves but insofar as they are unbecoming to the clerical state. Since the attitude of the people is critical in determining what is unfitting for a cleric, the relativity of time and place must be considered. As "set apart in some way in the midst of the People of God," clerics are "witnesses and dispensers of a life other than that of this earth" (PO 3). They must, therefore, maintain a position of dignity in the eyes of the faithful.

The 1917 code (CIC 138), after stating the principle that clerics are to abstain absolutely from all things unbecoming their state, proceeded to list a number of examples. They were not to engage in unfitting trades and professions, e.g., such occupations as bartenders, jailers, and taxicab drivers. They were not to gamble habitually or play games with considerable money stakes. They were not to carry weapons unless there was just reason for taking such precaution. The former code (CIC 140) also forbade the clergy to attend certain entertainments. They were not to be present at spectacles that would be unbecoming the clerical state or give rise to scandal among the people. Among the objectionable spectacles, commentators listed professional prize fights, horse racing, and risqué theatrical productions.

The 1983 code simply states the general rule that clerics should wholly avoid all those things that are unbecoming their state in accordance with the prescripts of particular law. Obviously many of the activities once considered inappropriate for clerics have ceased to be so.[143] People have grown more tolerant, and clerics are no longer looked upon as semi-cloistered individuals on a pedestal. The Church always expects, nevertheless, that they will conduct themselves in such a way as to maintain the respect of the community at large. In their lives they should witness to the higher values and tastes of society. If necessary, particular law can specify what activity in a given locality would threaten societal esteem of clerics.

Worker Priests

An experiment known as the "Worker Priests," which involved about one hundred individuals, was carried out in France and Belgium from 1944 to 1959. As a means of evangelizing the lower classes, priests took jobs in factories, at docks, and in the construction industry. They supported themselves by their labor without seeking any privileges.

Though such intimate contacts proved beneficial to the cause of religion, they also endangered the spiritual life of the priests. In 1953 the three French cardinals following an interview with the Holy Father declared that the experiment in its present form could not be continued and established several norms for the future. The priests assigned to this apostolate were to spend only a limited time each day in manual labor so as to "safeguard their readiness to meet all the exigencies of their priestly state." They were not to accept any assignments "which might lead to responsibilities in connection with labor unions or other offices which should be left to laymen." Finally, they were not to live by themselves but attached to a parish in which they were to collaborate.[144]

On July 3, 1959, in response to Cardinal Feltin's petition that some priests be allowed to work in factories full time, and not as heretofore only three hours a day, the Holy Office decided that the experiment should be ended. As Cardinal Pizzardo explained, in order to evangelize the workers "it is not absolutely necessary to send priests as workers into the centers of labor, and it is not possible to sacrifice the traditional concept of the priesthood to this objective, which is nevertheless one to which the Church clings as one of her most cherished missions." Working in factories or yards is "incompatible with the life and duties of a priest." Besides being unable to fulfill all his duties of prayer, "working in factories or even in less important projects exposes the priest little by little to the dangers of being influenced by his surroundings." The Holy See, the letter continued, asks the bishops of France to consider whether the time has not come to supplement various lay apostolates by creating one or more secular institutes composed of both priests and lay members. The latter could work in factories without limitation of time and the priests could provide the necessary spiritual formation. A gradual phasing out of the current system was allowed "so as to avoid any hasty and too general change or dangerous disturbance in the workers' apostolate."[145]

The council, however, contradicted "the alarming arguments which Cardinal Pizzardo had used in his letter."[146] Presbyterorum ordinis observed that although priests are > assigned different duties, yet they fulfill the one priestly service for the people.... This is true whether the ministry they exercise be parochial or supra-parochial; whether their task be research or teaching, or even if they engage in manual labor and share the lot of the workers, where that appears to be of advantage and has the approval of the competent authority. (PO 8).

The reference to worker priests was disputed up to the last draft. The compromise formula states that "competent authority has to approve" such activity, but does not identify that authority.[147]

On October 23, 1965, the bishops of France announced that they were authorizing with the consent of the Holy See "a small number of priests to work full time in factories and yards after a suitable period of preparation." The authorization for manual-wage work was that it was called "an essentially priestly mission" and was to be for an initial period of three years. The Holy See laid down three conditions: (1) the priests must not have responsibility for any labor union activity; (2) they are not to live alone but in pairs or groups and together with other priests so as to avoid a contrast between two categories of priests; and (3) there should be in the same place lay members of the Workers' Catholic Action so that the Church may appear to the workers as it really is, "the laity with their temporal engagements and the priests with their spiritual engagement."[148]

The 1971 synod of bishops affirmed that as a general rule "the priestly ministry ought to be a full-time occupation. Sharing in men's secular activities is by no means to be considered the principal aim nor can such participation suffice to give expression to the specific responsibility of priests. In concrete circumstances it is up to the bishop with his presbyterium and, if necessary, in consultation with the episcopal conference to determine whether secular activity is in accord with the priestly ministry."[149]

Activity Foreign to Clerics

§2. Clerics are to avoid those things which, although not unbecoming, are nevertheless foreign to the clerical state.

Besides activities that are incompatible with the dignity of the clerical state, there are occupations that are foreign to it, but some are not so irreconcilable that they can never be undertaken. The 1917 code (CIC 139) enumerated some of the professions that, though not considered debasing, were hardly congruent with the spiritual mission of the ministry. Without an apostolic indult, for example, clerics were not to practice medicine or surgery. The new code states only the general principle without any specifics, beyond what is contained in the two following paragraphs of the canon. Again, local sensibilities must be considered in determining what activity is foreign to the clerical state as well as in judging what is wholly unbecoming. At least one commentary holds that the 1961 ban on clerics and religious practicing psychoanalysis is still in force.[150] The Eastern code requires a cleric to obtain the permission of his own proper hierarch in order to exercise any civil profession (CCEO 371, §3).[151]

Public Office

§3. Clerics are forbidden to assume public offices which entail a participation in the exercise of civil power.

Lumen gentium 31 carefully distinguished the roles of the laity and the clergy. "To be secular is the special characteristic of the laity. Although those in holy orders may sometimes be engaged in secular activities, or even practice a secular profession, yet by reason of their particular vocation they are principally and expressly ordained to the sacred ministry.... It is the special vocation of the laity to seek the kingdom of God by engaging in temporal affairs and directing them according to God's will."

Insofar as the clergy are men of the Church, their engagement in politics could cause confusion regarding the religious mission of the Church. The 1971 synod of bishops explained: "Since political options are by nature contingent and never in an entirely adequate and perennial way interpret the Gospel, the priest, who is the witness of things to come, must keep a certain distance from any political office or involvement." Whereas the values of the gospel are absolute and independent of culture, politics is rooted in the concrete circumstances of the here and now. "In order to remain a valid sign of unity and be able to preach the Gospel in its entirety," the priest must take care "lest his opinion appear to Christians to be the only legitimate one or become a cause of division among the faithful."[152]

The 1983 code rules definitively without qualification that "clerics are forbidden to hold public offices that call for the exercise of civil power."[153] The 1981 Relatio (p. 68) interpreted "civil power" to include legislative, administrative, and judicial authority.[154] The canon is concerned with the exercise of public authority. The prohibition extends beyond serving as governor, mayor, judge, senator, and the like, to serving on zoning boards, school boards, transportation commissions, and similar bodies.[155] However, merely advisory positions would not be banned. The law speaks of "assuming" office, which includes both election and appointment to office. Members of religious institutes (c. 672) and of societies of apostolic life (c. 739) are also bound by this canon.

The possibility of exceptions to the prohibition is not raised in the canon. In the 1977 draft (c. 146, §2) there was a provision for the local ordinary to give permission for a cleric to hold such office, but this proviso was ultimately eliminated. Furthermore, the prohibition was strengthened in the final version by the use of the term vetantur instead of the subjunctive verb ne assumant. Canon 1042, §2 makes the holding of a public office an impediment to ordination until the office is relinquished and an account rendered according to the civil law.

[151] The Eastern code also obliges clerics "to abstain completely from all those things unbecoming to their state, according to the norms determined in detail by particular law, and also to avoid those things which are alien to it" (CCEO 382).

The question arises, therefore, whether or not the diocesan bishop may dispense from the law forbidding clerics to hold public office. According to canon 87, §1 the bishop may dispense from universal disciplinary laws as often as he judges it helpful for the spiritual good of the faithful and when the matter has not been reserved to the Apostolic See. The motu proprio De episcoporum muneribus of Paul VI (1966) specifically reserved to the Holy See any dispensation permitting clerics "to assume public offices which involve the exercise of lay jurisdiction or administration,"[156] but this reservation is not found in the present code.[157] However, John Paul II's adamant opposition to priests and religious serving in public office would urge a bishop to use great caution in evaluating the "just and reasonable cause" required for a dispensation (c. 90).[158]

Canon 288 exempts permanent deacons from the prohibition unless particular law states otherwise. The 1984 Guidelines on the Diaconate of the NCCB (n. 131) stipulate: "While the Code of Canon Law permits permanent deacons to hold political office, a deacon should consult with his bishop before seeking or accepting such an office. In particular cases, the bishop may forbid such an undertaking."[159]

Financial Involvement

§4. Without the permission of their ordinary, they are not to take on the management of goods belonging to lay persons or secular offices which entail an obligation of rendering accounts. They are prohibited from giving surety even with their own goods without consultation with their proper ordinary. They also are to refrain from signing promissory notes, namely, those through which they assume an obligation to make payment on demand.

This paragraph repeats the 1917 code (CIC 139, §3 and 137) with a slight modification (the substitution of "proper" ordinary for "local" ordinary in the second sentence) and the addition of the reference to promissory notes. The twofold purpose of this regulation, according to the older commentators, was to safeguard clerical decorum and to prevent distractions that would interfere with ministerial duties.[160]

[156] IX, 3, b, CLD 6, 398.

[157] In a similar case (the right of a bishop to dispense from the canonical form for the marriage of two Catholics) the Pontifical Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code rendered an authentic interpretation that the reservation imposed by De episcoporum muneribus (XVII; CLD 6, 399) was still in effect. The commission did not give a reason for its interpretation. According to Wrenn, the likely reason was that "throughout the process of drafting the new Code, it was always understood by the drafting commission that such a dispensation was reserved to the Apostolic See" (L. Wrenn, Authentic Interpretations on the 1983 Code [Washington, D.C.: CLSA, 1993] 22).

[158] A. McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 163. For some examples of priests in the United States barred from office and for texts of John Paul II on the issue, see J. Lynch, in CLSA Com, 224. Theodore McCarrick noted in "The Integration of Catholics and American Political Life": "As you know, the church (especially the present pontiff) has admonished priests and religious against running for public office or serving in political offices because such activity is not consistent with the primary commitment of priestly ministry or religious life, but is more appropriately the realm of the lay person" (Origins 17 [June 18, 1987] 80).

[159] The prohibition about holding public office does, however, apply to all religious (c. 672).

[160] "This ruling may seem harsh, but cases brought before the Roman Curia prompted a severer course in order to protect the clerical state from slanders and insinuations which are never so rife as when a clergyman makes mistakes in money matters" (C. Augustine, A Commentary on the New Code of Canon Law [St. Louis: B. Herder, 1919) II: 86). "The emphasis of the council and recent church teaching on the dignity of the priest is not well reflected in this norm. Little attempt was made by the consultors to update it taking into account the mature responsibility of the priest. The study group wanted the details of these prohibitions to be assigned to particular law so as better to address modern circumstances; the new canon still presumes a lack of maturity and responsibility in the diocesan priest" (Schneider, 272).

Clerics are not to manage the money or property of lay people without the permission of their ordinary. They need permission, therefore, to be guardians of children, executors of wills, or trustees of funds. They would, of course, be permitted to handle the affairs of relatives or close friends who were dependent upon them. They must also have authorization to hold secular offices for which they are legally accountable, such as an official in a savings bank, a cooperative, or a charitable association.

Without consulting their ordinary, clerics are not to give surety (e.g., bail), even with their own goods, or to sign promissory notes obliging themselves to pay money on demand. One member of the commission sought to eliminate this clause or at least to substitute an exhortation in place of the necessary permission of the bishop. The secretariat responded that for the sake of prudence the text should remain as it is.[161] Again this paragraph does not apply to permanent deacons (c. 288) but it does apply to religious (c. 672).

The 1977 draft included a fourth paragraph (CIC 139, §3) inhibiting clerics from hailing anyone before a lay tribunal or having any part in a lay criminal trial, even to the extent of giving testimony without necessity, unless they had the permission of their ordinary. This paragraph was subsequently dropped.[162]

Business or Trade

Canon 286 — Clerics are prohibited from conducting business or trade personally or through others, for their own advantage or that of others, except with the permission of legitimate ecclesiastical authority.

Clerics are barred from engaging in business. An interpretation of this highly technical and complicated canon must be based on canon 142 of the 1917 code and a 1950 decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, the only sources indicated in the annotated edition of the current code. The 1983 code is the same as the former one except for the provision that legitimate ecclesiastical authority may permit such activity. Clerics are forbidden to engage in negotiatio aut mercatura. While in practice most canonists treat the terms as synonymous, negotiatio refers to all business operations carried on for gain, whereas mercatura is restricted to trading, i.e., the buying and selling of merchandise.

Commentators distinguish among several types of commercial enterprises. (1) Trading strictly so-called is buying goods with the intention of selling them unchanged for a profit, whether or not in smaller quantities or newly packaged. Included under this category would be a currency exchange where money itself is bought and sold. Such activity is definitely not lawful for clerics. (2) Industrial business or buying materials with the intention of selling them later at a profit after they have been transformed by one's own labor or that of hired employees is also prohibited. However, publishing or other apostolic enterprises are not forbidden, since they are not undertaken for profit alone.[163] (3) Domestic business is permissible. It consists in the profitable management of more or less permanent investments. A religious community, for example, may sell wine produced from its vineyards. Land, houses, and farms may be purchased with the intention of renting them out later at a profit. (4) Convenience operations which make such items as food, books, and religious articles available to a school or other community are permissible so long as any profit accrues to the organization. (5) With regard to stocks, a distinction must be made between speculation and investment. Investment is the purchase of stocks and bonds with the intention of receiving periodic income. Speculation is carried on, not for the sake of the income accruing, but with the hope that the item purchased will rather quickly increase in value so that it can be resold for a profit. All speculation, which is akin to gambling, is forbidden to clerics, especially such a transaction as short-selling.

[161] Cardinal Bernardin sought to leave the matter to the discretion of the clergyman, but it was decided to leave the text as it is "for the sake of prudence" (Rel, ad c. 260, 68).

[162] The coetus dropped the former permission needed for a priest to appear in civil court and be involved in criminal cases (CIC 139, §3) precisely because such permission presumed the priest to be a minor in dependence on the bishop. See Comm 14 (1982) 82: "Esso risente di una vecchia concezione per cui il sacerdote era considerato quasi un minore alla dipendenza del Vescovo."

[163] J. Dede, "Business Pursuits of Clerics and Religious," J 23 (1963) 50–60.

The canon forbids clerics to "conduct" (exercere) business, that is, on a more or less habitual basis. An isolated act would not violate the law. A cleric may not engage in business either personally or through an agent; he is not allowed to commission an agent to carry on the operation in the cleric's name and at his risk. Clerics are forbidden, furthermore, to carry on such activity either for their own benefit or for that of other persons. Even the intention to devote the proceeds to pious or charitable causes does not justify a cleric's engaging in business.

A March 22, 1950, decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council declared that any cleric or religious who violated the canon on business activity incurred an excommunication specially reserved to the Holy See. Even the penalty of degradation, which included dismissal from the clerical state, could be invoked.[164] Paul VI in De episcoporum muneribus reserved to the Holy See any dispensation for a cleric "to practice business or commerce."[165]

The 1983 code eliminated the automatic excommunication but provides in canon 1392 that "clerics or religious who exercise a trade or business contrary to the prescripts of the canons are to be punished according to the gravity of the delict." The code, nevertheless, makes explicit reference to the possibility of obtaining permission from "legitimate ecclesiastical authority" to engage in such activity. It was recognized under the 1917 code that in cases of necessity, either of the cleric himself or of his family, the ordinary could allow what would otherwise be forbidden. If a cleric inherited or succeeded to a viable business that could not be relinquished without loss, the permission of the Holy See had to be obtained to continue it. Now a secular cleric is to seek permission from the diocesan bishop and a religious from the major superior.

The Clergy as Signs of Peace

Canon 287 — §1. Most especially, clerics are always to foster the peace and harmony based on justice which are to be observed among people.

The clergy are to be especially zealous promoters of peace. Here the obligation is stated positively in contrast to the negative position of the 1917 code (CIC 141) which had forbidden the clergy to participate in any way whatever in civil conflict or public disturbances. The sources for this paragraph stress the need for the clergy to be imbued with an all-embracing concern for concord. "The pastor's task is not limited to individual care of the faithful" but extends to all people; "priests can never be the servants of any human ideology or party" (PO 6). "Since God the Father is the beginning and the end of all things, we are all called to be brothers and sisters; we ought to work together without violence and without deceit to build up the world in a spirit of genuine peace" (GS 92). It is the Church's mission to preach the gospel message with a consequent demand for justice in the world. "This is the reason why the Church has the right—indeed, even the duty—to proclaim justice on the social, national, and international level, and to denounce instances of injustice when the fundamental rights of people and their very salvation demand it. The Church is not solely responsible for justice in the world; however, she has a proper and specific responsibility that is identified with her mission of giving witness before the world of the need for love and justice contained in the gospel message."[166]

§2. They are not to have an active part in political parties and in governing labor unions unless, in the judgment of competent ecclesiastical authority, the protection of the rights of the Church or the promotion of the common good requires it.

Though this paragraph has no antecedent in the 1917 code, several Roman decrees barring political activity on the part of the clergy in the decade after World War I are listed as sources.[167] In the post-Vatican II era, the 1971 synod of bishops declared that the "assumption of a role of leadership or a style of active militancy for some political faction must be ruled out by every priest unless in concrete extraordinary circumstances this is really demanded for the good of the community and has indeed the consent of the bishop after consultation with the priests' council and, if the case warrants, with the episcopal conference."[168]

Like canon 285, §3, which prohibits the clergy from holding public office, this restriction on political activity is based on the distinctive role of the clergy vis-à-vis the laity. Political activity ordinarily belongs to lay persons; priests should be "mindful of the maturity of lay persons and must highly value it when there is question of a special sphere in which they are versed."[169]

The present canon, however, is principally focused on the responsibility of the clergy to promote unity in the community. Their ministry is directed to all the faithful, not just to the members of a political party or a trade union. "Since political options are by nature contingent and never in an entirely adequate and perennial way interpret the gospel, the priest, who is the witness of things to come, must keep a certain distance from any political office or involvement."[170] The clergy are not forbidden to belong to these organizations; rather, they are not to play an active part in political parties or in the governing of unions. It is important that the clergy be seen first and foremost as representatives of the Church. It is their responsibility to assist lay persons in forming their own consciences correctly in these complex issues.

There may be circumstances, nonetheless, when it will be necessary for the clergy to become more actively involved in political and union affairs in order to protect the rights of the Church or to promote the common good. It pertains to competent ecclesiastical authority to make this judgment. Note that while the ban on clergy holding office (c. 285, §3) is absolute, though dispensable, the prohibition on political engagement is not absolute. The "competent authority" to authorize such involvement is not specified in the code, as it was in the 1977 draft of the canon (c. 148, §2) and in the 1980 draft (c. 262, §2). Those drafts required permission of the Holy See for bishops or in places where a pontifical ban was in effect; in other places and in the case of priests and deacons, both their own ordinary and the ordinary of the area where the activity was to occur had to approve. It is reasonable to interpret "competent ecclesiastical authority" in terms of these provisions.

Exemptions for Permanent Deacons

Canon 288 — The prescripts of cann. 284, 285, §§3 and 4, 286, and 287, §2 do not bind permanent deacons unless particular law establishes otherwise.

Permanent deacons are bound neither by the norm regarding clerical dress (c. 284) nor by the prohibitions regarding occupations foreign to the clerical state, such as public office, administration of property belonging to the laity, positions requiring accountability (c. 285, §§3 and 4), business and trade (c. 286), and participation in partisan politics or in governing a labor union (c. 287, §2).[171]

A number of objections were raised about the wording of the canon. It seemed incongruous to some canonists for permanent deacons who are clerics to be exempt from clerical obligations; since they are constituted in the hierarchy of the Church, they represent the Church to the laity. One proposal was to frame the canon positively: deacons are bound by clerical obligations unless legitimate church authority in a concrete case should have determined differently. Another suggestion was to state: "They are not bound but the ordinary considering attendant circumstances could prescribe otherwise." A third group thought that permanent deacons should not be held to the norms regarding clerical dress and business affairs but should be obliged not to engage in partisan politics or in running a union. The secretariat of the commission decided to maintain all the exemptions for permanent deacons as listed but to add the clause "unless particular law establishes otherwise."[172]

"Although most deacons will give only part of their time to formal diaconal ministries, they should not neglect the opportunities they have to exercise their ministry in the world or in the marketplace. They do not cease to be deacons when they go to their secular occupations, and there is much that they can do there precisely as deacons. Of course, a deacon should never use his ministry for the purpose of professional or personal gain."[173]

Use of Exemptions Allowed by Civil Law

Canon 289 — §1. Since military service is hardly in keeping with the clerical state, clerics and candidates for sacred orders are not to volunteer for military service except with the permission of their ordinary.

Clerics and candidates for ordination should not volunteer for military service without the permission of the ordinary. This canon applies to deacons as well as priests, since no exclusion of deacons is made as in the previous canon.[174] The 1917 code (CIC 141) allowed clerics with the permission of the ordinary to volunteer in order to be freed sooner from compulsory service. In the United States, clerics and seminarians have been required to register for selective service but have not been called to serve. Church law in the past and at present does not prevent priests from acting as chaplains in the various branches of the military; permanent deacons also are enrolled in the military. In fact, there is an Archdiocese for the Military Services, U.S.A., originally established on September 8, 1957, as the Military Vicariate.[175] Those who volunteer to be chaplains must have the permission of their ordinary or major religious superior.

§2. Clerics are to use exemptions from exercising functions and public civil offices foreign to the clerical state which laws and agreements or customs grant in their favor unless their proper ordinary has decided otherwise in particular cases.

Clerics are to take advantage of all exemptions from civic duties that the secular law, concordats, or custom may grant them as alien to their state, unless in particular cases their ordinary has judged differently. A cleric, therefore, ought not accept service on a grand or petit jury if federal or state law recognizes the ministry as an excusing cause. A cleric should certainly voice an objection if called to serve on a criminal case.

CHAPTER IV
LOSS OF THE CLERICAL STATE
[cc. 290–293]

Through the sacrament of orders one is perpetually marked with an "indelible character" (c. 1008) and definitively incorporated into the clerical state. A diocesan cleric is incardinated perpetually into the diocese; a religious remains incardinated in the institute of consecrated life or society of apostolic life. Both the sacramental and juridical consequences of ordination are meant to last throughout the lifetime of the cleric. Whereas the sacramental character can never be removed, one's juridical status as a member of the clerical state may be lost. This occurs only through death or the procedures stated in law.[1] The cleric may be far from home, not exercise his ministry, or be unfaithful to his duties as a bishop, priest, or deacon, but he remains a cleric. He may leave the Church or totally renounce his faith, yet he remains a cleric. "Severance packages" arranged for a "resigned" priest or deacon have no canonical effect on incardination or ordination.

Therefore, the cleric's status does not change without his knowledge.[2] Whereas the 1917 code spoke of the "reduction" of the cleric to the lay state,[3] the parallel canons of the 1983 code are placed under the rubric "Loss of the Clerical State." The 1983 code consciously implements the insistence of Vatican II on the fundamental equality of Christians flowing from baptism. The disparaging term "reduction" has been dropped from the 1983 code. Similarly, the penalty of degradation (reduction to the lay state, CIC 2305) is no longer mentioned in the 1983 code, along with two other penalties reserved to clerics: deposition (suspension from office and deprivations of any benefits accrued from office, CIC 2303), and "defrocking" or deprivation of ecclesiastical garb (CIC 2304). Only the penalty of dismissal from the clerical state (formerly degradation) remains.

Canons 290–293 contain the current legislation regarding loss of the clerical state and its consequences.[4] They are to be read with the canons on dismissal from the clerical state.[5] Like the previous two chapters of Book II, these canons were the result of the discussions of two study groups.[6] Although the loss of the clerical state is now seen in the more positive light of the fundamental baptismal equality of the Christian faithful, the current legislation is relatively unchanged from the prior law. There are some changes as to the competence of dicasteries as well as a slight modification of procedures. Parallel canons in the 1990 Eastern code are substantially the same.[7]

[1] This has been restated for deacons in the 1998 Directory for the Ministry and Life of Permanent Deacons, n. 21.

[2] The Holy See continues to make every effort to protect a cleric from the undue interference of his bishop or superior regarding the cleric's status. See commentary below on the previously accepted practice of ex officio laicizations.

Besides explaining the meaning of the law and the values underlying the canons, this section will investigate the practical implementation of these canonical procedures since the promulgation of the 1983 code.

Three Modes of Loss of Clerical State[8]

Canon 290 — Once validly received, sacred ordination never becomes invalid. A cleric, nevertheless, loses the clerical state:

1° by a judicial sentence or administrative decree, which declares the invalidity of sacred ordination;

2° by a penalty of dismissal legitimately imposed;

3° by rescript of the Apostolic See which grants it to deacons only for grave causes and to presbyters only for most grave causes.

Declaration of Invalidity (1°)

A valid ordination (c. 1024) always remains a valid ordination when conferred by the competent minister through the imposition of hands and the consecratory prayer (c. 1009, §2). Canon 290, 1° states the exception. The ordination can be declared invalid as a result of a judicial procedure resulting in a decision, or by an administrative decree. The current practice of the Holy See has been to discourage petitions of this kind, and therefore it has not admitted this as a practical possibility in recent years.[9] Rather, the Holy See encourages the third mode (c. 290, 3°) for the loss of the clerical state (petition for a return to the lay state and dispensation from celibacy).

The 1917 code was explicit in stating that an ordination coerced by grave fear was an invalid sacrament (CIC 214, §1), but this reference is not found in the 1983 code. The candidate must testify, in writing, that he receives orders freely (c. 1036).[10] The other requirements for ordination, including the absence of impediments and irregularities, are for the lawfulness of the sacrament, not validity. In cases of declaring the nullity of ordination, the canonical procedure in canons 1708–1712 must be followed.[11]

In practice, the other two modes of losing the clerical state indicated in canon 290 are the usual means by which the clerical state is lost.

Penalty of Dismissal from the Clerical State (2°)

As noted above, the sole remaining penalty entailing the loss of the clerical state is the perpetual expiatory penalty of dismissal from the clerical state (c. 1336, §1, 5°).[12] The penalty can be inflicted only through a judicial procedure reserved to a collegiate tribunal of three judges (c. 1425, §1, 2°) and then only when the cleric has committed an offense that merits the canonical penalty of dismissal from the clerical state (c. 1317). The canons are careful to preserve the rights of all in the Church, especially in the application of penalties, which must be interpreted strictly.[13] It is essential that bishops and superiors have a proper understanding of the nature of church penalties, especially when they affect the clergy with whom bishops and superiors serve and for whom they are responsible. The penalty of dismissal from the clerical state, though rarely inflicted because of the complexity of the process, safeguards the right of the community to be protected from ordained ministers who are a grave danger to the common good of the Church, and the right of the bishop or superior to protect the community from such a dangerous cleric. At the same time, the rights of the cleric are carefully protected by the strict application of penalties.[14] This penalty remains a legitimate means of last resort when a cleric becomes a serious danger or causes grave scandal, but only in a limited number of situations.

[11] The author is not aware of any instances of the use of this procedure since the 1983 code.

[12] See commentary on cc. 1425, §1, 2° and 1717–1731. The remarks here are meant to elucidate the penalty in light of this section of the code.

This penalty can never be automatic (c. 1336, §2) nor can it be established by particular law (c. 1317). It can never be used as a penalty outside the seven instances in the 1983 code. The taxative list is as follows: contumacy or serious scandal given in apostasy, heresy, or schism (c. 1364, §2), violation of the sacred species (c. 1367), physical attack on the Holy Father (c. 1370, §1), serious cases of solicitation in confession by a confessor (c. 1387), persistence in attempted marriage after a warning (c. 1394, §1), persistence in concubinage after a warning (c. 1395, §1), persistence in other sexual offenses after a warning, or commission of other sexual offenses through force, threats, or publicly, or with a minor under sixteen (c. 1395, §2).

In recent years, as the Church attempted to deal with the consequences of clerical misconduct, the judicial process demanded for dismissal from the clerical state has been experienced by some as a cumbersome means effectively to separate a cleric from the Church. Most often the third mode of the loss of the clerical state cannot be employed because the cleric refuses to petition spontaneously for a laicization.[15] The NCCB examined various ways by which the penalty of dismissal could be inflicted. This resulted in the approval by the Holy Father of derogations from some of the canonical norms concerning sanctions.[16] However, no new procedures were added outside of those in canon 290.[17] Throughout the discussion process with the Holy See, it was clear that the protection of the rights of clerics was of great concern. Any possibility that a dismissal procedure might be used by a bishop or superior in an arbitrary way which would infringe on the cleric's rights was to be totally avoided.

The penal process for dismissal could also be legitimately initiated while the cleric has himself submitted a petition for laicization to the Holy See. Should a negative response to the petition be received from Rome, such a penal process could be continued.[18]

Rescript of the Apostolic See (3°)

The usual mode of the loss of the clerical state continues to be the rescript of the Apostolic See (c. 290, 3°).[19] This is so-called "laicization," which not only results in a rescript returning the cleric to the lay state, but also includes a dispensation from the obligation of celibacy.[20] In 1971, after Paul VI's 1967 encyclical on celibacy, the CDF issued norms which revised and simplified [16] A derogation from the provisions of the canons on clerical sexual abuse of minors was granted by the Holy Father on April 25, 1994: the age in c. 1395, §2 was changed from below sixteen to below eighteen. Also, the period of prescription regarding the pursuit of criminal actions (cc. 1362 and 1395, §2) was changed. See the commentary on those canons. the process.[21] In 1980 the same congregation published a letter which contained norms governing the procedure.[22] These norms are still in effect.

Since the promulgation of the 1983 code there have been a number of practical changes and improvements in these petitions for both priests and deacons. In 1988, a significant development occurred with the reorganization of the papal curia. Pastor bonus assigned competence for "laicizations" of priests and deacons to the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments (art. 68). All cases presented after March 1, 1989, were to be handled by this dicastery. The CDF reviewed all cases that were pending at this time and contacted bishops and superiors who had submitted cases yet had not received a decision. They were asked to update the files with new details about the cases in order to bring them to closure.[23] The CDF retains competence for cases which were submitted to it before the aforementioned date.

The competency of the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments was confirmed in a February 8, 1989, letter of the Secretary of State, indicating that the 1980 norms are still to be employed in processing laicization petitions.[24] This includes all petitions of secular and religious clerics in Latin or other churches sui iuris, in common law or mission territories. A July 25, 1989 letter of the Secretary of State reconfirming this competency replied to an inquiry of the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life regarding competency for processing dispensations from the obligations connected with the diaconate ordinations of religious men.[25]

Since 1989, practical instructions on laicization petitions have been issued by the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments. The "Documents Necessary for the Instruction of a Case for the Dispensation from the Obligations of Priestly Celibacy" contains a checklist of documents necessary for the proper instruction of a case. This was distributed to ordinaries in 1991 through the NCCB.[26] The following year a similar document was distributed concerning the laicization of deacons.[27] Finally, on June 6, 1997, a circular letter was sent to all ordinaries and superiors concerning the laicization of priests and deacons.[28] These documents will be integrated into the following explanations of the laicization processes.

Very helpful in this area are the experiences of church administrators who assist those who have left the active ministry. These experiences cast light on the curial practice (c. 19) regarding the proper interpretation and implementation of the law.[29]

The laicization procedures currently followed for deacons and priests will be examined separately, but some common issues can be examined at this point. Canon 290, 3° explicitly includes deacons and priests (presbyteris). The congregation still follows the practice that it will not recommend a laicization for a bishop or a superior general or former superior general of a religious institute.[30] The rescript of laicization is a "favor" of the Holy See; it is never to be construed as a right of the cleric. Therefore, a spirit of humility and penance is always the spirit in which the favor is sought; it is never to be seen as a "simple expedient."[31] The bishop or superior of incardination is competent to accept a petition and offers his votum on the merits of the case. However, the local ordinary of the place of domicile of the petitioner can be delegated. The Holy See must authorize any other ordinary.

The canon does not make explicit who must petition the Apostolic See—the cleric or the bishop or superior without the consent or knowledge of the cleric (ex officio petition). The 1980 norms do not contain the provision for the ex officio laicization procedure found in the 1971 norms, according to which the ordinary petitioned the Holy Father without the consent or at times the knowledge of the cleric. Whereas ex officio petitions had been accepted in the past, they are only rarely accepted now.[32]

Laicization of Deacons

Canon 290, 3° gives little detail on the procedure for laicization of deacons. It states simply that the Apostolic See grants laicization to deacons "only for grave causes" (ob graves tantum causas). A frequent "grave cause" accepted by the congregation had been to permit the remarriage of permanent deacons who had been widowed after ordination and who wished to remarry. It was the practice of the Holy See to insist that the deacon be returned to the lay state and dispensed from the obligation of celibacy. However, a statement of June 6, 1997 admitted, "For some time it has become evident that because of this prohibition, grave difficulties have arisen for those who have been widowed after ordination but are desirous of remaining in the diaconal ministry."[33] Under certain conditions, a petition for a dispensation from the impediment of canon 1087 is submitted to the Holy See, not the laicization petition.[34]

The Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments[35] has established a simple five-step procedure for the laicization of a transitional or permanent deacon. (1) The deacon makes an explicit request in writing to the Holy Father for the favor of a return to the lay state and the dispensation from celibacy. In the letter he is to state briefly the reasons for the petition, e.g., a transitional deacon wishes to marry. (2) A curriculum vitae is prepared, including an explanation of the seriousness of the reasons for the request, the development of events which led to the crisis, and the responsibility for said crisis. (3) The votum of the bishop of incardination, which includes his endorsement of the petition, is needed. (4) Various testimonies are submitted, e.g., from superiors, professors, colleagues during the time of formation and during diaconal ministry. It may be appropriate to include the testimony of wife or family members. (5) Finally, the pertinent documentation from the time of formation and the scrutinia (c. 1051) for admission to orders are to be collected and included.

The protocol does not call for a table of contents or the numbering of pages, nor does it indicate the number of copies to be sent to the Holy See. However, it is helpful to follow the procedure for priests' laicizations[36] for the good ordering of the case and its being expedited once it reaches Rome. The 1992 protocol has made this process a simple and straightforward one. Deacons who submit their petition usually feel fairly and respectfully treated, and many dioceses report that these dispensations are granted in a timely fashion with few, if any difficulties.

Laicization of Priests

Whereas the procedure for laicizing deacons is rather simple, the case is very different for priests. The reason is obvious: the favor of the rescript for a return to the lay state for a priest is granted only for the most serious reasons (ob gravissimas causas). The ordained ministry of the priest is full time, involves the full care of souls, and entails the carrying out of all the rights and obligations of the clerical state with none of the exceptions granted to deacons (c. 288). The "high profile" nature of the priest's life and ministry demands that very serious reasons motivate his petition. These reasons must be firmly documented and supported in the vota called for by the current protocol. The purpose of the rescript is to regularize the status of the priest who has left the active ministry, and to allow him to participate fully in the sacramental life of the Church, always attentive to the good of the community and to the avoidance of scandal or confusion regarding a man's status.

The practice continues of speedily processing the petition of a man in danger of death, whatever his age might be. The urgency of the case could even account for a dispensation from the requirement of the signature of the petitioner. The normal informative process is not required, and the entire case can be transmitted by fax to the dicastery.[37]

The most grave reasons for laicization accepted by the dicastery continue to be those in the 1980 norms and those followed by the CDF; i.e., a priest who has long ago left active ministry, has married, and now wishes to reconcile with the Church; one who should not have been ordained because he lacked a due sense of freedom or responsibility, or because, during the time of formation, his competent superiors were not able to judge if he was able to live a celibate life.[38]

A change has occurred in granting the request of a priest under the age of forty. The CDF had the custom of not granting such a petition; the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments was at first open to such a petition should an exceptional motivation be present.[39] By 1995, John Paul II suspended action in these cases in order to give bishops and superiors more time to exhaust every means of persuading the priest to return to the active ministry.[40] However, the 1997 circular letter has reintroduced these motives as a possibility, though they are exceptional in nature. They are to be used when the priest's motives for defection go beyond the ordinary reasons and when grave scandal is present. In other words "there existed in the petitioner, previous to and concomitant with his Sacred Ordination, a psychological or physical condition... not taken into serious consideration by those entrusted with formation."[41] Because of the serious nature of the danger of scandal to the Church in these cases, the dicastery has accepted and approved cases which do not include the ordinary process of interviewing witnesses.[42]

[38] There has not been recent evidence that the rescript states that the man "should never have been ordained," although this can be implied from the reasons often given in the petition (sample in Hynous, 272–274).

[39] Among such motives one might note habitual or grave moral or psychological faults present before, during, or after the ordination, cohabitation with women of a scandalous nature, public and habitual disputes with church authorities. See N 27 (1991) 43–57 and Hynous, 240.

When the aforementioned elements are present, the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments will give "active consideration" to cases of priests under the age of forty and present them to the Holy Father.

The steps of the process will be briefly outlined below.[43] An attentive following of the 1991 "list of documents" provided by the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments has proven to be a straightforward way to instruct the case.[44] The process should not begin unless the bishop or superior has made every attempt to persuade the priest to return to the active ministry. Since the rescript entails a permanent loss of the clerical state, there should be no doubt that the petitioner wishes permanently to return to the lay state. These efforts at clarifying the mind of the petitioner should be documented and placed into the acts of the case.

The petitioner first submits a signed petition to the Holy Father. The letter is written in a spirit of humility and penance and must explicitly include the two requests for a return to the lay state and a dispensation from the obligations of celibacy. The Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments calls the curriculum vitae the libellus; this document presents a "detailed description" of the reasons for leaving the priesthood and why such a decision is irrevocable. It succinctly states significant dates and provides information on the education and assignments of the priest. The ordinary is to summarize the "pastoral attempts" made to dissuade the petitioner from submitting the request (as above) and to include a document of "suspension" of faculties. This is not the penalty of suspension (cc. 1333–1334) but the "withdrawal" of faculties done as a consequence of the decision to petition for a return to the lay state. However, suspension is incurred latae sententiae by an attempted civil marriage (c. 1394, §1).

cause the petitioner admitted his guilt and acknowledged the great harm done to the community.

[43] For more detailed presentations see Hynous, 238–276, and O'Reilly, 684–696.

[44] See sample documents in CPH, 249–281.

Although the ordinary may decide to instruct the case himself, usually a priest familiar with the process handles most of the work of the case. A canonical degree is helpful but not required. The priest instructor's decree of appointment is included in the acts of the case, with the "explicit statement" that the 1980 norms are to be followed.

Worth noting is the shifting role of the priest instructor in light of curial praxis. In addition to gathering data and documents, the priest instructor must also provide his votum (his personal opinion) about the merits of the case. Because he is familiar with many facets of the case and details of the "story" of the petitioner, his votum can be very helpful in assisting the Holy See to assess the sometimes convoluted turns in the petitioner's history. He can offer a thorough synthesis of the interview, testimonies, and psychological reports of the case, especially in light of the petitioner's well-being and the good of the Church. Thus, the ordinary's votum is simpler. Besides summarizing his recommendation for the granting of the petition, it must contain the explicit statement that the ordinary is certain no scandal will be taken. Should the petitioner live outside his proper ordinary's jurisdiction, a second votum of the ordinary of that place is necessary with the same explicit statement.

The Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments offers a list of testimonies to be gathered. The list, which is not taxative, includes: interrogations or depositions of witnesses (those indicated by the petitioner or chosen by the instructor), parents and relatives, superiors, companions, priest friends, co-workers, physicians, therapists, psychologists, etc. These testimonies may be submitted in writing, and should be notarized. The petitioner's written consent to release confidential information is required.

The petitioner is interviewed under oath by the instructor in the presence of a notary. Prepared questions are helpful. While the priest instructor will probe areas which the petitioner has given as the reasons for the petition, the former is free to gather narrative details he has deemed crucial in light of the testimony of those in formation, as well as any professionals involved in assisting the petitioner discern his decision to petition the Holy Father. During the interview the petitioner should feel free to add any details not covered by the instructor's questions, and ample room should be given the former to "tell his story."

Other documentation is required: the scrutinia (c. 1051), any pertinent documentation from the seminary or house of formation, civil marriage certificate if such a marriage has been attempted, sacramental certificates of spouse and children.

Finally, the case itself should be bound (section dividers are helpful), each page numbered and hand-written pages transcribed, a table of contents prepared, and the entire case authenticated by a notary. Three copies are sent to the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments; the apostolic nunciature is the best way to ensure that the case is sent expeditiously to Rome.[45]

At times, the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments requests additional documentation so that the acts of the case can be completed. The petition could be denied because of inadequate motivation. Should the petition be denied, recourse to the congregation is possible, and more convincing evidence can be offered. The petition can be submitted as many times as the priest desires.

The Church's concern to respect the dignity of all persons is implemented in a unique way through the processes outlined above. The deacon or priest who seeks to be returned to the lay state retains the right to privacy and a good reputation (c. 220). The Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments has shown special sensitivity through the protocol and list of required documents circulated for use of ordinaries. Not only do these procedures protect the Church's right to examine carefully each case and reach an appropriate decision as to its disposition, but they also provide a clear and reasonable description of what the cleric can expect during the process. Like the annulment process, these procedures, too, can provide healing and new life for those who have struggled with vocational questions and wish to participate fully in the sacramental life of the Church. Because of the unpredictability of international mail routes as well as the workload of the dicastery, no "time line" can or should be given the cleric regarding the disposition of his petition with the exception of the cleric in danger of death.

[45] For details on the praxis of the dicastery once it receives the case, see N 27 (1991) 53–57 and O'Reilly, 690–695.

Dispensation from Celibacy[46]

Canon 291 — Apart from the case mentioned in can. 290, n. 1, loss of the clerical state does not entail a dispensation from the obligation of celibacy, which only the Roman Pontiff grants.

The Holy Father alone dispenses from the obligation of celibacy (c. 277), unlike some of the other clerical obligations of merely ecclesiastical law. The rescript granting the return to the lay state also contains the dispensation from the obligation of celibacy. It is not possible for a cleric to accept the rescript without also accepting the dispensation from celibacy.[47] The Church continues to uphold the value of celibacy for those in ordained ministries,[48] and canon 291 is an expression of this concern. One exception noted in this canon is the judicial or administrative declaration of the invalidity of orders (c. 290, 1°); in such an instance, no dispensation is necessary.

The Pontiff himself determines occasions when he may wish to grant the favor of the dispensation. A recent example has been the openness of the Holy See to widowed permanent deacons who wish to remarry. In the past, the CDF and the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments explained the Holy Father's reluctance to grant the dispensation as stemming from the concern that it might weaken the Church's stance on celibacy. However, because of the evidence of the grave difficulties resultant from this practice, "any one of the three following conditions taken singly are sufficient for a favorable consideration of the dispensation from the impediment, namely: the great and proven usefulness of the ministry of the deacon to the diocese to which he belongs; the fact that he has children of such a tender age as to be in need of motherly care; the fact that he has parents or parents-in-law who are elderly and in need of care.[49]

[47] See the usual rescript issued by the CDWDS, n. 1 (sample in Hynous, 272–274). The 1971 norms stated that the return to the lay state and the dispensation from celibacy were inseparably united (V, 1).

[48] See commentary on c. 277.

Another example of such a dispensation from celibacy has been the rescripts granted for former non-Catholic priests or ministers who are married and who wish to be ordained to the Catholic priesthood.[50] Most men in this category have been from the Episcopal or Anglican communions. In the United States, Bernard Cardinal Law of Boston has acted as the delegate to the Holy See in these cases. The rescript typically contains these requirements: agreement to the condition that, should his wife die, remarriage is not possible; avoidance of scandal regarding celibacy and undue publicity; and assignment to administrative, social, or educational work rather than the ordinary care of souls. This does not exclude their giving assistance, when pastorally useful, in the full range of priestly duties.

A similar dispensation was given to a former priest of the Polish National Catholic Church through the CDF.[51] Outside the cases of former Episcopal and Anglican married ministers, the apostolic nunciature handles the cases of those married men of other Christian communions and forwards them to the Holy See.

Besides these cases, the dispensation from celibacy is granted very rarely. It is not granted for a laicized transitional deacon who later marries in the Church and then wishes to exercise his diaconal ministry. A response of the CDF in such a case indicated that it has been its "constant practice" in such cases never to admit these men as permanent deacons because of "the implication of the law of ecclesiastical celibacy."[52] Although the scarcity of clergy impelled this dicastery to refer the matter to a "higher authority," the CDF reported that the Holy Father upheld its decision of not granting the dispensation. "This is both to safeguard ecclesiastical celibacy and to avoid the possible consequences that it might have as regards dispensation from priestly celibacy."[53]

Effects of the Loss of the Clerical State[54]

Canon 292 — A cleric who loses the clerical state according to the norm of law loses with it the rights proper to the clerical state and is no longer bound by any obligations of the clerical state, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 291. He is prohibited from exercising the power of orders, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 976. By the loss of the clerical state, he is deprived of all offices, functions, and any delegated power.

The loss of the clerical state has a number of consequences, which pertain, for the most part, to all three modes of loss, i.e., invalidity, dismissal, and laicization.[55] Because he is no longer a member of the clerical state, he is no longer bound by its obligations nor does he enjoy any of its rights (cc. 273–289).[56] For example, he is not to wear ecclesiastical garb or be addressed by titles used [55] The contents of c. 292 are reiterated and elaborated on in the usual rescript of laicization.

[56] However, like any lay person, he too is encouraged to pray the liturgy of the hours (c. 1174, §2) and employ all the pertinent means he chooses to foster his spiritual life. These may indeed be very similar to the means he used as a priest or deacon, e.g., daily Mass, scripture meditation, rosary, etc. (see c. 276).

by ordained ministers. He has no right to remuneration, with due regard for the obligation of the bishop or superior when a cleric is punished by dismissal.[57]

While the juridical consequences of ordination can be lost, the power of orders can never be. However, the cleric in question is forbidden the exercise of sacred orders, with the exception stated in canon 976.[58] Obviously this exception does not apply when the invalidity of ordination is declared. Finally, canon 292 states that by the very fact of the loss of the clerical state an individual is deprived[59] of clerical offices, functions, and any delegated power granted to him as a cleric.

Canon 292 implies the obvious and more positive consequence of the loss of the clerical state, i.e., a return to the lay state with all its rights and obligations. These are enjoyed and to be fulfilled according to the norm of law just as they are applied for any other lay person. These are limited only when specifically restricted in the law itself, the rescript of laicization, or the decree of dismissal. Because a strict interpretation is necessary when limiting the free exercise of rights (c. 18), it is important to examine carefully the typical rescript now issued by the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments.[60]

The rescript is crafted to protect two important values. First, the good ordering of the community in its worship and celebration of the sacraments is paramount; the community has the right to receive the spiritual riches of the Church from its ordained ministers who fulfill the obligations incumbent on them. The stability of the clergy is closely connected to the stability of local communities. Second, the rescript makes every effort to avoid confusion of the faithful and, more importantly, scandal.[61]

Besides the consequences contained in canon 292, the rescript can contain other explicit prohibitions. The rescript ordinarily granted for a laicized deacon contains no special prohibitions.[62] The case is quite different for the laicized priest. He can never deliver a homily,[63] be a special minister of the Eucharist, or have a directive office in the pastoral field.[64] He can have no function (munus) whatsoever in a seminary or an equivalent institution, e.g., a house of formation [4 (c)]. In a secondary institute of study dependent on church authority (e.g., Catholic graduate school, college, or university), he can have no directive function (munus, e.g., president or administrator) or teaching office (officium) [4 (c)]. In similar institutions not dependent on church authority (e.g., secular college or university), he cannot teach theology or subjects closely connected to theology. In Catholic elementary or high schools, he may not have a directive function (e.g., principal or other school administrative office) or teach theology. In this case, however, the rescript authorizes the ordinary to dispense should there be no scandal present [4 (d)]. This applies only to teaching theology, not to holding a directive office. Finally, the laicized priest cannot teach religion in non-Catholic high schools or elementary schools without the dispensation of the ordinary.

The rescript also contains a caution regarding the celebration of marriage; it is to be done in a prudent way without undue display (sine pompa vel exteriore apparatu) (3). Finally, the laicized [57] When the dismissed cleric is "truly in need" because of the penalty, the ordinary must see to his proper care (c. 1350, §2).

[58] A dismissed or laicized priest can hear the confession of a person in danger of death validly and licitly, even if a priest with the proper faculty is present. The CDWDS rescript, n. 4 (b) also refers to c. 986, §2, which obliges any priest, when a person is in danger of death, to hear the confession.

[59] This should not be taken as the penalty of deposition in the 1917 code (CIC 2303) or the "deprivation" in the 1983 code (c. 1336, §1, 2°).

[60] This is almost identical to the rescript issued by the CDF. Each individual rescript now issued by the CDWDS must be carefully scrutinized to see what restrictions are included.

[61] It is important to point out that not only can one give scandal, but the community must take scandal. It would be good to monitor the reaction of the community in this area.

[62] This rescript contains an explicit reference to c. 1350, §2.

priest who has been civilly married ought not to live in a place where his condition is known. This provision, too, can be dispensed from by the ordinary of the place where the petitioner lives should the ordinary judge there is no danger of scandal (5).[65]

It must be remembered that these restrictions are to be interpreted strictly; in all other areas the cleric returned to the lay state enjoys the same rights and is bound by the same duties as all lay persons. The rescript reminds the ordinary who communicates the rescript to encourage the man to live in harmony with the Church and participate fully in its life. Full and appropriate liturgical participation includes, for example, proclaiming the word, leading song and participation in the choir, offering reflections during services of the word, or giving a "witness talk," etc.

Although deprived of clerical offices and functions, the laicized priest is able to exercise roles or hold offices outside those prohibited in the rescript, e.g., he may serve on the diocesan pastoral council or the parish finance council; he may be named a delegate to the diocesan synod; he may be a lay judge on the tribunal.[66]

The rescript also directs the ordinary who notifies the priest to impose some work of piety or charity. The bishop or superior may leave the nature of this work to the man himself. Finally, a brief report should be sent to the Congregation for Divine Worship and Discipline of the Sacraments at a later date to notify it that the rescript has been executed and explain if there has been any "wonderment" of the faithful at its being granted.

Return to the Clerical State[67]

Canon 293 — A cleric who loses the clerical state cannot be enrolled among clerics again except through a rescript of the Apostolic See.

Chapter 4 of title III of part one of Book II concludes with a canon which addresses the case of a cleric who has lost the clerical state and who wishes to return to the diaconal or priestly ministry. The canon states the necessary requirement simply and directly: a rescript of the Holy See is necessary;[68] no further procedure is specified.[69] This theoretically applies to the case of a man whose ordination was declared invalid[70] and to one who was dismissed from the clerical state. In the practical order, it usually applies to one who was granted the rescript of laicization (and dispensation from celibacy) and who wishes to exercise ordained ministry once again.[71]

The practical steps to be followed are rather simple, and M. Souckar outlines them briefly: beginning the process, formal process, formation, and permission to readmit.[72] He stresses three pastoral considerations, i.e., observance by the petitioner and ordinary of civil, canonical, and moral responsibilities during the investigation; readiness of the ordinary to support the cleric financially during the period of formation; and a presentation of the readmitted priest or deacon to the other clerics and the community.[73]

The process begins when the laicized cleric approaches a bishop or superior who designates an instructor for the case. This begins the "formal process" wherein the instructor investigates the precise canonical status of the deacon or priest, as

[65] For a discussion of the possible dispensations see "The Dispensing Power of the Diocesan Bishop and Conditions in the Rescript of Laicization," issued by the NCCB Canonical Affairs Committee, July 2, 1987.

[69] A 1987 private reply of the CFC stated that a procedure would be issued "in the near future," but to date no such protocol has been given. See RRAO 1988, 10.

[70] Although the term "readmission" to a state that one never possessed is not accurate, the canon indicates that a rescript is needed should such a person seek to be ordained.

[71] In light of the 1997 circular letter of the CDWDS, it will prove interesting if laicized deacons who remarried after laicization ask to be reinstated in the diaconal ministry.

well as any natural obligations that he may have (e.g., a spouse whom he may have divorced or who has died, children). The petitioner writes a personal letter to the Holy Father making the request and explaining his style of life since the favor of laicization was granted; the letter should state, of course, that a bishop or superior is willing to accept him. References to witnesses to his behavior and lifestyle are helpful. An interview is conducted which addresses the concerns of the Apostolic See[74] and the diocese or institute, e.g., financial or moral obligations, a proposed course of study, the preclusion of scandal.[75] The bishop or superior should express his votum recommending that the request be granted and indicating that he is willing to incardinate the priest once the nihil obstat of the Holy See is granted. The petition is forwarded to the same congregation which granted the rescript of laicization. The next stage starts when the congregation receives the petition and lets the bishop or superior know its favorable opinion so that an intense time of formation (usually at least six months) can begin. Usually the man lives in a monastery or religious house, although a seminary would seem to be acceptable. A supervisor should be assigned who can offer instructions and make evaluations in the pastoral setting; spiritual direction on a regular basis is important.[76] The final step is the permission to readmit into the clerical state; it can be granted once the period of formation has been successfully completed. The congregation is informed and the nihil obstat is requested. When the rescript is received, it should be immediately executed by the bishop, and the cleric should be immediately incardinated into the diocese or institute.

Title IV
Personal Prelatures
[cc. 294–297]

The only prelatures which were known at the time of Vatican II were prelatures nullius which, with the advent of the 1983 code, became known as territorial prelatures. Unlike a personal prelature, a territorial prelature is assimilated in law to a diocese (c. 368); its prelate governs it as its proper pastor, in a manner similar to that of a diocesan bishop (c. 370) to whom he is the equivalent in law (c. 381, § 2). Since they are located in the code between clerics and associations of the Christian faithful, rather than in the part that deals with the Church's hierarchical constitution, it is clear that personal prelatures are neither associations of the Christian faithful nor particular churches. This ended the debate between the holders of two differing opinions on whether personal prelatures were particular churches; both opinions were prevalent after the council and during the code revision process, indeed, right up to its final phase.[1]

In any event, in light of the context in which the idea of personal prelatures took shape during Vatican II, it is also clear that they do not belong to the Church's hierarchical constitution.[2] In fact, not only is the topic never considered in Lumen gentium or in Christus Dominus, but the decree Presbyterorum ordinis 10 treats it only in the context of the distribution of priests and priestly vocations. Personal prelatures must therefore be considered as administrative entities with the power to incardinate secular priests who are given an adapted formation to provide for various pastoral needs.[3] The institution of personal prelatures is not directed to "the proper distribution of priests" as an end in itself, but more toward the goal of facilitating various forms of pastoral activities for different social strata in a given region, nation, or continent.

Paul VI fleshed out this new conciliar institution[4] in his motu proprio Ecclesiae sanctae. He did it in the same context as Presbyterorum ordinis 10: for a better distribution of the clergy.[5] Ecclesiae sanctae I, 4 determined that the Apostolic See was the competent authority to erect personal prelatures, that they were to be founded to facilitate particular pastoral activities, and that they were to be constituted by secular priests incardinated in the prelature. Each prelature was to have its own statutes. Beyond that, nothing was to prevent lay persons, whether single or married, from dedicating themselves with their professional skill to the service of these works and projects after making an agreement with the prelature.[6] Finally, episcopal conferences were to be consulted before

[1] For an exhaustive historical analysis of cc. 294–297, see W. J. Stetson and J. Hervada, "Personal Prelatures from Vatican II to the New Code: An Hermeneutical Study of Canons 294–297," J 45 (1985) 379–418. The authors conclude that "in any case, the systematic arrangement of a body of laws is always something secondary" (416). See also J. Hervada, in Com Ex II/1, 401. This may be right, but if the place of an institution in the code is not always an affirmation of its nature, it nevertheless remains significant in clarifying what the institution is not. And that is never a secondary consideration. This is indeed the opinion of G. Ghirlanda. He contends that we must never forget that the legislator changed the systematic organization of the canons on personal prelatures in the preparatory schemata. This change meant that these prelatures could not be viewed as equivalent to a particular church or considered as belonging to the Church's hierarchical structure. See G. Ghirlanda, "De differentia Praelaturam personalem inter et Ordinariatum militarem seu castrensem" P 76 (1987) 228. The author extensively studies the evolution of the pertinent texts in the code (227–236).

a personal prelature was erected, and the rights of local ordinaries were to be respected in the exercise of its activities (PO 10).

Some may have thought that the elements expressed in Ecclesiae sanctae were sufficiently clear and in keeping with the conciliar approach to constitute the juridical framework within which a personal prelature could evolve. But such does not appear to be the case if we consider the extensive discussions leading up to the formulation of the current law and the doubts of the code commission itself regarding where such prelatures were to be situated in the code. Evidently amid all the discussions there was a serious search for a canonical definition or a theological understanding of personal prelatures. However, the legislator offers no such definition or understanding in the four canons of the code describing the new institution. And the Eastern code does not shed further light on this point, since it does not deal at all with personal prelatures. Personal prelatures have been described as "jurisdictional entities established by the Holy See within the hierarchical pastoral activity of the Church as an instrument for the performance of particular pastoral and missionary endeavors."[7] But this approach does not satisfy everyone. In fact, there is no doubt about the place where such prelatures are situated in the code: they cannot and should not be considered as jurisdictional entities belonging to the Church's hierarchical constitution; rather, they are societal institutions or administrative entities established to promote a more equitable distribution of the clergy.[8]

Be that as it may, an ecclesial structure may be of a hierarchical type while not belonging to the Church's hierarchical constitution.[9] The content of the canons on personal prelatures does not permit us to say more. Neither their establishment by the Apostolic See (c. 294), their government (c. 295), the potential presence of lay people (c. 296), nor their relations with local ordinaries (c. 297) permit us, in fact, to believe that they were some forgotten element of the Church's hierarchical constitution which was discovered at the last moment by Vatican II. They are what they were in the mind of the council fathers: a means to provide for "not only the proper distribution of priests ... but also the carrying out of special pastoral projects" (PO 10). Developed later by Paul VI in Ecclesiae sanctae, the institution of such prelatures has been set out in the present canons and becomes operational with statutes approved by the Holy See, giving each personal prelature its proper configuration.

Purpose and Competent Authority

Canon 294 — After the conferences of bishops involved have been heard, the Apostolic See can erect personal prelatures, which consist of presbyters and deacons of the secular clergy, to promote a suitable distribution of presbyters or to accomplish particular pastoral or missionary works for various regions or for different social groups.

The first words of the Latin text speak of the two possible objectives of personal prelatures, [7] J. L. Gutiérrez, "Personal Prelatures," in Pamplona ComEng, 242.

[8] Ghirlanda, 234. This goes against the conclusions of Stetson and Hervada, for whom "they are prelatic, hierarchical, jurisdictional structures of the People of God. The proper place for personal prelatures in the Code is among the institutions belonging to the hierarchical constitution of the Church" ("Personal Prelatures," 416).

[9] For Hervada (Com Ex II/1, 399–400) personal prelatures are new forms of the organization of the Church's constitutional structure in addition to already existing structures such as the pope, bishops, episcopal conferences, territorial prelatures, apostolic vicariates, etc. Moreover, for J. I. Arrieta (Com Ex II/1, 680) there are three main types of ecclesiastical circumscriptions: ordinary territorial circumscriptions, missionary territorial circumscriptions, and personal circumscriptions. Personal prelatures belong to the last type of category along with personal dioceses, military ordinariates, and ordinariates for Eastern rite faithful. This would mean that the prelate of a personal prelature would be equivalent to a diocesan bishop in law. However, this is simply not the case.

i.e., the promotion of a better distribution of priests and the accomplishment of particular pastoral and missionary tasks. Since the canon also states that a personal prelature consists of secular priests and deacons, we might conclude that its main purpose is the better distribution of clerics and not only of priests, even though Ecclesiae sanctae did not mention deacons. Priests and deacons are therefore the natural members of a personal prelature. However, this does not exclude lay persons, who may also dedicate themselves to the particular tasks of the prelature (c. 296).

The second important element of this canon concerns the authority competent to erect personal prelatures: the Apostolic See through the Congregation for Bishops.[10] It is important to note here that the text speaks of "erection" by the Holy See and not of "recognition" or "approval." This is not the only place in the code where the Holy See alone "erects," that is, gives a legal existence and a juridical status to an organization, an institution, or a structure. It erects public international associations (c. 312, §1, 1°), particular churches (c. 373), conferences of bishops (c. 449, §1), etc.

In some of these cases—for example, an international association—there could be a preexisting entity which at this point in its existence has its statutes. And as for a personal prelature, what is it before it is erected? A society of apostolic life? A clerical association? A secular institute? The question is not without importance, as it refers to the origins—and therefore to the founders—of the prelature. Canonical erection should not be confused with the foundation of such an entity. And it must matter that the founders, perhaps, had intended first of all a society of apostolic life or an association of the faithful or a secular institute. The intention to found a personal prelature may not have been present at first. In any case, the founding intention cannot be disassociated from the history of an organization.

Finally, the canon states that the Holy See will not establish personal prelatures without having first consulted with the episcopal conferences involved. It remains to be seen which episcopal conferences are involved, and why they are to be consulted. At least the episcopal conference of the place where the prelature is to be established must be consulted, along with those of the territories where the preexisting institution was present and where it will accomplish its mission, once it is erected as a prelature. As for other bishops and local ordinaries, the statutes of each personal prelature will determine the nature of their mutual relationships.

Statutes and Government

Canon 295 — §1. The statutes established by the Apostolic See govern a personal prelature, and a prelate presides over it as the proper ordinary; he has the right to erect a national or international seminary and even to incardinate students and promote them to orders under title of service to the prelature.

§2. The prelate must see to both the spiritual formation and decent support of those whom he has promoted under the above-mentioned title.

Like the last two canons of this title, this one deals with statutes, which provide each prelature with its distinctive configuration. The statutes are established by the Apostolic See (ab Apostolica Sede conditis) and become particular law for the prelature. Unlike statutes, constitutions, and other norms concerning associations and institutes of consecrated life—which are either recognized or approved by the competent authority and remain private laws—the statutes of a personal prelature are laws enacted by the Holy See.[11] The same expression—ab Apostolica Sede conditis—is found in the apostolic constitution Spirituali militum curae, which deals with the proper statutes of each military ordinariate.[12]

[11] See E. Caparros, "A New Hierarchical Structure for New Pastoral Needs: Personal Prelatures," Philippiniana Sacra 24 (1989) 392, note 41.

[12] Ibid., note 42.

If the statutes constitute a particular set of laws for each prelature, they must take into account the existing framework of universal law, which determines those elements which personal prelatures may have in common. Evidently, since the statutes are the written expression of the specific nature of the prelature, they will vary according to its uniqueness and goals. This is why the code does not go into too much detail. This is also why canon 295, §1 states simply that "a prelate presides over [each prelature] as the proper ordinary." Even though canon 134, §1 does not mention the prelate in its list of ordinaries, which seems exhaustive, the present canon calls the head of a personal prelature an ordinary. Therefore, as any ordinary, he can, for example, dispense from universal disciplinary laws in certain extraordinary circumstances (c. 87, §2). The statutes of each prelature are to determine the scope and limitations of the powers of the prelate, along with the other structures of government and internal organization.[13] Whatever the ultimate goals or nature of the personal prelature, universal law takes into account the fact that its prelate, being an ordinary, will eventually have to deal with local ordinaries (c. 297).

According to the nature of the prelature, its prelate has the right to establish proper structures for the recruitment and formation of its members by setting up seminaries. Here we are evidently dealing with major seminaries within the context of the canons on the formation of the clergy (cc. 232–264). However, the prelate can also establish minor seminaries (c. 234). To ascertain whether the prelature's major seminary must follow the episcopal conference program for priestly formation (c. 242), the goals of the prelature should no doubt be considered, although its seminarians are future secular priests and deacons. All the clergy of the prelature are incardinated into it. The prelate calls them to orders and is able to ordain them, if he has received episcopal ordination.

Although the code no longer refers to titles of ordination, canon 295, §1 still mentions that the prelature's candidates for orders will be called "under title of service to the prelature."[14] Finally the canon logically points to the prelate's responsibility for the spiritual formation and the decent support of the clergy of the prelature.

Lay Involvement in a Personal Prelature

Canon 296 — Lay persons can dedicate themselves to the apostolic works of a personal prelature by agreements entered into with the prelature. The statutes, however, are to determine suitably the manner of this organic cooperation and the principal duties and rights connected to it.

As is clear from the two preceding canons, a personal prelature is in fact a clerical institution, particularly when we consider its members. But the lay faithful may also (possunt) consecrate themselves to the pastoral works of the prelature. The level and nature of their collaboration will be determined by the statutes. For example, a simple contract might determine the rights and obligations of both parties. This contract would also have to consider certain civil law dispositions in these matters.

The text speaks of an "organic cooperation," referring no doubt to a form of integration into the prelature, so that, as lay faithful, individuals may carry out their role in its apostolic tasks. Even if the role of the lay faithful may be of great importance in a given prelature, they do not belong to its nature in the sense that personal prelatures could exist without the presence of lay associates.

This organic presence of lay associates in the prelature does not change its particular nature, nor does it change the status of these lay people. Their presence does not technically make of the prelature a portion of the people of God, like a diocese,[15] nor do these members become detached from the jurisdiction of the local ordinary where they have a domicile or quasi-domicile. The local ordinary remains the competent authority regarding certain acts of the Christian life which require faculties. We speak here of those acts which concern the juridical status of persons, as in the case of marriage, especially as regards the dispensation of certain impediments (c. 1078, §1). The competence of the prelate regarding the lay faithful usually extends to the pastoral activities of the prelature within the framework of the statutes. These lay faithful continue to belong to their local parish; this implies a respect for certain prerogatives specifically entrusted to the pastor (c. 530).

Normally, if the powers of the prelate and of the local ordinary are to be applied to the same persons, such powers do not deal with the same matters. Unlike the jurisdiction of military ordinaries, which is cumulative with that of the local ordinary since both jurisdictions may apply to the same matters, the prelate's jurisdiction is rather mixed in nature[16] and is determined by the statutes of the prelature. However, this does not prevent lay members who cooperate organically in the pastoral tasks of the prelature from benefiting also from the pastoral ministry of its clergy.

Prelature-Local Ordinary Relationships

Canon 297 — The statutes likewise are to define the relations of the personal prelature with the local ordinaries in whose particular churches the prelature itself exercises or desires to exercise its pastoral or missionary works, with the previous consent of the diocesan bishop.

Normally all personal prelatures exercise their pastoral activities within the territorial limits of a particular church or a community of the faithful assimilated to a particular church (c. 368). The pastoral tasks of the prelature must therefore be integrated within the larger pastoral objectives of the diocese in order to avoid potential conflicts. While the preceding canon considers the exercise of authority by the prelate over the lay faithful of the prelature, distinct from that of the local ordinary over these same lay persons, canon 297 deals explicitly with the relations between the personal prelature and the ordinaries of the places where it is to exercise its mission. Like Presbyterorum ordinis 10 and Ecclesiae sanctae I, 4, this canon gives particular attention to the nature of these relationships. Evidently harmonious relations will lead to an effective accomplishment of the prelature's mission.

Here again, the statutes are to determine the essentials of this relationship, i.e., the framework within which they will be established while keeping in mind the specific nature and purpose of the prelature. If this involves education, for instance, these relations will not be the same as in the case of hospital care or ministry to refugees or prisoners. Whatever the elements found in the particular laws of the prelature, universal law requires the consent of the diocesan bishop or his equivalent in law (c. 381, §2) if a personal prelature is to exercise its pastoral or missionary activities within a particular church.

The legislator has been entirely coherent in establishing the provisions on the pastoral office of a bishop and clarifying the nature of the powers needed for the accomplishment of that office. Canon 394, §1 invites him to favor various forms of the apostolate within his diocese, but he is also responsible for coordinating these activities, with "due regard for the proper character of each." What is determined in canon 305, §2 for associations of Christian faithful and in canons 678, 681, and 682 regarding the apostolic works of religious in a diocese, canon 297 determines mutatis mutandis for personal prelatures.

TITLE V
ASSOCIATIONS OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITHFUL
[cc. 298–329]

Among the rights of the faithful recognized by the Code of Canon Law, there is at least one that the Church has already recognized in civil society: the right to associate.[17] In itself, there is not much which is very new in the statement that the faithful "are at liberty freely to found and direct associations" (c. 215). What is new in this legal provision does not lie in the fact that the faithful can gather in associations, but rather that this capacity is recognized as a fundamental right of all the faithful, whatever their state in the Church: lay person, priest, religious, or bishop.

[16] Gutiérrez, in Pamplona ComEng, 244.

By the very fact of its presence in the "bill of rights and duties" of believers in the Church (cc. 208–223), the right of association becomes something to be protected, to be claimed, and also to be promoted.

The faithful thus find formally proclaimed the right to associate in the Church, a right which the Church has already recognized for the members of civil society. But this is the proclamation of an existing right, not the concession or creation of a new right. Indeed, from the first centuries of the Church the faithful have organized in order to care for the needs of the sick and other necessities. During the middle ages, spiritual fraternities appeared, then groupings which formed around convents to participate in their spiritual merits. Other associations for prayer multiplied, composed only of lay persons and having the following purposes: development of devotion to God and the saints; the practice of charity towards one's neighbor; and the exercise of a spirit of penance.[18] How many institutes of consecrated life started by being associations of the faithful?

The 1917 code treated of associations of the faithful (CIC 684–725). It witnessed to what was in practice the right of association at that stage in the Church's history. The 1983 code, while conserving several basic elements of the older legislation on associations of the faithful, elaborates these elements by adding some precision to them, some distinctions, and greater possibilities for new associations. In its turn, the new code witnesses to this facet of contemporary church life. But the treatment of associations of the faithful this time is more than a description of what already exists. It is like a legal framework designed to govern in practice the exercise of the right of association recognized by canon 215:

> The Christian faithful are at liberty freely to found and direct associations for purposes of charity or piety or for the promotion of the Christian vocation in the world and to hold meetings for the common pursuit of these purposes.

Three brief comments must be made on this canon.[19]

First, the text affirms the principle of the capacity of each of the faithful to found and to govern associations freely. The association which a believer founds can remain a de facto association, without official juridic status, or it can be recognized as a private association, or even be erected into a public association.

If each of the faithful has the right to found an association, the responsible authority in the community reserves the right to intervene when the members of an association or its leaders seek to acquire an official status in the community. No one, however, is required to seek such a status.

Second, canon 215 does not exhaustively list the purposes to be pursued by associations. They are for "purposes of charity or piety or for the promotion of the Christian vocation in the world." These are general objectives which serve as a framework for the more detailed statement of canon 298, §1.

Finally, canon 215 must also be read in light of the following canon, which in effect bears on the right of initiative of the faithful: "All the Christian faithful have the right to promote or sustain apostolic action even by their own undertakings" (c. 216).

[17] See ency Pacem in terris, AAS 55 (1963) 262–263.

[18] See R. Naz, Traité de droit canonique, 2nd ed. (Paris: Letouzey et Ané, 1954) I:749.

[19] For a lengthy commentary on the right to associate, see L. Navarro, Diritto di associazione e associazioni di fedeli (Milan: Giuffrè, 1991) 3–33.

The fundamental right of the faithful to associate for purposes in conformity with the Christian life can be exercised without their being subject to the canons on associations of the faithful (cc. 298–329); that is, unless an association wishes to acquire the status of a private or public association, or wishes to adopt a name, such as "Catholic" for example, which signifies a formal status.

That an association does not wish to acquire a recognized status or take a name signifying such does not mean that it is beyond any intervention by the competent ecclesiastical authority. Other rights and obligations are in question when the common good is touched: "In exercising their rights, the Christian faithful, both as individuals and gathered together in associations, must take into account the common good of the Church, the rights of others, and their own duties toward others" (c. 223, §1).

If the common good is affected in one way or another by an association of the faithful, the competent authority can and at times must intervene: "In view of the common good, ecclesiastical authority can direct the exercise of rights which are proper to the Christian faithful" (c. 223, §2). The text does not say how, but presumably those responsible for the community can always exercise their right to intervene whenever the public order is concerned. When an association has a formal canonical status, it can be suppressed (cc. 320 and 326). When it does not, it remains, as "all associations of the Christian faithful . . . subject to the vigilance of competent ecclesiastical authority which is to take care that the integrity of faith and morals is preserved in them and is to watch so that abuse does not creep into ecclesiastical discipline" (c. 305, §1). Certainly the competent authority always can and sometimes must warn the faithful against a de facto association. It can even go so far as to condemn it.

During the past few years there has been a significant increase in the Church of associations of the Christian faithful, particularly lay associations. A certain number of these have asked for official recognition from the competent authorities. At times these authorities will be called upon, for various reasons, to judge whether an association of Christian faithful conforms to the requirements of the Church.

It will be insufficient merely to examine the goals of an association before giving one's judgment. There is a need for objective, verifiable criteria in order to avoid an arbitrary decision. In 1987, the members of the synod of bishops on the laity focused their attention on the phenomenon of the growing number of lay associations and the lack of objective criteria to permit a recognition of their legitimacy. This is why, in his apostolic exhortation Christifideles laici, John Paul II enumerated a list of five "criteria of ecclesiality" which must be found in any association of the Christian faithful. The purpose of these criteria is to verify the fundamental mark of the legitimacy of such associations: their ecclesial character. Here then are the criteria: the primacy given to the call of every Christian to holiness, the responsibility of professing the Catholic faith, the witness to a strong and authentic communion with the pope and local bishop, conformity to and participation in the Church's apostolic goals, and a commitment to a presence in human society.[20]

Besides these criteria, the pope also listed eight actual fruits of legitimate associations, for example: "the renewed appreciation for prayer, contemplation, liturgical, and sacramental life; a readiness to participate in programs and church activities at the local, national, and international levels; a desire to be present as Christians in various settings of social life; and the creation and awakening of charitable, cultural, and spiritual works, the spirit of detachment, and evangelical poverty leading to a greater generosity in charity toward all."[21] When found in an association, those fruits enable one to ascertain whether the necessary criteria of ecclesiality are present.[22]

[22] See R. Pagé, "Note sur les 'critères d'ecclésialité pour les associations de laïcs,'" Stud Can 24 (1990) 460–462.

The part of the code dealing with associations of the faithful can also be considered as the legal framework establishing the juridic status of associations of the faithful in the Church. Thirty-two canons (ten less than in the 1917 code) are contained in four chapters. The first chapter presents the basic norms common to all associations of the faithful having a status in the Church. Among other things, we learn here that de facto associations can exist in the Church. Chapter 2 deals with public associations, and chapter 3 with private associations. The final chapter dedicates three canons to associations of lay persons in particular.

Apart from the fundamental right to associate (CCEO 18, which is the same as c. 215), the Eastern code deals with associations of the faithful in eleven canons (CCEO 573–583) within one title (XIII), compared to the thirty-two canons of the Latin code. The canons are all similar to the corresponding ones in the Latin code but highlight the essentials only. The basic distinctions between public and private associations are found in the Eastern code; however, it provides no specific or detailed norms for each of these types or for lay associations. Evidently, particular law will have a major role to play. The Eastern canons list the competent authorities and mention their right and responsibility of vigilance; the canons also set forth the principles which form the basis for respecting the rights and obligations of the members of the associations. Each norm is clear, although there will inevitably be difficulties in their application. Undoubtedly the more detailed norms of the Latin code will be helpful as parallel norms.

COMMON NORMS
[cc. 298–311]

For the most part, these norms deal directly with associations of the faithful having a juridic status in the Church, whether these be public or private associations. But de facto associations are also affected by several of these norms.

NATURE OF ASSOCIATIONS OF THE FAITHFUL [cc. 298–311]

Only by describing the purposes of associations of the faithful, their diverse categories and organization, and the situation of their members, is it possible to develop a precise idea of their nature. But these are only common denominators. Each association then adopts its own configuration, which establishes its specificity.

Description and Ends

Canon 298 — §1. In the Church there are associations distinct from institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life; in these associations the Christian faithful, whether clerics, lay persons, or clerics and lay persons together, strive in a common endeavor to foster a more perfect life, to promote public worship or Christian doctrine, or to exercise other works of the apostolate such as initiatives of evangelization, works of piety or charity, and those which animate the temporal order with a Christian spirit.

§2. The Christian faithful are to join especially those associations which competent ecclesiastical authority has erected, praised, or commended.

The first paragraph of this canon contains the elements essential not only for grasping the nature of associations of the faithful, but also for clarifying and guiding the choice of the juridic status to be granted or denied to an association.

"In the Church there are associations distinct from institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life. . . ." The image of the typical association in the Church—experienced in institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life—is profiled in these words. In proceeding by way of comparison, the text is reduced to explaining associations of the faithful negatively: they are not groups of the faithful organized as in institutes of consecrated life and societies of apostolic life, and their members are not bound by vows or other sacred bonds by which the evangelical counsels are assumed.

"...in these associations the Christian faithful, whether clerics, lay persons, or clerics and lay persons together...." Not only can associations of the faithful group together exclusively lay people, religious, or clergy, but these can also be together in the same association. The fact of being a member of an association of the faithful does not change the status of a person in the Church, as does the fact of religious profession or priestly ordination.

"...strive in a common endeavor to foster a more perfect life, to promote public worship or Christian doctrine, or to exercise other works of the apostolate such as initiatives of evangelization, works of piety or charity, and those which animate the temporal order with a Christian spirit." Canon 215 indicates three generic purposes justifying the exercise of the right of association: charity, piety, and the promotion of the Christian vocation in the world. Canon 298, §1 seeks in effect to explicate these three purposes, but without thereby precisely listing them in an exclusive fashion. Indeed, the precise objectives of associations of the faithful can be as numerous and varied as there are facets to Christian life. However, the purposes expressed in canon 298 must serve as criteria in examining an association's request for recognition presented to the competent authority. These purposes can be sketched as follows:

(a) fostering a more perfect life;
(b) promoting public worship;
(c) promoting Christian doctrine;
(d) exercising other works of the apostolate such as initiatives of
   i. evangelization
   ii. works of piety
   iii. works of charity
   iv. animation of the temporal order with the Christian spirit.

To judge from this list, there is room for an infinite number of associations of the faithful. The phrase "other works of the apostolate such as..." leaves room for a very broad interpretation. For instance, certain institutes of consecrated life have recently transferred to lay people some of their apostolic works whether in health care or in education. Some of these lay associations now want to be considered as sharing in the Church's mission and are requesting appropriate recognition. In certain places, an association of Christian faithful is formed whose apostolate consists in directing a health care facility, a school, or another endeavor within the framework of the Church's mission.[23] The foundation of a college or a university as a private association of the faithful recognized in the Church may even be one way of obtaining an initial formal recognition of the Catholic identity of the college or university.[24]

Paragraph two of canon 298, in inviting the faithful to enroll "especially [in] those associations which competent ecclesiastical authority has erected" (c. 312, §1), implies that besides public and private associations, with their corresponding juridic status, there are some associations, born quite naturally from the right of association, which remain without official status and which can be called simply de facto associations. But those associations, while remaining de facto, may receive a "pastoral" recognition from competent authority by being praised or commended.

Categories [cc. 299–303]

The 1917 code spoke of various kinds of associations of the faithful, such as pious unions or sodalities, confraternities, etc. The new code no longer uses this terminology. Without making sharp or systematic distinctions, the code does refer to various types of associations, for example, "Catholic associations," or "clerical associations," or "third orders." In speaking of "private associations" and "public associations," it refers to the juridic status of associations of the faithful.

[23] See F. Morrisey, "What Makes an Institution 'Catholic,'" J 47 (1987) 538–539.

[24] See J. Provost, "The Canonical Aspects of Catholic Identity in the Light of Ex corde Ecclesiae," Stud Can 25 (1991) 170–171.

Private Associations[25]

Canon 299 — §1. By means of a private agreement made among themselves, the Christian faithful are free to establish associations to pursue the purposes mentioned in can. 298, §1, without prejudice to the prescript of can. 301, §1.

§2. Even if ecclesiastical authority praises or commends them, associations of this type are called private associations.

§3. No private association of the Christian faithful is recognized in the Church unless competent authority reviews its statutes.

The first paragraph of this canon basically repeats canon 215 on the right to associate. But it contains two noteworthy elements. First, the expression "by means of a private agreement made among themselves" corresponds to the above term, "de facto associations." It must not be confused with the more technical term, "private associations," which appears in paragraph two. Second, besides restating canon 215, canon 299, §l excludes some purposes which associations formed by private agreement might take up, namely what pertains directly to the competence of ecclesiastical authority such as teaching doctrine in the name of the Church.

If an association formed by private agreement is praised or commended by ecclesiastical authority, this does not in itself make the association either public or private. Praise or commendation is equivalent to a "pastoral" recognition, and does not grant any juridical status.[26]

That no private association of the faithful is formally recognized "in the Church unless competent authority reviews its statutes" does not mean that an association of the faithful formed by a private agreement is not recognized at all in the Church if its statutes have not been reviewed by the competent authority.[27] It means simply that any de facto association, or one formed by a private agreement, which wishes to obtain the status of a "private association" in the Church (cc. 321–326), must have its statutes reviewed by the competent authority. Thus a de facto association is neither irregular nor illegal. Rather, it would be illegal if it pretended to have the status of a "private association" without its statutes having been recognized.

Catholic Associations

Canon 300 — No association is to assume the name Catholic without the consent of competent ecclesiastical authority according to the norm of can. 312.

It is not only associations which are forbidden to take the name "Catholic" without the consent of the competent ecclesiastical authority. Canon 216, in affirming the existence of the right of apostolic initiative, forbids any undertaking born from this right to assume the name "Catholic" without the consent of that authority. More precisely yet, "even if it is in fact Catholic, no school is to bear the name Catholic school without the consent of competent ecclesiastical authority" (c. 803, §3).

Evidently the name "Catholic" constitutes a special recommendation, since it carries one of the marks of the Church itself. Hence, it is precisely the competent ecclesiastical authority which has a strict right to supervise the use of this term which qualifies the Church itself. "Catholic" is something which is universal, in the sense of "without borders." In this Catholic Church there subsists the Church of Christ, into which each baptized person is incorporated (c. 204, §2).[28]

[28] For further reflections on Catholic identity, see Provost, "Canonical Aspects of Catholic Identity," 159–168.

Public Associations[29]

Canon 301 — §1. It is for the competent ecclesiastical authority alone to erect associations of the Christian faithful which propose to hand on Christian doctrine in the name of the Church or to promote public worship, or which intend other purposes whose pursuit is of its nature reserved to the same ecclesiastical authority.

§2. Competent ecclesiastical authority, if it has judged it expedient, can also erect associations of the Christian faithful to pursue directly or indirectly other spiritual purposes whose accomplishment has not been sufficiently provided for through the initiatives of private persons.

§3. Associations of the Christian faithful which are erected by competent ecclesiastical authority are called public associations.

The first paragraph of canon 301 affirms the exclusive right of the competent ecclesiastical authority to erect certain types of associations of the faithful: those which set out to promote public worship, or those which aim at other ends whose pursuit is reserved by their nature to ecclesiastical authority.

Canon 298, §1 already mentioned the promotion of public worship or Christian doctrine as purposes for associations of the faithful. Canon 301, §l does not, however, limit the participation of the faithful to associations which devote themselves to such purposes. It only reserves the right to the competent ecclesiastical authority to erect such associations. Obviously, the reason is that they intend to teach Christian doctrine in the name of the Church and to promote public worship, activities within the competence of ecclesiastical authority.

Beyond this exclusive right, the competent authority can see to the assuring of the pursuit of certain other spiritual ends "whose accomplishment has not been sufficiently provided for through the initiatives of private persons." It can then itself erect some associations of the faithful "if it has judged it expedient" (§2).

[29] Cf. CCEO 573, §1 and 574.

When the competent ecclesiastical authority does erect an association of the faithful, this is called a "public association." It is, then, the fact of being "erected" by church authority that makes an association of the faithful "public" while it is a private association if it is "recognized." The conditions for obtaining these types of juridic status will be developed below.

Clerical Associations

Canon 302 — Those associations of the Christian faithful are called clerical which are under the direction of clerics, assume the exercise of sacred orders, and are recognized as such by competent authority.

Three conditions are needed for an association to be called "clerical": (1) it must be under the direction of clergy; (2) it must presume the exercise of sacred orders; (3) it must be recognized as such by competent authority.

These three conditions have to be fulfilled at the same time. That an association of the faithful be under the direction of clergy is not sufficient to make it a "clerical" association. That it assumes the exercise of sacred orders is not sufficient either. Moreover, this second condition does not mean that a clerical association must necessarily be formed exclusively of clergy.

An association could be formed uniquely of deacons, or exclusively of priests. Could the conference of bishops be called a clerical association in the terms of canon 302? It is quite difficult to give a positive answer, since the conference of bishops is not a free association (cf. c. 450). In fact, it is an expression of the affectus collegialis that belongs to the nature of the episcopate. However, the bishops may organize a clerical association open only to their colleagues; for example, for their spiritual needs.

Third Orders

Canon 303 — Associations whose members share in the spirit of some religious institute while in secular life, lead an apostolic life, and strive for Christian perfection under the higher direction of the same institute are called third orders or some other appropriate name.

The old code distinguished three types of associations of the faithful: secular third orders, confraternities, and pious unions. Canon 303 retains only the name of the first type, third orders. But it considerably expands its meaning.

In the old code, a secular third order designated lay persons living in the world the spiritual and apostolic values of a religious order composed of men (the first order) or women (the second order) (CIC 702–706). The new code permits associations of the faithful to be called "third orders" if their members participate in the spirit of any religious institute while living in the world. The name "third order" is thus no longer only descriptive, and by that fact it is no longer exclusive. Another characteristic of these third orders or associations which have "some other appropriate name" is their being "under the higher direction" of the institute which inspires them.

ORGANIZATION [cc. 304–305]

Since an association of the faithful is a society, it is a place where rights are exercised, where obligations are acquired, and where a common end or common good is pursued. As with any society, an association therefore needs a modicum of organization in order to be for its members the most effective means possible for promoting the purposes which they are pursuing.

Statutes[30]

Canon 304 — §1. All public or private associations of the Christian faithful, by whatever title or name they are called, are to have their own statutes which define the purpose or social objective of the association, its seat, government, and conditions required for membership and which determine the manner of its acting, attentive, however, to the necessity or advantage of time and place.

§2. They are to choose a title or name for themselves adapted to the usage of time and place, selected above all with regard to their intended purpose.

An association's statutes are a significant element of its juridic condition. As was previously stated in canon 299, §3, it is the review of its statutes which brings about the recognition of a private association in the Church. Other canons frequently refer to the content of the statutes.

The statutes have such importance because they represent the stable element of an organization, somewhat like a constitution does for a state. They are a key point of reference for both the rights and obligations of the members. The statutes are the stable reminder of the group's nature and objectives. This is why canon 304, §1 makes no exceptions: whether they are public or private, "by whatever title or name they are called," associations of the faithful "are to have their own statutes."

The canon prescribes the essential elements which must be inserted in the statutes. They must define the end or social objective of the association, its headquarters, its mode of government, and the conditions required for membership. They must determine the association's modes of action.

On the whole, the statutes of an association must contain sufficient elements to permit a member of the faithful who is interested in becoming a part of it to have the clearest understanding possible before joining it. Many other canons of the code deal with statutes and can potentially provide an inspiration for developing the statutes of an association of the faithful, e.g., canons 94, 451, 506, 587, and 1232.

Vigilance by Competent Authority[31]

Canon 305 — §1. All associations of the Christian faithful are subject to the vigilance of competent ecclesiastical authority which is to take care that the integrity of faith and morals is preserved in them and is to watch so that abuse does not creep into ecclesiastical discipline. This authority therefore has the duty and right to inspect them according to the norm of law and the statutes. These associations are also subject to the governance of this same authority according to the prescripts of the canons which follow.

[30] Cf. CCEO 576, §1.

[31] Cf. CCEO 577.

§2. Associations of any kind are subject to the vigilance of the Holy See; diocesan associations and other associations to the extent that they work in the diocese are subject to the vigilance of the local ordinary.

The Church's mission is to lead all human persons to unity, to build up the Body of Christ. While awaiting the definitive attainment of this end, the Church is the sacrament of that unity to which humanity is called. Church leaders are particularly sensitive to anything that expresses the communion of the faithful. They are therefore directly concerned with associations, as they are whenever public order is affected. This is why the present canon might theoretically apply equally to any association of the faithful, whether it has a juridic status in the Church or not. However, even if the text speaks without greater precision of "all associations of the Christian faithful" (§1) and of "associations of any kind" (§2) it seems evident from the context that it envisions here only those associations that are "public" and "private" as distinct from de facto associations.

The competent authority has the right and duty in virtue of its mission to exercise vigilance in the Christian community. In granting a juridic status to an association of the faithful, the Church becomes particularly involved in its life and activities. It follows, therefore, that even if the scope of the Church's right and duty of vigilance is not expanded, it at least acquires a particular significance by being defined by universal law and by proper law as expressed in the statutes. The right and duty of vigilance are exercised then "according to the norm of law and the statutes."

The object of the competent authority's vigilance is to preserve the integrity of faith and morals, and to "watch so that abuse does not creep into ecclesiastical discipline" (§1). But it includes many other aspects determined in the following canons.

Concretely, the Holy See constitutes the authority competent to exercise vigilance over any association of the faithful, whether it be public, private, diocesan, national, or international. The local ordinary exercises vigilance over diocesan associations, "and other associations to the extent that they work in the diocese" (§2). The local ordinary can thus intervene, if this is needed, not only when a diocesan association of the faithful has its headquarters in his own diocese, but also when an association—which may or may not be diocesan—carries on its work in his diocese even though it has its headquarters elsewhere. The manner of intervention as well as the situation calling for such intervention can vary according to the case and the nature of the association.

MEMBERS [cc. 306–308]

Members constitute the most important element of an association of the faithful. They are its principal agents. Since associations of the faithful are voluntary by nature, the faithful must know that their rights will be protected or promoted, but also that they assume obligations by joining an association. It is against this background that several prescriptions of law are written about the statutes, the most fundamental of which deal with how members of the faithful are admitted to and dismissed from an association.

Conditions of Belonging

Canon 306 — In order for a person to possess the rights and privileges of an association and the indulgences and other spiritual favors granted to the same association, it is necessary and sufficient that the person has been validly received into it and has not been legitimately dismissed from it according to the prescripts of law and the proper statutes of the association.

This canon mentions the two fundamental conditions for someone to enjoy the rights and advantages furnished by an association: that the person "has been validly received into it and has not been legitimately dismissed from it." These conditions are presented here as principles. The following canons will return to them. But the present canon refers to the "proper statutes of the association," those which contain the conditions for a valid reception into the association as well as those governing a legitimate dismissal.

Admission[32]

Canon 307 — §1. The reception of members is to be done according to the norm of law and the statutes of each association.

§2. The same person can be enrolled in several associations.

§3. Members of religious institutes can join associations according to the norm of their proper law with the consent of their superior.

As already prescribed in canon 304, §1, the association's statutes must contain the "conditions required for membership." Since associations of the faithful envision the fulfillment of some aspect of the mission of the Church, each in its own way, then "the same person can be enrolled in several associations" (c. 307, §2). However, the former code (CIC 705) prohibited members of a third order from being members of another third order.

Even while recognizing the fundamental right of association for members of religious institutes, paragraph three is careful to refer to the constitutions of each institute as well as to require the superior's consent. Not every association of the faithful, in effect, can be consonant with every type of religious institute. One has only to think of an institute of contemplative life. How could a member be involved in the activities of an association dedicated to the apostolate toward migrants or students? Furthermore, such a person could not "be summoned to furnish assistance in the various pastoral ministries" (c. 674).

Dismissal[33]

Canon 308 — No one legitimately enrolled is to be dismissed from an association except for a just cause according to the norm of law and the statutes.

Even if canon 304, §1 does not require that the conditions for dismissal from an association of the faithful be written into the statutes, this goes without saying, since in any case they are included in the conditions for admission. In effect, if people wish to be admitted into an association, they must make a commitment to espouse its purposes, modes of action, government, etc. If some members no longer respect this commitment, they could be considered to have excluded themselves from the association. However, that is not sufficient. The statutes protect the rights and duties of the members as well as of the association itself; they must specify what causes will justify a dismissal, and even the procedures which will lead to it.

FUNCTIONING [cc. 309–311]

Whether or not they are erected as juridic persons, associations of the faithful must be able to function in a way which will enable them to attain their end and which permits their members to attain their individual ends.

Internal Functioning

Canon 309 — According to the norm of law and the statutes, legitimately established associations have the right to issue particular norms respecting the association itself, to hold meetings, and to designate moderators, officials, other officers, and administrators of goods.

[32] Cf. CCEO 578.

[33] Cf. CCEO 581.

The term "legitimately established" applies to private as well as public associations. However, the working out of this right "to issue particular norms" will vary according to the association's juridic status. More precise qualifications of this right will be discussed below.

Rights and Obligations of a Private Association

Canon 310 — A private association which has not been established as a juridic person cannot, as such, be a subject of obligations and rights. Nevertheless, the members of the Christian faithful associated together in it can jointly contract obligations and can acquire and possess rights and goods as co-owners and co-possessors; they are able to exercise these rights and obligations through an agent or a proxy.

As expressed in the previous canon, every association of the faithful has the right to issue rules concerning its own internal workings. But for an association to have an external function—or better, for it to be the subject of rights and obligations besides those which it has in regard to its own members—it must have a juridic personality. However, as will be discussed below, only public associations acquire a juridic personality by the very decree which erects them as public associations. For a private association to have a juridic personality, it must expressly request it and fulfill the conditions set forth in the law.

What happens if a private association does not request juridic personality? Although it cannot as such be the subject of rights and obligations, its members "can jointly contract obligations and can acquire and possess rights and goods as co-owners and co-possessors." Individual members are therefore responsible for their respective obligations and rights contracted jointly.

It should be noted that goods held jointly are not ecclesiastical goods and thus are not subject to canonical norms regulating these, e.g., those in Book V. They remain private goods. Since the association cannot act as a body or a juridic person, the members cannot exercise the rights and obligations they have contracted except by an agent or proxy. Obviously, all of these issues must be dealt with in the statutes.

Cooperation among Associations

Canon 311 — Members of institutes of consecrated life who preside over or assist associations in some way united to their institute are to take care that these associations give assistance to the works of the apostolate which already exist in a diocese, especially cooperating, under the direction of the local ordinary, with associations which are ordered to the exercise of the apostolate in the diocese.

This canon deals especially with associations that are governed by canon 303, those which "are called third orders or some other appropriate name."[34] Canon 311 basically reminds the directors or associate directors of these associations that, while they are dedicated to the works and mission of the institute which inspires them, they are primarily a means of serving the mission of the faithful. Therefore, they cannot distance themselves from "the works of the apostolate which already exist in a diocese."

The preferred way to assist diocesan works is by cooperation, "under the direction of the local ordinary, with associations which are ordered to the exercise of the apostolate in the diocese." Mutatis mutandis a similar provision applies to institutes of consecrated life (see c. 778). This is, moreover, the meaning of canon 305, §2, which speaks of the vigilance role of the local ordinary.

[34] Christian faithful (laity, clerics, or religious) may be associated with an institute of consecrated life to participate in its spiritual life and its apostolate. Most of the time they will remain individually associated. However, sometimes they will be gathered in an association. Canon 311 does not pertain to the former; it does pertain to the latter. Actually, the code does not deal with individuals associated with institutes of consecrated life.

CHAPTER II
PUBLIC ASSOCIATIONS
OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITHFUL
[cc. 312–320]

This chapter of the code presents the characteristic traits of public associations of the faithful. The canons cover their nature, the admission of members, their moderator and chaplain, the administration of their goods, and finally their suppression.

NATURE
[cc. 312–315]

The most distinctive feature of public associations is the fact that they are erected by competent authority and by this very fact receive a juridic personality.

Authority Competent to Erect Public Associations[35]

Canon 312 — §1. The authority competent to erect public associations is:

1° the Holy See for universal and international associations;

2° the conference of bishops in its own territory for national associations, that is, those which from their founding are directed toward activity throughout the whole nation;

3° the diocesan bishop in his own territory, but not a diocesan administrator, for diocesan associations, except, however, for those associations whose right of erection has been reserved to others by apostolic privilege.

§2. Written consent of the diocesan bishop is required for the valid erection of an association or section of an association in a diocese even if it is done by virtue of apostolic privilege. Nevertheless, the consent given by a diocesan bishop for the erection of a house of a religious institute is also valid for the erection in the same house or church attached to it of an association which is proper to that institute.

The expression "the authority competent" has been used several times in this section of the code. Each time it has been used in the sense of canon 312.

According to paragraph one, the authority competent to erect public associations varies depending on their territorial scope. If the association is universal and international, then it belongs to the Holy See to erect it.[36] If the association is to be national, then the conference of bishops erects it. The diocesan bishop erects diocesan associations, unless the association is one "whose right of erection has been reserved to others by apostolic privilege." For example, establishing sodalities of the rosary is reserved to the Dominican Order.[37] The second paragraph of this canon, however, conditions the valid exercise of this privilege on the written consent of the diocesan bishop. One should recall that the competent authority is the same for the approval of private associations (cf. c. 299, §3).

Unless it was founded by the Holy See itself or by the conference of bishops according to the terms of canon 301, an association of the faithful begins by being erected as a diocesan association,

[35] Cf. CCEO 575.

[36] According to an internal document of the PCL, in 1996 forty-eight associations of Christian lay faithful had received recognition as international private associations or had been erected as international public associations; and thirteen others had requested an international (§1) status that was being examined. It is interesting to note that among the forty-eight associations that have received international status, forty-four were recognized as private associations. Some private ones received their status for three years, some for five years, some indefinitely. Since a public association is granted juridic personality which is perpetual by its nature (c. 120), it is strange to note that one of the four public associations received its status for three years.

[37] See E. Kneal, in CLSA Com, 250.

usually after having been a de facto association and perhaps praised or recommended by the competent authority. Once erected in one diocese, an association does not have to be erected again by the bishop of another diocese in order to work there, since it has already been erected. But it obviously must obtain the agreement of the local bishop before beginning to work or to establish itself there, somewhat like religious institutes (cc. 678–683) and personal prelatures (c. 297).

A diocesan association which spreads to many or even all the dioceses of a bishops' conference does not thereby become a "national" association.[38] Moreover, if such an association were to become established in several countries, it would not become "international" or "universal" in a legal sense. To become "national" or "international," it must be erected as such by the competent authority, either the bishops' conference or the Holy See respectively.

It should be noted that the bishops of an ecclesiastical province (c. 431) or region (c. 433) of a bishops' conference are not considered to be the competent authority for erecting an association of the faithful. Of course, each of the bishops of a district could praise or authorize the activities of such an association or establish it in their respective dioceses. All the bishops of the area could obviously issue a joint communiqué praising an association. But this does not give it a different juridic status.

Canon 312, §2 prescribes that a diocesan association cannot validly be erected unless the diocesan bishop consents in writing. No exception is made, even for an association or the section of an association which can be erected only by someone else in virtue of an apostolic privilege; even here, the written consent of the diocesan bishop is needed. On the other hand, the consent of the bishop to erect the house of a religious institute in his diocese "is also valid for the erection in the same house or church attached to it of an association which is proper to that institute."

[38] See CCCB Guidelines, 26.

Juridic Personality

Canon 313 — Through the same decree by which the competent ecclesiastical authority according to the norm of can. 312 erects it, a public association and even a confederation of public associations is constituted a juridic person and, to the extent it is required, receives a mission for the purposes which it proposes to pursue in the name of the Church.

An association of the faithful is constituted as a juridic person by the very decree which erects it as a public association. This is one of the characteristics which distinguishes it from a private association, which has to make an explicit request if it wishes to acquire a juridic personality (c. 322, §1).

A public association can receive "a mission for the purposes which it proposes to pursue in the name of the Church," to the extent that such mission is required. An association of the faithful which receives such a canonical mission acquires a public juridic personality in the terms of canon 116, §1.

The fact that an association of the faithful acquires a public juridic personality in being erected as a public association has a special impact on the laws which affect it. This is because, up to a certain point, the Church endorses its objectives, its manner of acting, etc., since it gives the association a mission to act in its name.

What canon 313 says about public associations also applies to confederations of public associations. Such confederations are treated nowhere else in the code. Since canon 313 places them on the same level as public associations in regard to their erection, one may conclude that there can be groupings of public associations which are de facto confederations and which need not be erected by competent authority. If they are so erected, they obtain public or private juridic personality, depending on whether they receive a mission to act in the name of the Church.

Approval of Statutes[39]

Canon 314 — The statutes of each public association and their revision or change need the approval of the ecclesiastical authority competent to erect the association according to the norm of can. 312, §1.

Since a public association acquires a juridic personality in being erected, its statutes must be approved by the competent authority. In effect, according to canon 117, "no aggregate of persons (universitas personarum) or of things (universitas rerum), intending to obtain juridic personality, is able to acquire it unless competent authority has approved its statutes." Obviously, the same is true for any change in the statutes.

Here an approval is required, not just a recognition as in the case of private associations (c. 299, §3). As will be seen below (c. 322, §2), if a private association wishes to obtain a juridic personality, its statutes must be approved and not merely recognized. Evidently, the effects of recognition are not the same as those of approval; through approval the Church commits itself to a greater degree, to the same extent that it commits itself when it grants juridic personality. Such personality implies a set of rights and duties which are limited, as are those of physical persons (c. 223).

Right of Initiative

Canon 315 — Public associations are able on their own initiative to undertake endeavors in keeping with their own character. These endeavors are governed according to the norm of the statutes, though under the higher direction of the ecclesiastical authority mentioned in can. 312, §1.

Canon 315 merely recognizes for public associations, which are juridic persons, what canon 216 has already recognized for physical persons. The right of initiative which is recognized for the former, however, must be exercised in conformity with their proper character, "according to the norm of the statutes," and "under the higher direction of the ecclesiastical authority."

Admission of Members

Canon 316 — §1. A person who has publicly rejected the Catholic faith, has defected from ecclesiastical communion, or has been punished by an imposed or declared excommunication cannot be received validly into public associations.

§2. Those enrolled legitimately who fall into the situation mentioned in §1, after being warned, are to be dismissed from the association, with due regard for its statutes and without prejudice to the right of recourse to the ecclesiastical authority mentioned in can. 312, §1.

The statutes of any association, public or private, must define the conditions of membership. To impose some conditions is the most legitimate right of an association. No one can ever be obliged to join an association, but one must know the conditions in advance. The criteria for admitting members will be determined greatly by the ends and means of the association in question.

However, there are some important limits in regard to the exercise of this right to define the conditions of membership by public associations. Canon 316 establishes that they cannot validly admit to their membership someone who has publicly rejected the Catholic faith, been separated from the communion of the Church, or been subject to an imposed or declared excommunication.

Understandably, a person in one of these situations cannot be part of a public association, given the purpose of associations of the faithful in general and the particular nature of public associations, which act in the name of the Church. The minimal condition of membership in such associations is fulfilling the first duty of any of the Christian faithful, i.e., maintaining communion with the Church (c. 209, §1).

[39] Cf. CCEO 576.

It is not always easy to apply the provision of canon 316. The difficulty is not located at the level of the logical consistency on which this prescription is based. It consists rather in the criteria used to identify "a person who has publicly rejected the Catholic faith, or has defected from ecclesiastical communion." There is no difficulty in regard to "an imposed or declared excommunication," since there would be documents to prove this.

The question, then, is to know at what moment a person has publicly rejected the Catholic faith or abandoned communion with the Church. On one hand, there must be a rejection of the Catholic faith, and this must be public; on the other hand, a person must distance himself or herself from the communion of the Church.

The first case can occur when someone crosses over publicly from the Catholic faith to, for example, the Lutheran faith. The second case could happen when someone abandons communion with the (Catholic) Church but without joining any other ecclesial community. Undoubtedly the mere fact of no longer going to Mass would not be enough to indicate abandonment of the Catholic communion. Moreover, each case would have to be examined separately.[40]

The provisions of paragraph one apply equally to the dismissal of persons legitimately inscribed in a public association. Canon 308 has already foreseen that a member legitimately admitted in an association can be dismissed. However, this can be done only with due regard for its statutes and without prejudice to the right of recourse to the competent authority.

MODERATOR AND CHAPLAIN [cc. 317–318]

Among the positions required for the effective working of an association of the faithful, certainly the most important are those of moderator and of chaplain or ecclesiastical assistant. Since a public association acts in the name of the Church, the competent authority always plays an important role in the process not only of designating but also of removing those who hold these positions.

Designation

Canon 317 — §1. Unless the statutes provide otherwise, it is for the ecclesiastical authority mentioned in can. 312, §1 to confirm the moderator of a public association elected by the public association itself, install the one presented, or appoint the moderator in his own right. The same ecclesiastical authority also appoints the chaplain or ecclesiastical assistant, after having heard the major officials of the association, when it is expedient.

§2. The norm stated in §1 is also valid for associations which members of religious institutes erect outside their own churches or houses in virtue of apostolic privilege. In associations which members of religious institutes erect in their own church or house, however, the nomination or confirmation of the moderator and chaplain pertains to the superior of the institute, according to the norm of the statutes.

§3. In associations which are not clerical, lay persons are able to exercise the function of moderator. A chaplain or ecclesiastical assistant is not to assume that function unless the statutes provide otherwise.

§4. Those who exercise leadership in political parties are not to be moderators in public associations of the Christian faithful which are ordered directly to the exercise of the apostolate.

The dispositions vary depending on whether the moderator or the chaplain is being named.

(a) Moderator. The code often uses the term "moderator," but without ever defining it. Despite several variations depending on the context, the moderator is always someone responsible, a sponsor, a coordinator. In the law for religious it is used in the sense of a superior. It is used in the same sense in the canons on associations of the faithful. For example, canon 320, §3 speaks of the "moderator and other major officials."

[40] See Kneal, in CLSA Com, 251–252. The author discusses various possible criteria for judging each case.

The language of canon 317, §1 echoes that of the canons on ecclesiastical offices, summed up in canon 147: "The provision of an ecclesiastical office is made: through free conferral by a competent ecclesiastical authority; through installation by the same authority if presentation preceded it; through confirmation or admission granted by the same authority if election or postulation preceded it."

It is up to the statutes to determine if the public association will elect its moderator, who must then be confirmed by the competent authority, or will present the moderator to be installed by that same authority, or will even have the moderator directly named by the competent authority. The statutes could provide something else. But whether it is through election, presentation, or nomination by the competent authority, the procedure to be followed is that which is provided for each of these approaches in the canons on ecclesiastical offices (cc. 157–179).

The same is true for associations which "members of religious institutes erect outside their own churches or houses in virtue of apostolic privilege." But if religious erect associations in their own church or house, the superior of the institute names or confirms the moderator.

Lay persons, religious men and women, and clergy can be moderators in associations of the faithful. However, the code also specifies certain restrictions. Lay persons cannot be moderators in clerical associations. Normally, the chaplain cannot exercise the job of moderator at the same time because of a conflict of fora. Those who exercise leadership in political parties cannot be moderators in public associations "which are ordered directly to the exercise of the apostolate." Obviously, the reason is that public associations act in the name of the Church (c. 313) while political parties, by their very nature, are exclusive of those who are not members of them. The provision here seeks to avoid any danger of confusion or conflict on both sides.

(b) Chaplain. The function of chaplain is clearly defined in canon 564. He is "a priest to whom is entrusted in a stable manner the pastoral care, at least in part, of some community or particular group of the Christian faithful." It is then necessarily a priest, whom canon 317, §1 also calls by the name of "ecclesiastical assistant."

He is named by the competent ecclesiastical authority, who may decide to consult the major officials of the association before proceeding to name the chaplain. Likewise the authority which is competent to erect the association is also the one who names the chaplain in an association erected by members of religious institutes outside their churches or houses. If the association is erected by members of a religious institute in their own church or house, then the superior of the institute names the chaplain.

Removal

Canon 318 — §1. In special circumstances and where grave reasons require it, the ecclesiastical authority mentioned in can. 312, §1 can designate a trustee who is to direct the association for a time in its name.

§2. The person who appointed or confirmed the moderator of a public association can remove the moderator for a just cause, after the person has heard, however, the moderator and the major officials of the association according to the norm of the statutes. The person who appointed a chaplain can remove him according to the norm of cann. 192–195.

Habitually in the code the power to remove an official corresponds to the power to appoint such an official. Similarly, those who accept a mandate because they fulfill certain legal requirements ought not to be surprised that the mandating authority may revoke such a mandate if those requirements are no longer fulfilled.

But removal is not the only option in a problematic situation. In fact, it could be an extreme solution, or perhaps not the best one. In special circumstances and where grave reasons require it, the competent authority might judge that a trustee is to be named to direct the association temporarily. The canon mentions neither what circumstances nor what reasons may justify such action. This is similar to placing someone under a tutor or guardian. The naming of such a trustee, obviously, is exceptional and can only be temporary. It is not always a step necessarily tied to the dismissal of the moderator. It is easy to imagine that in certain circumstances it would not be good to name a new moderator; a key task of the trustee would often be that of assessing the situation in this regard.

If the moderator was elected or presented, the competent authority who confirmed or instituted such a one could remove the person, but not without first having heard the moderator as well as the major officials of the association as indicated in the statutes. There must, evidently, be a just cause to remove a moderator.

The removal of the chaplain is subject to the prescriptions of canons 192–195 on ecclesiastical offices.

Administration of Goods[41]

Canon 319 — §1. Unless other provision has been made, a legitimately erected public association administers the goods which it possesses according to the norm of the statutes under the higher direction of the ecclesiastical authority mentioned in can. 312, §1, to which it must render an account of administration each year.

§2. It must also render to the same authority a faithful account of the expenditure of the offerings and alms which it has collected.

Since public associations become juridic persons by the decree which erects them as public associations, one consequence is that their goods have become "ecclesiastical goods." They are regulated by the canons of Book V on temporal goods, as well as by their own statutes (c. 1257, §1).

The fact that these goods are ecclesiastical goods does not remove them from the possession or ownership of the public associations of the faithful. In effect, under the supreme authority of the Roman Pontiff, the ownership of goods belongs to that juridic person which has acquired them legitimately (c. 1256). But their administration is subject to considerable restrictions.

Besides conforming to the provisions of its statutes approved by the competent authority, a public association "must render an account of administration each year" to that same authority. The use of offerings and alms is also subject to such reporting. The form according to which such reports are to be made will usually be determined in the statutes or by local custom in accord with canon 1287.

Suppression[42]

Canon 320 — §1. Only the Holy See can suppress associations it has erected.

§2. For grave causes, a conference of bishops can suppress associations it has erected. A diocesan bishop can suppress associations he has erected and also associations which members of religious institutes have erected through apostolic indult with the consent of the diocesan bishop.

§3. The competent authority is not to suppress a public association unless the authority has heard its moderator and other major officials.

A public association can be suppressed by the same authority which erected it, whether it be the Holy See, the conference of bishops, or the diocesan bishop. The diocesan bishop, in addition to being able to suppress associations which he himself has erected, can also suppress those erected by members of religious institutes in virtue of an apostolic indult, but which required his consent. Nevertheless, a competent authority cannot suppress a public association without having heard the moderator and other major officers.

The provisions for the suppression of a private association are slightly different (c. 326, §1). Therefore, it will be important to determine if an association that received its canonical status before 1983 is a private or a public association according to the new code.[43] Those two categories of associations did not exist in the former code.

In the case of suppression, an association can always take hierarchical recourse against the decree of the competent authority (cc. 1732–1739). The competent authority to deal with such recourse depends on the type of association. It could be the Pontifical Council for the Laity,[44] the Congregation for the Clergy,[45] or the Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life[46] if a lay association has been founded to become eventually an institute of consecrated life or a society of apostolic life.

After a public association has been suppressed, its goods must be distributed according to the provisions of the statutes. Of course, the practical application of those provisions may depend on an existing civil charter of incorporation. On the other hand, this charter is supposed to be in conformity with canonical statutes. If the statutes give no indication of how the goods are to be distributed, they go to the juridic person immediately superior, always without prejudice to the intention of the founders and donors and acquired rights (c. 123). In principle, the determination of the juridic person immediately superior depends on the character of the association (international, national, or diocesan). It will be the Holy See, the conference of bishops, or the diocese, unless the suppressed association is part of a confederation of public associations (c. 313). Such a confederation is a juridic person and may be considered as the juridic person immediately superior.

CHAPTER III
PRIVATE ASSOCIATIONS OF THE CHRISTIAN FAITHFUL
[cc. 321–326]

Private associations of the faithful constitute perhaps the most striking fruit of the renewal of the law concerning associations in the Church. None of the prescriptions of the current chapter was found in the 1917 code.

A simple reading of these prescriptions leaves the impression that private associations of the faithful enjoy considerable freedom on several very important points such as the choice of juridic personality, the designation of officers and spiritual counselor, and the administration of goods. However, this does not eliminate the responsibility of the competent authority already treated in the chapter on the norms common to all associations of the faithful: this is made explicit on certain points in the present chapter.

NATURE
[cc. 321–322]

If associations of the faithful become public associations by being erected as such by the competent authority, who must approve their statutes, they become private associations when they are praised or recommended and their statutes are recognized by this same authority (c. 299).

Autonomy

Canon 321 — The Christian faithful guide and direct private associations according to the prescripts of the statutes.

The minimum required of an association of the faithful which wishes to obtain the status of a private association is the drawing up of statutes with a view to their being recognized. The fact that these statutes may be recognized by the competent authority as respecting the rights of persons and the minimal norms common to all associations of the faithful underlie canon 321, which acknowledges the competency of the faithful to guide and direct their private associations.

In fact, the statutes will be recognized if they contain the elements defining the framework in which the private association's autonomy will evolve. Such a "framework" implies limits, since a private association is subject to the vigilance of the competent authority. Its autonomy, therefore, is not absolute, any more than is the freedom of de facto associations or that of the individual faithful.

Acquiring a Juridic Personality

Canon 322 — §1. A private association of the Christian faithful can acquire juridic personality through a formal decree of the competent ecclesiastical authority mentioned in can. 312.

§2. No private association of the Christian faithful can acquire juridic personality unless the ecclesiastical authority mentioned in can. 312, §1 has approved its statutes. Approval of the statutes, however, does not change the private nature of the association.

A public association acquires public juridic personality by being erected as such by the competent authority. A private association, however, must expressly request such personality if it wishes to be the subject of corporate rights and duties. In this situation, the authority which can give it juridic personality is the same as the authority which is competent to recognize its status as a private association.

A formal decree of the competent authority is always required for a private association to acquire juridic personality. Although a simple recognition of its statutes is enough to give it the status of a private association, these statutes must now be approved in order for the private association to receive juridic personality (c. 117). This approval, even if it is more demanding than a simple recognition, "does not change the private nature of the association."

Will such an association which asks for juridic personality receive a private juridic personality? Since a public juridic person fulfills its specific tasks in the name of the Church (see c. 116, §1) and since this is a characteristic of a public association of the faithful, undoubtedly there would seem to be a certain discrepancy if a private association were to be granted public juridic personality.[47]

FUNCTIONING
[cc. 323–325]

In comparison with public associations, private associations enjoy a rather notable freedom of activity. Such freedom, of course, is not absolute, just as there is no absolute freedom for the persons who are members of a private association.

Vigilance by Competent Authority

Canon 323 — §1. Although private associations of the Christian faithful possess autonomy according to the norm of can. 321, they are subject to the vigilance of ecclesiastical authority according to the norm of can. 305 and even to the governance of the same authority.

§2. It also pertains to ecclesiastical authority, while respecting the autonomy proper to private associations, to be watchful and careful that dissipation of their energies is avoided and that their exercise of the apostolate is ordered to the common good.

Even as it reaffirms the autonomy of private associations, canon 323 defines the limits of its exercise. This reflects canon 223 that gives the competent authority the right to regulate the exercise of the rights of Christ's faithful, such as the right to associate (c. 215) in view of fostering the common good. Canon 323 first recalls that, like any association, private associations are subject to the governance and vigilance of the competent authority regarding the integrity of faith and morals, and are to observe ecclesiastical discipline (c. 305). It then reminds private associations of the right and duty of competent authority to intervene if their action does not correspond to the expectations raised in seeking recognition, and if their apostolate is not ordered toward the common good.

Designation of Officers and Spiritual Advisors

Canon 324 — §1. A private association of the Christian faithful freely designates its moderator and officials according to the norm of the statutes.

§2. A private association of the Christian faithful can freely choose a spiritual advisor, if it desires one, from among the priests exercising ministry legitimately in the diocese; nevertheless, he needs the confirmation of the local ordinary.

Canon 309 establishes that "legitimately established associations" have the right to designate their moderators, etc., "according to the norm of law and the statutes." In contrast with what applies to public associations, which "according to the norm of law" must have their moderator confirmed, instituted, or named by competent church authority, private associations freely designate theirs, as well as their officers. This must, however, be done according to the approved statutes.

While in public associations the chaplain or ecclesiastical assistant is named by the competent authority, in private associations this person, called a "spiritual advisor," is freely chosen by the association itself. Despite differences between the names designating these functions, the person must always be a priest. The spiritual counselor of a private association must be exercising ministry legitimately in the diocese. No matter what authority was competent to approve the private association, the choice of a spiritual counselor requires the confirmation of the local ordinary.

It is conceivable that not every association of the faithful will be able to find a priest to take on this role. If no priest is available, could a deacon, a lay religious, or another lay person do this? Yes, as long as distinctly priestly acts are performed by a priest, for example, confession and Eucharist. Therefore, deacons or lay people can supply certain functions usually performed by the spiritual advisor who is normally a priest. To avoid confusion with a properly priestly role, the term "spiritual advisor" should not be used for such a deacon or lay person.[48] In the event, each association is to find an appropriate term.

Administration of Goods

Canon 325 — §1. A private association of the Christian faithful freely administers those goods it possesses according to the prescripts of the statutes, without prejudice to the right of competent ecclesiastical authority to exercise vigilance so that the goods are used for the purposes of the association.

§2. A private association is subject to the authority of the local ordinary according to the norm of can. 1301 in what pertains to the administration and distribution of goods which have been donated or left to it for pious causes.

Canon 325 presupposes that the private association has not sought to become a juridic person, and that, consequently, the members of the private association can acquire and possess goods as co-owners and co-possessors (c. 310). The statutes must mention the right of the members to acquire goods, which would make more understandable the provisions of canon 325, §1 that "a private association of the Christian faithful freely administers those goods it possesses according to the prescripts of the statutes." But it is also understandable that the competent authority has the right "to exercise vigilance so that the goods are used for the purposes of the association." This gives it the right to intervene should an abuse arise in this regard. Such a provision is unnecessary for public associations since, having public juridic personality, the provisions of Book V are relevant to them. For example, canon 1276, §1 gives ordinaries the right to exercise vigilance over the administration of all the goods which belong to public juridic persons subject to them.

Since the competent authority is to be watchful over the proper use of the association's goods, the association is subject to the local ordinary regarding the administration and distribution of goods destined for pious causes. The text does not distinguish between diocesan, national, or international associations. This is because "the ordinary is the executor of all pious wills" in his diocese (c. 1301, §1).

Extinction

Canon 326 — §1. A private association of the Christian faithful ceases to exist according to the norm of its statutes. The competent authority can also suppress it if its activity causes grave harm to ecclesiastical doctrine or discipline or is a scandal to the faithful.

§2. The allocation of the goods of an association which has ceased to exist must be determined according to the norm of its statutes, without prejudice to acquired rights and the intention of the donors.

The statutes must provide for the fact that an association which began in time can also disappear in time, whether this be because it no longer has enough members, or no longer meets a need, or for any other reason. It could always merge with another association.

There is, however, yet another means of extinction provided for by the general law, and that is suppression. This means of extinction should not be surprising, if the preceding observations are taken into account. Even if a private association enjoys significant autonomy in its action, this autonomy cannot be more extensive than what pertains to the individual faithful who make it up.

In the preceding canons of this title, the vigilance of the competent authority has been mentioned frequently. This vigilance is relevant to three major areas of ecclesial life: faith, morals, and discipline. Depending on the gravity of the abuse, the nature of the intervention by authority can vary. At an extreme point, it could go so far as the suppression of the association by the authority which recognized it.

Evidently, this is an extreme step which must be proportionate to the gravity of the cause, and which presupposes that other means of addressing the problem have been tried. Above all, a concern for the common good or public order must guide such a decision.

The statutes are to provide for the distribution of the goods of an association extinguished by suppression or otherwise. If it is not a juridic person, then the statutes should have provided that the members are co-owners and co-possessors of the private association's goods (c. 310). Yet rights acquired by others must also be respected, such as rights acquired by contracts with other physical or juridic persons. Also, the will of donors must be respected if, for example, the association received any legacies or accepted any foundations. In any event, it must always be remembered that certain civil law provisions may need to be observed to avoid any possible civil suits.

CHAPTER IV
SPECIAL NORMS FOR ASSOCIATIONS OF THE LAITY
[cc. 327–329]

The norms studied so far apply without distinction to any association of the faithful, whether lay or not. It is the chosen juridic status which determines which norms are to apply, regardless of the clerical, lay, or religious character of the association. The only exception, perhaps, is canon 302 on "clerical" associations.

The three "special" norms of this chapter bring nothing specific to the nature of associations of lay persons. None of them even gives an exact notion of lay associations. At least canon 42 of the 1977 schema on the people of God said that, for all practical purposes, associations which do not correspond to the description of clerical associations are called "lay." It is probably a good thing that the commission did not keep this formulation, since members of religious institutes or priests may be members of non-clerical associations. Therefore, any possible confusion is avoided.

Hence the recognized or approved statutes will have to determine whether an association is a lay association. Will it always be appropriate to do this? Determining the ends, means of action, and at times the leadership of the association will most often be enough to clarify that it is a lay association.

Even if some clergy or religious could be members, as in third orders, these associations "under the higher direction" of a religious institute (c. 303) are indeed lay associations. Canon 328 speaks, moreover, of those who direct lay associations, without further precision.

Importance

Canon 327 — Lay members of the Christian faithful are to hold in esteem associations established for the spiritual purposes mentioned in can. 298, especially those which propose to animate the temporal order with the Christian spirit and in this way greatly foster an intimate union between faith and life.

Lay persons are invited to prefer those associations of the faithful whose ends correspond directly to their distinctive role in fulfilling the Church's mission, and which can be held by no one else.

This canon faithfully reflects canon 225, the first one in the list of rights and obligations proper to lay faithful who are "bound by the general obligation and possess the right as individuals, or joined in associations, to work so that the divine message of salvation is made known and accepted by all persons everywhere in the world." This in no way diminishes the importance of associations whose purpose is personal perfection or piety. The Church knows well that there is no true apostolate which is not rooted in an authentic spirituality.[49] This is why, moreover, lay persons are invited to esteem those associations "which propose to animate the temporal order with the Christian spirit and in this way greatly foster an intimate union between faith and life."

Mutual Cooperation

Canon 328 — Those who preside over associations of the laity, even those which have been erected by virtue of apostolic privilege, are to take care that their associations cooperate with other associations of the Christian faithful where it is expedient and willingly assist various Christian works, especially those in the same territory.

When the legislation on associations of the faithful is reviewed in its entirety, it is clear that no association can close in on itself, or focus solely on the proper and exclusive good of its members. Several canons call for—at the very least—openness to cooperation with other associations.

The present canon reflects canons 311, 323, and other canons on the right and duty of competent ecclesiastical authority to exercise vigilance. The diocesan bishop is directly concerned for any association working in his diocese. He is to foster various forms of the apostolate in the diocese and take care that in the entire diocese or in its particular districts, all the works of the apostolate are coordinated under his direction, with due regard for their distinctive character (c. 394, §1).

[49] See AA 3.

Formation of Members

Canon 329 — Moderators of associations of the laity are to take care that the members of the association are duly formed to exercise the apostolate proper to the laity.

This prescription is self-explanatory. The organization itself must provide that everything is done so that the members of a lay association are formed adequately to accomplish their proper work.

But more must be said. Lay persons have the right to expect this formation. In effect, according to canon 229, §1, "lay persons are bound by the obligation and possess the right to acquire knowledge of Christian doctrine appropriate to the capacity and condition of each in order for them to be able to live according to this doctrine, announce it themselves, defend it if necessary, and take their part in exercising the apostolate." A lay association could be a privileged place not only for fulfilling this obligation, but for demanding the exercise of this fundamental right.

Conclusion

The activities proper to lay associations of the faithful depend on various factors which to a great extent constitute their limits as defined in law. These limits relate for the most part to the question of juridic status, but also to the reservation by competent authority of certain foundations whose ends relate directly to its own ends.

An examination of the legal dispositions on associations of the faithful makes it clear that their freedom of action diminishes as they are more formally recognized by those in charge of the community. So long as they remain de facto associations, they have the same freedom as the members who make them up, aside from that of adopting the name "Catholic" (c. 300). This is the fundamental exercise of the right of association. The ecclesial and secular activities of these associations are as varied and diversified as the mission of the Church or the nature of Christian life.

However, the faithful are invited to join "especially those associations which competent ecclesiastical authority has erected, praised, or commended" (c. 298, §2). Here is where the juridic status of associations of the faithful becomes a question.

Besides reminding us that every association of the faithful is not necessarily erected, praised, or commended and that de facto associations can exist, canon 298, §2 clarifies the meaning of the recognition of associations of the faithful by the competent authority. For their potential members, this recognition provides, at least in principle, a guarantee of their doctrinal authenticity, their communion with the leaders of the ecclesial community, and the conformity of their activities with the Church's mission.

In the very act of recognizing an association, the episcopate exercises its role of vigilance by a means which is proper to it. From the viewpoint of the association, recognition brings a confirmation of its validity, and sometimes this is an important element reassuring the faithful desiring to join it. Of course, recognition also provides a voice for the association. For example, to the question: "Whether a group of faithful, lacking juridical personality and even recognition as envisaged in canon 299, §3, can legitimately make hierarchical recourse against a decree of its own diocesan bishop," the Pontifical Commission for the Authentic Interpretation of the Code of Canon Law (the former name of the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts) responded: "Negative as a group."[50] The commission added that they can make a recourse as individual members of the group, singly or together, but not as an association.

It should be recalled that associations are not obliged to seek recognition. But likewise the competent authority is not bound to recognize every association which asks for such recognition. The conditions set forth in the law must be observed. However, there is one condition the law does not contain, and that is the test of time which the authority could always require prior to acceding to a request for recognition.[51]

Recognition imposes certain constraints on the freedom of an association. However, it also offers certain advantages. For example, such recognition assures people that the association conforms to the Church's mission.

The norms to be observed in erecting a public association are much more demanding than those which deal with the recognition of a private association. This is because the Church feels itself more committed when it erects an association of the faithful as a public association. But the same is true on the part of the association, which must respond to various exigencies even while leaving greater room for interventions by competent authority.

Does all this mean that the range of ecclesial and secular activities varies according to an association's juridic status? It would seem so. For example, in receiving a public juridic personality, a public association receives a mission to act in the name of the Church, and its goods become ecclesiastical goods. Any change in orientation or mission is subject to approval by the competent authority, even as the administration of its goods is subject to the general law concerning the temporal goods of the Church.

Part II
THE HIERARCHICAL CONSTITUTION OF THE CHURCH
[cc. 330–572]

SECTION I
THE SUPREME AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH
[cc. 330–367]

Scarcely any concept at the last council was so frequently mentioned as that of collegiality between the pope and bishops. The First Vatican Council (1869/1870), which was concerned in a particular way with the position of the pope (primacy, infallibility), was an interrupted, incomplete council. It did not clarify the status of the bishops, particularly their juridical relationship to the pope. The central document of the Second Vatican Council, the dogmatic constitution Lumen gentium, dealt with this fundamental question of Catholic ecclesiology.

That the constitution was dealing with a sensitive point of ecclesiology is clear from the fact that it was accompanied by a preliminary "Explanatory Note" through the initiative of Paul VI, a unique event in conciliar history. The "Explanatory Note" refers essentially to the central, third chapter of the constitution, which treats the "hierarchical structure of the Church, in particular the office of bishop."

Right from the beginning, the "Explanatory Note" addresses the delicate notion of collegiality, more precisely the word collegium (college). A significant assertion in the "Explanatory Note," as will be seen, is that collegium (college) was "not to be understood in a juridical sense." Consequently, interpretation of the corresponding conciliar expression was apparently to be restricted to a non-juridical, purely pastoral meaning. It is important to mention this in a commentary on canons 330–341 since these canons, with practically no exceptions, build on the aforementioned ecclesiological document.

But even the statements of the constitution itself were (and are) not unambiguous and clear (see LG 22, 1). On the one hand, the constitution speaks of the pope and bishops as being united together as Peter and the other apostles who "form a unique apostolic college." As proof of the practice of collegiality, the council mentions the principle of communion in the early Church, the practice of gathering in councils, and the ancient tradition of several bishops attending the consecration of a newly elected bishop. On the other hand, in the same paragraph, the document speaks of the "collegial design and nature of the episcopal office."[1] As it continues to treat the subject, the council returns again to the description of the "college or body of bishops" (LG 22, 2). This last combination of terms was and is of great significance for an understanding of the conciliar notion of collegiality. Namely, collegium (college) is quite certainly a juridical notion whose meaning does not correspond to the ecclesiological notion of the council. Concerned Roman theologians frequently pointed this out even during the council itself. They feared the revival of the idea of a collegial constitution of the Church, since in legal terminology collegium (college) signifies a societas aequalium, a society of equals or of those of equal rank. The idea of a collegial constitution was developed on wholly different grounds by Protestant Church-State lawyers of the early modern era (Christoph Matthäus Pfaff and others). However, such ideas had already been discussed at the First Vatican Council, viewed as not without danger to the Catholic Church, and almost completely rejected. The "Explanatory Note" is also directed against these ideas. The Note clarifies that collegium (college) is not to be understood in the conciliar texts as "a group of equals."

[1] This conceptual diversity suffuses the documents of the Second Vatican Council on the relationship between the primacy and the episcopacy. Consequently, it also permeates the corresponding provisions of the code.

Despite this assertion of the "Explanatory Note" and the use of other terms in the conciliar texts and the Constitution on the Church to describe the college of bishops,[2] the ambiguous term collegium (college) remained. The 1983 code recognizes the same term and uses it in constitutional law (cc. 336–341).

There is another difficulty besides that of the juridical limitation of the term collegium: the parallel drawn between Peter and the other apostles on the one hand, and the pope and bishops on the other. The "Explanatory Note" speaks of the parallel in this way: This "parallelism . . . does not include the transfer of the extraordinary power of the apostles to their successors or, as is obvious, an equality between the head and members of the college, but only a proportionality between the first term of the analogy (Peter–apostles) and the second (Pope–bishops)."

This scholastic distinction must have been difficult to understand. Thus, the "Explanatory Note" had to return to this problematic issue in its third point. The clarification expressed by this point is of the highest significance for constitutional law; namely, that the college of bishops, according to the teaching of the council, is also a "bearer of supreme and full power over the universal Church." However, the college possesses this power only with its head, the pope, who necessarily belongs to the college of bishops. Therefore the Note states: "In other words, the distinction does not hold between the bishop of Rome on the one hand, and all the bishops together on the other, but between the bishop of Rome as separate from, and the bishop of Rome united with the other bishops." It is interesting to note the guarded use of "bishop of Rome" (rather than Petrine office or pope) to emphasize the pope's obvious membership in the college of bishops through his position as bishop of Rome.

Finally, a further problem was to differentiate the power of the pope or primacy from that of the college of bishops. The "Explanatory Note" was clear on this point as well: although the college has "always existed," it is not always "fully functional." Significantly, the phrase "fully functional" was enclosed in quotation marks in the "Explanatory Note." At the same time, the phrase addressing the power of the pope was underlined, stressing the fact that he could exercise his power or authority "at any time according to his discretion."

If the college of bishops were to be active "from time to time in a strictly collegial act," it would require the "consent of the head," that is, of the pope. Indeed, the "Explanatory Note" emphasized that the college of bishops cannot act in any way without the pope. This follows from the notion of collegium (college). Furthermore, this hierarchical communion is "strongly rooted in tradition."

Such remarks are historically contestable. There have been situations, for instance, in which bishops assembled in a council have acted without or even against the pope (or popes); indeed, they had to act for the good of the Church. Hierarchical communion between pope and bishops has been striven after as an ideal of communion from ancient times. However, for a large period of church history this ideal has been a distant one. In fact, large parts of the one Church are no longer in hierarchical communion with the pope.

The problem is aggravated and intensified by the comment with which the "Explanatory Note" concludes: "Without hierarchical communion the sacramental-ontological office, which is to be distinguished from the canonical-juridical point of view, cannot be exercised. However, the commission was of the opinion that it should not delve into questions of liceity and validity, but that they should be left to theological research. This is especially true of the power that is actually exercised by the separated Oriental churches and about which there are various doctrinal opinions."

On the one hand, this position maintains that without hierarchical communion the office cannot be exercised. On the other hand, it leaves open the question of liceity as well as validity.[3]

The Principle of Collegiality and the Current Legal Form of the Church

Without any doubt, the incorporation of the principle of collegiality was the greatest difficulty in drafting the 1983 code.

The pope is the head of the college of bishops, an assertion naturally not found in the 1917 code. However, this notion was added to the 1983 code, which emphasizes the primacy of the pope more so than did the corresponding provisions of the earlier code. He is the "vicar of Christ," and "shepherd of the universal Church on earth." These descriptions of the papal office are also found in the Constitution on the Church, even if in different formulations (LG 22, 2).

The constitution of the Catholic Church is based on two fundamental offices, that of the pope (primacy) and that of the bishop (episcopacy). For long periods church history has been marked by a tension between primacy and episcopacy. And there have always been times in which extreme positions developed in favor of one side or the other. For instance, there have been inclinations to strengthen the position of the bishops against the pope (episcopalism), or movements that sought to rewrite the function of the council to subordinate the pope to it (conciliarism). Conversely, the popes have continuously tried to safeguard their primacy and, whenever possible, expand it (papalism). Even the last two ecumenical councils, the First and Second Vatican Councils, were marked by struggles over this fundamental ecclesiological question. Thus the dogmatic proclamation of papal primacy at the First Vatican Council brought primacy to its high point, while it was at least the intention of the Second Vatican Council to restore the balance between primacy and episcopacy disrupted by Vatican I. This balance had already been upset in the Counter Reformation measures of the Council of Trent (1545–1563), which reduced bishops to the level of papal delegates. Subsequently a bitter opposition to this tendency arose in numerous particular churches, especially in France (Gallicanism), in German regions (Febronianism) and in Austria (Josephinism). All these movements had mixed origins. Legitimate claims of the bishops and the particular churches to cultivate and further develop their own traditions often (in fact, almost always) fused with the initiatives of princes and rulers to create national and state churches. But both vehement critics and supporters of these three movements, which—with certain qualifications—one could unite under the notion of a Catholic Enlightenment, stood firm in maintaining that the papacy be the centrum unitatis (center of unity) of the Church. It was a difficult issue then, as it is today, for theologians and "ordained shepherds" to agree on a convincing boundary between an acceptable centralized function of the primacy and an oppressive papal centralism.

The best solution to the problem was found by the Second Vatican Council, even if postconciliar developments in ecclesial politics and law have demonstrated the weaknesses, loopholes, and ambivalence in the council's ecclesiology. The council fathers wanted especially to outline the significance and function of the office of bishop. Characteristic of this attempt is the fact that the central, third chapter of Lumen gentium bears the title "The hierarchical structure of the Church, and in particular the office of bishop." Right at the beginning of this chapter the unifying function of the Petrine office is emphasized. The description of this office as "an everlasting and visible principle and foundation of the unity of faith and communion" (LG 18, 2) sounds like the formulations of the thoughtful and critical theologians of the ecclesial Enlightenment. Similarly, Lumen gentium 23 speaks of the principle of unity, but not of the previously mentioned theological principle of communion which was emphasized so strongly after the council, and was often used as an unsuitable means of covering up the structural tension between particular churches and the center.

The college of bishops, "in which the apostolic body continues . . . is also the subject of supreme and full power over the universal Church" (c. 336). However, the college of bishops can use this power only together with the pope, that is, with his consent. Therefore, the universal ecclesial power of the episcopal college, which can be expressed in a special way in an ecumenical council, is thoroughly restricted.

The pope possesses not only power over the universal Church, but also "primacy" (principatus —c. 333, §1) over all particular churches and their groupings. Despite an ever increasing defense of this ecclesiological position, clearly the danger of competition for jurisdiction between the pope and bishops must be addressed. Moreover, the code emphasizes that by the primacy of ordinary papal power the proper, ordinary, and immediate power which the bishops possess over the particular churches entrusted to them is at the same time strengthened and protected (c. 333, §1). It is difficult to interpret this statement of the code. At the same time, it seems to demonstrate correctly that the pope is always bound by communion with the other (!) bishops and the universal Church (c. 333, §2). In short, papal decisions and actions that do not agree with the conviction of the bishops and the ecclesial community are unthinkable and impossible, at least from a moral point of view.

Finally, in this legal system there is no legal remedy against official abuse of the supreme office. Canon 333, §3 states succinctly: "No appeal or recourse is permitted against a sentence or decree of the Roman Pontiff." Only the confidence that the pope exercises his office in the Spirit of Christ gives this spiritual law a modicum of reliability. In the history of the Church, popes who have not possessed the fullness of power that the current law assigns the pope have abused their power. In those times, ideas arose that only the college of bishops, united in an ecumenical council, could govern the Church in such difficult times and exceptional situations. The current church law does not consider, much less regulate, such emergency situations that are at least fundamentally possible.

Primacy and Episcopacy

The supreme and most distinguished expression of collegiality between primacy and episcopacy, between pope and bishops, was and is the ecumenical council.

It is all the more conspicuous, therefore, how badly the council is treated in the new legal documents of the Catholic Church. The 1976 draft of the Fundamental Law of the Church (Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis, or LEF) dealt with the council only after dealing with the various institutes in which the pope and bishops work together, but which nonetheless depend on the pope's primacy (see c. 334). The final 1980 draft of the Fundamental Law[4] corrected this mistaken assessment of the council (LEF/1980, c. 35). The content and formulation of canons 330–341 of the 1983 code essentially agree with canons 29–39 of that 1980 draft.

In the 1983 code, the provisions on the council are found in the chapter on the pope and college of bishops. They are located in the second part (art. 2) which deals with the college of bishops.

The first canon of this part does not concern itself with the council, but with the college of bishops. The formulation of this canon is a synthesis of key ideas in Lumen gentium 22, 2. However, the positive function of the college of bishops is not mentioned here, as it was in Lumen gentium. The subordination of the college of bishops to the pope is too strongly emphasized.

What is currently described in the 1983 code as the "power" of the episcopal college over the universal Church was applied to the ecumenical council in the former code; namely, the ecumenical council was said to exercise supreme power (suprema potestas) over the universal Church. The term plena (full) has now been added to suprema (supreme) in reference to the power of the college of bishops in light of Lumen gentium 22, 2. But what that term adds or expresses is not apparent.

If the episcopal college, like the pope, is a subject of supreme and full power over the universal Church, the question naturally arises: in what way does or can the college exercise its power? Again, like Lumen gentium 22, 2 and 23, 1, canon 337 of the 1983 code mentions three possibilities for the exercise of this power:

- in an ecumenical (general) council;
- in another form of collegial cooperation of all bishops; such a form of action (for instance, a so-called epistolary council [Briefkonzil]) must be convened and freely accepted by the pope;
- in other forms of collegial cooperation chosen and promoted by the pope.[5]

The 1983 code uses the word "power" in reference to the first two ways of collegial action in the same sense as that expressed in canon 336: "supreme and full power" (suprema et plena potestas). It is notable that no direct reference is made to this. Hence, in contradistinction to the earlier code, the current code no longer states that the ecumenical council exercises supreme power (suprema potestas) over the universal Church (see CIC 228, §1). This is all the more notable since the current descriptions of or terms regarding the primacy have been combined in a cruder way. Moreover, the ecumenical council is included as one of the three possibilities for collegial action, all of which can be carried out in different ways. The former law had two institutions that exercised or could exercise supreme power, namely, the pope and the ecumenical council (together with the pope!). But this is no longer so clear in the new legal situation. The former juridical position of the ecumenical council has been extensively neutralized by the integration of the ecumenical council under the superior notion of "college of bishops," and by its inclusion in a series of possible means of collegial action. Thus, in light of this legal position, one can ask whether or not it is even necessary for an ecumenical council ever to take place again.

In light of the above, canon 749, §2 must be emphasized. It establishes that the college of bishops possesses the infallibility of the magisterium when the bishops are united in an ecumenical council. But the college of bishops can also make an infallible pronouncement when "dispersed throughout the world." Here too, in extraordinarily important questions, the new law sees the possibility of a so-called epistolary council (Briefkonzil).

The new provisions concerning the council, partly changed from those of the former law, and the legal or systematic arrangement of these provisions in the 1983 code reveal that the independence and significance of the council as a legal institute have been reduced. The new legal provisions seem to be governed by the concern that the primacy of the pope never be infringed upon by the principle of collegiality in any manner. The formulations use theologically sound concepts to describe the real situation of papal primacy in such a way that the true intention is concealed rather than plainly presented. The constant interchange in the use of the two terms munus (office, task, service) and potestas (authority, power) makes this especially clear.

Although the continuing implementation of the Second Vatican Council demonstrates how necessary and indispensable a council is in times of ecclesial crisis, the new code further undermines the legal significance of the council in comparison to the former code. While the 1917 code treated the legal position of the council (CIC 222–229) immediately after the provisions on the pope (CIC 218–221), the provisions on the ecumenical council in the 1983 code were appropriated into one chapter that deals with the pope and the college of bishops. It is noteworthy that while other forms of collegial actions of the pope and bishops are given their own chapters (for example, the synod of bishops, the college of cardinals), the council is not.

The central statement about the power of the college of bishops was taken from the definitions regarding the council and appropriated by canon 336, which begins with these definitions and comprehensively outlines the dominant juridical position of the pope in the college of bishops.

The terms formerly used to describe the power of the pope and the council over the Church were notably modified and, in the case of the council, restricted. According to the 1983 code, the pope now enjoys supreme, full, immediate, and universal ordinary power in the Church (gaudet suprema, plena, immediata et universali in Ecclesia ordinaria potestate). The college of bishops, on the other hand, exercises power over the entire Church in an ecumenical council (potestatem in universam Ecclesiam exercet in Concilio Oecumenico). As was already mentioned, the term "supreme" qualifying "power" (suprema potestas) that the former code recognized and mentioned was deleted.

The relevant literature on the council continuously emphasizes that Vatican II reordered the relationship between the pope and bishops or placed it on a new or completely rethought foundation. Such assertions certainly go too far. Supported by the postconciliar praxis, one can more legitimately maintain merely that certain theological, that is, ecclesiological emphases were articulated in a different way. "Despite a difficult struggle [i.e., at Vatican II], the relationship between papal and episcopal power remained fundamentally that of the regulation of 1870."[6] The notions of collegiality and the synodal element are constantly mentioned in literature that evaluates the council positively. But what they mean must be established. As it became clear after the council, these notions need to be clarified concretely, and they mean little in and of themselves for the structural building up of the Church. Even worse, such notions and their unclear content can be misused in order to conceal persistently the true and effective relationships of power.

Perhaps the single significant change that Vatican II brought about in the relationship between the pope and bishops exists in one word, the adjective plena (full) that was added to the potestas (power) of the ecumenical council (LG 22). The 1917 code retained the fine distinction in which the pope possessed supreme and full power of jurisdiction (suprema et plena potestas iurisdictionis) over the entire Church (CIC 218), while the council possessed merely supreme power (suprema potestas) (CIC 228). However, Lumen gentium 22 recognized that the order of bishops (ordo Episcoporum) also possessed supreme and full power (suprema ac plena potestas). But this statement was anxiously qualified in various ways. To avoid any misunderstandings, the power of the pope in this context was stressed by attaching the term "universal" (universalis) to "full" (plena) and "supreme" (suprema). Canon 29, §2 of the 1980 draft of the Fundamental Law went even further by describing the power of the pope as supreme, full, immediate, and universal (suprema, plena, immediata, et universalis), a formulation contained in canon 331 of the 1983 code.

In this connection, an ambiguity of Vatican II should be mentioned. The term "immediate" (immediata) was not used in Lumen gentium when referring to the power of the pope. This first occurred in the decree Christus Dominus, which was given less attention, as a rule, especially by ecclesiologists. Furthermore, Lumen gentium did speak of an immediate power (potestas immediata) of the diocesan bishop over his see. This "transference" of a phrase or part of a phrase is certainly not accidental. The power of the pope has an immediate effect even in the particular churches. Thus, it must be said that in the sphere of the local churches the competing powers of the pope and bishops can indirectly put bishops back on the level of papal delegates (delegati papae) in the sense of the Council of Trent.

The foregoing examples demonstrate that from a juridical standpoint the texts of Vatican II are full of problems and inconsistencies. At least Vatican I used clear language, something Vatican II did not achieve, and probably did not strive for. This was particularly true concerning a central issue for Vatican II: the demarcation of papal and episcopal power, and thus the jurisdictional primacy of the pope.

It is thus noteworthy that Vatican II does not speak of primacy of jurisdiction (primatus iurisdictionis). Instead, it uses the phrase "sacred primacy" (sacer primatus). The well-known German canonist Klaus Mörsdorf writes concerning this: "The failure to use the word iurisdictio is cause for thought since changes in terminology often bring with them changes in the thing itself."[7] What is unfortunate about this fact is that behind the juridically vague notion of sacred primacy (sacer primatus) lies concealed the old, juridically precise notion of the primacy of jurisdiction. For the sake of comparison, a glance at the 1980 draft of the Fundamental Law is worthwhile. Canon 29, §2 spoke in terms of the ordinary power (potestas ordinaria) of the pope in the (universal) Church (see c. 331).

CANONS AND COMMENTARY

CHAPTER I
THE ROMAN PONTIFF AND THE COLLEGE OF BISHOPS
[cc. 330–341][8]

Introductory Canon

Canon 330 — Just as by the Lord's decision Saint Peter and the other Apostles constitute one college, so in a like manner the Roman Pontiff, the successor of Peter, and the bishops, the successors of the Apostles, are united among themselves.

The introductory canon (c. 330) of the chapter of the code that discusses the juridical status of the pope and college of bishops (cc. 330–341) declares in extensive agreement with the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium 22, 1, and the "Explanatory Note" (n. 1): "Just as by the Lord's decision Saint Peter and the other Apostles constitute one [apostolic] college, so in a like manner the Roman Pontiff, the successor of Peter, and the bishops, the successors of the Apostles, are united among themselves." The bracketed word "apostolic" was not appropriated by the code from the conciliar text. It was found in the earlier drafts of the Fundamental Law (LEF/1969: c. 31, §3; 1971: c. 21, §3) but was later excised. A definition comparable to that of the current canon 330 did not appear in the revised text of 1976–1977. In the final 1980 draft of the Fundamental Law (c. 29, §1), the word collegium (college) was even replaced with coetus (grouping).[9] The formulation "in a like manner" stresses that this comparison deals merely with a proportional equality. The selection of the adjective "apostolic" should apparently contribute to clarifying the difference between Peter and the (other) apostles, between the pope and bishops.

[8] For helpful reflections on these canons see J. Provost, in CLSA Com, 258–281; O. Stoffel, in Münster Com, on such canons.

[9] See below for more on this issue. LEF/1980 c. 29, §1 reads: "Dominus Iesus Christus, Ipse quidem Ecclesiae suae Caput invisibile summusque angularis lapis ac aeternus Pastor manens, Ecclesiae suae pastores esse voluit Apostolos, eisque praeposuit Petrum, ut universo caritatis coetui praesideret atque perpetuum ac visibile unitatis fidei et communionis esset principium et fundamentum."

Collegium (College)

In this introductory canon, the code mentions the principle of unity: "Just as by the Lord's decision Saint Peter and the other Apostles constitute one college [collegium], so in a like manner the Roman Pontiff, the successor of Peter, and the bishops, the successors of the Apostles, are united among themselves." The concept of college (collegium) has been juridically loaded down by Roman law, and burdened by certain interpretations during the history of the Church. In Roman law the members of a college were given equal rights (societas aequalium). The college reached its decisions in the presence of the members called together in accordance with the regulations. Thus, the unity of time and place was required if a college wished to reach binding decisions. Historically, the term is especially burdened by eighteenth-century Protestant collegial theory appropriated by Catholic episcopalists (Josephinists, Febronians) and adapted to the Catholic ecclesial structure. According to this view, the bishops form the college as rectors of the Church (Rectores Ecclesiae). From this it followed, according to the episcopalists, that the Christian or Catholic Church possessed a collegial structure.[10]

Because the term "college" (collegium) was open to many possible interpretations, conservative members of Vatican II opposed the use of the concept early on. The conservative side also presented alternative terms which made their way into the conciliar texts and partly into the code and the drafts of the Fundamental Law: ordo (order), corpus (body), fraternitas (fraternity), coetus (grouping).

In order to preclude any misunderstanding, Pope Paul VI expressly stated in the "Explanatory Note" to Lumen gentium that collegium (college) was not to be understood in a "strictly juridical sense" ("Explanatory Note," 1).

Canon 330 is one of the most important provisions of the code. Based on the foundational insights and decisions of the Second Vatican Council, the canon defines the relationship between the pope and the college of bishops. The introductory formula statuente Domino ("the Lord's decision") makes it clear that the canon is treating a matter of divine law. Even though the formulation is recent, the content has been established by Christ according to Catholic doctrinal teaching. This means that the content of this definition cannot be changed. The fathers of Vatican II used an analogical form of expression in formulating the content: the first part of the analogy speaks of a historical fact which the second part, with its statement on the prevailing ecclesial structure, is set against. This applies as well to the proportional arrangement of the individual parts: Saint Peter: the pope, successor of Peter; the other apostles: the bishops, the successors of the apostles. The word ceteri (the others) was added to the conciliar text by those authors[11] who wished to clarify that Peter too was one of the apostles and so a member of the one college. Thus, Peter is not to be seen as separate from the college.

A proportional identity arises out of the two parts of the canon. One could also call it a proportional relationship. At the transition point between both parts is the formula pari ratione ("in a like manner"). There was a conscious choice not to use "in the same way" (eadem ratione). As spelled out in the "Explanatory Note," there is no "transmission of the extraordinary authority of the apostles to their successors" ("Explanatory Note," 1). Although the impression can arise that the apostles and college of bishops are equal, when such an impression is examined in light of the "Explanatory Note," it becomes clear that there are considerable differences between the two colleges. While the Catholic tradition assigns responsibility for the entire Church to all the apostles, bishops are given responsibility only for their particular churches. The bishops are not successors of a definite apostle, but are "by reason of divine appointment placed on the level of the apostles" (LG 20c)." The bishops, united as they are in the college of bishops, bear responsibility not only for their own particular church, but also for the universal Church.

[10] K. Walf, Das bischöfliche Amt in der Sicht josephinischer Kirchenrechtler, Forschungen zur kirchlichen Rechtsgeschichte und zum Kirchenrecht, vol. 13 (Cologne-Vienna: Böhlau, 1975).

[11] This happened especially due to the initiative of the exegete Cardinal Alfrink, Archbishop of Utrecht (Holland).

A comparison between canon 330 and canon 329 of the 1917 code clarifies the ecclesiological advance brought about by the Second Vatican Council and the 1983 code. The latter canon described the bishops as successors of the apostles who govern their particular churches under the authority of the pope.

Canon 330 and canon 42 of the Eastern code stand in literal agreement. In the 1980 draft of the Fundamental Law, the content of canon 330 was contained in canon 29, §2.

ARTICLE 1: THE ROMAN PONTIFF [cc. 331–335]

Bishop of the Roman Church

Canon 331 — The bishop of the Roman Church, in whom continues the office given by the Lord uniquely to Peter, the first of the Apostles, and to be transmitted to his successors, is the head of the college of bishops, the Vicar of Christ, and the pastor of the universal Church on earth. By virtue of his office he possesses supreme, full, immediate, and universal ordinary power in the Church, which he is always able to exercise freely.

This canon emphasizes the singular position of Peter. The office (munus) which the Lord gave uniquely (singulariter) to Peter continues (permanet) in the person of the current bishop of Rome. As in canon 330, the appointment or disposal of the office by the Lord Jesus Christ is stressed.

The following definition of papal power brings together terms from numerous historical, i.e., earlier, definitions, resulting in an accumulation of such adjectives. According to canon 331, the pope enjoys, by reason of his office [munus], "supreme, full, immediate, and universal ordinary power [potestas] in the Church." Canon 218, §1 of the 1917 code contained the phrase "supreme and full [power]," and canon 218, §2 used the phrase "ordinary and immediate [power]." The 1917 code did not use the adjective "universal" (universalis). This adjective, together with the phrase "full and supreme [power]," was taken from Lumen gentium 22, 2. Thus, the individual elements of this definition are not at all new. What is new is the combination of these terms. In the context of a juridical description of collegiality, the combination suggests a definition of the primacy unlike any other known in the history of canon law.

Canon law derives the extensive fullness of power of the Petrine office from the will and mission of Jesus and the function of that Petrine office, namely, to guarantee the unity of the faith and the Church. The pope "possesses supreme, full, immediate, and universal ordinary power in the Church, which he is always able to exercise freely" (c. 331).

The canon mentions the functions or characteristics of the pope in somewhat of an odd order: bishop of the Roman church, bearer of the Petrine office, head of the college of bishops, vicar of Christ, pastor of the universal Church. Undoubtedly the function of "Vicar of Christ" is inappropriately ranked. Actually, none of the functions or characteristics are ranked according to their theological, ecclesiological, or canonical relevance.

Canon 331 begins by referring to the function of the pope as bishop. According to the canon's formulation, he is the bishop of the "Roman Church," not (as sometimes translated) "Bishop of the church of Rome." This description is found only in canon 331. Otherwise, the description "Roman Pontiff" (Romanus Pontifex) is used. The "function" of the pope is stressed through the use of munus, a concept of the Second Vatican Council that means service or task, and not mainly or primarily office. Concrete assertions follow from this rather moderate formulation.

Papal Titles

The pope is the head of the college of bishops, vicar of Christ, and shepherd of the universal Church.

Head of the College of Bishops: The use of this title, which has a long prior history,[12] is closely connected to the Second Vatican Council (LG 22b). In the conciliar texts, as well as in the code, the function of the pope as head of the college of bishops is often and effectively stressed. In the code this is especially so in canon 336. Without the head, the college of bishops does not bear supreme and full power over the entire Church.

Vicar of Christ (Vicarius Christi): Traditionally this title was used by the Roman emperors of the East, while the pope was called the vicar of Peter or Vicarius Petri. Popes since Innocent III (1198–1216) have used the designation "Vicar of Christ" as a stable—i.e., solemn—title, although one which has no legal definition or juridical relevance. While Lumen gentium applies the title to bishops as well, the code somewhat surprisingly reserves it to the pope alone. With the promulgation of the 1983 code, the inclusion of this title occasioned unnecessary irritation in other Christian churches.

Pastor of the Universal Church: This title is also laden with ambivalence. It can give the impression that the pope is the bishop of the universal Church. Canon 333 points in this direction when it speaks of the pope's power "over the universal Church." Therefore, it must be stressed here that Lumen gentium speaks clearly of the bishops and not the pope as vicars and envoys of Christ (LG 27a). The Second Vatican Council deliberately chose this unambiguous expression since the Council of Trent had wrongly placed bishops in the position of being papal delegates.[13] Thus, one should appreciate that the choice of the title "pastor of the universal Church" now emphasizes the pastoral function of the papal office, while previous councils (Florence, Vatican I) stressed the function of the pope as head of the universal Church. Since this canon, in which the pope is called the "pastor of the universal Church," is found in the 1983 code, whose provisions "affect only the Latin Church" (c. 1), there should have been a provision in the same canon clarifying the difference between the universal Church and the Latin church.

Besides these titles, the pope possesses further functions with regard to particular churches, and so, further titles that are not mentioned in canon 331: he is the metropolitan of the Roman ecclesial province, primate of Italy, and patriarch of the West. Only the title of metropolitan still carries concrete rights, essentially the right of supervision of the suffragan bishops of the (Roman) ecclesial province as provided for in canons 435–437. According to canon 438 the other titles are now simply honorific titles in the Latin church.

Definition of the Power of Jurisdiction

The second part of canon 331 describes the papal power of jurisdiction. The pope possesses supreme, full, immediate, and universal ordinary power in the Church. There is one conspicuous difference in terminology within the canon: the first sentence speaks of the "universal Church," and the second simply of "the Church." According to canon 1 the description of the papal power of jurisdiction in the Latin code is valid only for the Latin church. Canon 43 of the Eastern code contains a nearly identical definition of papal jurisdiction for the Eastern churches in union with Rome.

The relevant text in Lumen gentium (22b) does not mention the terms "immediate" and "ordinary." Canon 218, §1 of the 1917 code used the terms "supreme" and "full," and canon 218, §2 spoke of "ordinary" and "immediate," but the term "universal" was not mentioned in the 1917 code in connection with papal power.[14] On the other hand, that code contained the term "episcopal," and the current code does not. The term "immediate," which was inserted into the code from the conciliar text, has a wide-ranging significance, which canon 333, §1 makes especially clear. The meanings of the terms overlap and partially intersect so that it is difficult to comment on them separately. It should also be mentioned that the pope's position in the universal Church is ultimately defined with the word potestas, which means power, dominion, office, but especially power or authority. The Second Vatican Council had previously avoided the use of this word or concept in reference to all offices in the Church. Instead, it preferred the word or concept munus, since it expressed the ministerial character of any ecclesial office or function.

Supreme Power: This superlative gives the impression that the pope's power is unique. This impression is not correct, however, since according to the current law the college of bishops possesses "supreme . . . power over the universal Church" (c. 336) even if only together with the pope. (The difficulties of interpretation that arise out of this will be addressed further in connection with canon 336.) Nevertheless, further legal provisions support or strengthen the phrase "supreme power": There is no appeal against a papal judgment or decree (c. 333, §3). By reason of the pope's primacy, every member of the faithful can always bring his or her contentious or penal case before the Holy See for judgment in all instances and at any procedural stage (c. 1417, §1). The pope is head of the college of bishops (c. 336), supreme shepherd and teacher (c. 749, §1), and he can be judged by no one (c. 1404). Until Vatican I, popes sought recognition of supreme papal power in the Church from civil governments.[15] At that time, the idea supporting this position was that the State and the Catholic Church were both perfect societies (societates perfectae).[16] A remnant of this position is found in canon 204, §2.

Full Power: This phrase is also found in the description of the power of the college of bishops (c. 336). Thus there are two official institutional authorities with full, or more precisely, with "supreme and full" power in the Church, the pope and the college of bishops. The decisive difference lies in the fact that the pope exercises his power "always freely" (c. 331), while the college of bishops exercises it only together with the pope. This legal construction is not without risks in light of conflicts that have occasionally arisen in church history. For instance, at the time of the Council of Constance (1414–18) three popes fought for power. In that particular case, the college of bishops, united in the council, clarified the situation both theoretically and practically.

The term "full" was used by Vatican I in defining the primacy of jurisdiction.[17] According to Vatican II, it would have been a mistake to restrict "full" to the power of jurisdiction. Consequently, Lumen gentium 21b and canon 375, §2 both state that all bishops by consecration receive the offices of sanctifying, teaching, and governing. This broadening of the concept "full" leads to new difficulties in interpretation concerning the general origin of the power of jurisdiction. However, in reference to the papal office, the question is clearly answered. The pope receives full (and supreme) power by acceptance of a legitimate election together with episcopal ordination (c. 332, §1).

Immediate Power: This phrase was found in the central text of the First Vatican Council on the jurisdictional primacy of the pope.[18] It was also found in canon 218, §2 of the 1917 code. The 1983 code clearly defines the matter in canon 333, §1, about which further comments will be made. "Immediate" means that the pope can intervene directly on all levels of ecclesial jurisdiction. Such papal power should be conceived of and employed to strengthen and protect the power of the bishops in their particular churches as well as the rights of the faithful.[19] Until the First Vatican Council, this statement of immediate papal jurisdiction explicitly contained the pope's claim to have contact with the faithful without interference from civil power. The current law implicitly renews this claim in this canon.

Universal Power: This phrase is also laden with history, and so in a certain way burdened by it. Pope Boniface VIII (1294–1303), in his bull Unam sanctam (1302), gave an exaggerated form to his notion of papal power as a universal power over all crowns and peoples and a spiritual preeminence over states. Although popes Leo XIII (1885) and Pius XII (1955) officially distanced themselves from such ideas, this historically and currently unrealistic notion is still extant. The term "universal power" is found in the texts of both the First and Second Vatican Councils, but not in the 1917 code. If one were to interpret it in light of canon 218, §1 of the 1917 code, one would have to conclude that papal power means power over the universal (Catholic) Church and not simply the Latin church. Interpreted in this way, the phrase says essentially the same thing as other terms used in this canon, thus bringing essentially nothing new to them.

Ordinary Power: This canon is to be evaluated in light of the meaning of canon 131, §1. By accepting the papal office according to the regulation of canon 332, §1, the pope obtains ordinary, proper power of governance. The Catholic Church recognizes two offices with preeminent ordinary, proper power of governance: the office of the pope and the office of the diocesan bishop (and those equivalent to him according to c. 381, §2). Other ordinaries such as vicars general possess vicarious power of governance.[20] The bishop of Rome is, so to speak, ordinary of the universal Church.

The pope can always freely exercise this power. For centuries this point has been expressed in this or a similar way. Today the formulation possesses primarily intra-ecclesial significance in light of the strict separation of ecclesial (religious) and civil spheres of interest. However, because of its history it still contains an unmistakable, final purpose directed against civil power. In the current world order, the matter is significant inasmuch as the pope or Apostolic See is recognized as a subject of international law. This is explored further in the commentary on canons 3, 113, and 362–367. The intra-ecclesial significance of the phrase is seen in connection with canon 333, §3, according to which neither appeal nor recourse is possible against a papal decree, and in relation to canon 1375, which penalizes those who impede ecclesiastical power generally, and so those who impede the exercise of papal power as well.

The Second Vatican Council introduced the notion of munus into Catholic ecclesiology. The notion, which had its origin in Protestant theology, means ministry, task, office.[21] However, the drafting of the 1983 code again relied on the use of the traditional notion of potestas (power, authority). The meaning of the concept munus is to be emphasized in light of canon 331, which speaks of the power of the pope in a very particular way. The term munus is used in canon 375, §2, which describes the competencies of the bishop. It should be recalled clearly that the very strictly [19] See the already mentioned provision of c. 1417.

[20] See c. 134, §1, which lists those who are "ordinaries" in canon law. It should be noted that certain religious superiors exercise power somewhat comparable to bishops, but only for their own members.

[21] The term has a long history. The appropriation of the Protestant teaching on the threefold office into the Catholic sphere is due largely to the work of the Vienna canonist George Phillips (d. 1872), who converted to the Catholic Church in 1828.

held formulation of the papal power of jurisdiction undergoes not only a certain qualification, but also a clear correction in canon 331. The Catholic Church holds in an unbroken tradition that the power of orders (potestas ordinis) has precedence over the power of jurisdiction. The 1983 code also makes it clear that the pope's power of jurisdiction has its foundation in the fact that he is a bishop; namely, the bishop of Rome. It is not entirely clear whether or not these two statements of the code are to be separated one from the other. Canon 332, §1 says that the pope first obtains power "in the Church" when he has received episcopal ordination, while canon 331 connects his being a bishop clearly with "the Roman Church." From time immemorial bishops have been elected pope, that is, as bishop of Rome. This obvious point obscures a difficulty, since bishops are always bishops of a particular diocese, even the so-called titular bishops who are ordained with the title of a defunct diocese.

In any case, canons 331 and 332 must be interpreted with the help of canon 375 since the latter's content, theologically speaking, prevails over the power of jurisdiction contained in canons 331 and 332 due to the precedence of the power of orders. Vatican II, with its doctrine of the threefold ministry or office, was not the first to see the relevance of this and bring it out clearly into the open. The 1917 code also spoke of it in canon 218, §2, which stated that the power of the pope is "truly episcopal" (vere episcopalis).

One can also interpret the power of the pope in accordance with canon 375, §2 and the teaching on the threefold ministry or office. In the first place, the pope as bishop exercises the ministry of sanctification (munus sanctificandi). Book IV of the code is dedicated to this ministry. The bishop of Rome is included along with all other bishops when canon 835, §1 describes them as the "principal dispensers of the mysteries of God." Even if the pope is not specifically mentioned in this central canon, it corresponds to Catholic ecclesiology, which (as has been mentioned) affirms the priority of the power of orders over the power of jurisdiction. While the bishop possesses the highest office in the more important hierarchy of orders, the pope has the highest position in the hierarchy of jurisdiction. Only later canons (e.g., c. 838) will define the competencies of the Apostolic See (the term "pope" will not be used there!).

Additionally, the pope exercises the ministry of teaching (munus docendi). Clear statements on this matter are found in Book III of the code (De Ecclesiae munere docendi). The pope possesses infallibility in the teaching office "by virtue of his office [munus]" when he "as the supreme pastor... proclaims by definitive act that a doctrine of faith or morals is to be held" (c. 749, §1). The college of bishops possesses infallibility in the teaching office only in union with the pope (c. 749, §2; see the corresponding commentary). The teaching authority of the pope and the other members of the college of bishops is grounded in their episcopal character. The bishops are "authentic teachers endowed with the authority of Christ. ... [Therefore, the faithful must follow] with religious obedience a teaching of their bishop concerning matters of faith or morals which he pronounces in the name of Christ" (LG 25a). With reference to the entire Church, the task of preaching the gospel has been entrusted primarily to the pope and college of bishops (c. 756, §1).

Finally, the pope exercises the office of governing (munus regendi) the universal Church. The word munus (ministry or office) appears in canon 331. However, as already mentioned, it is strongly governed by the traditional notion of potestas (power, authority). As far as the governing office is concerned, the Catholic Church follows the differentiation of powers in the sense of Montesquieu (legislative, judicial, administrative). But it must be expressly emphasized here that this does not imply a division of powers or even reciprocal controls of the powers. The Catholic Church holds the unity of powers (the pope over the universal Church, the bishops over the particular churches) and recognizes merely a distinction, and not a difference in the three powers.

With regard to legislative power, the pope is the legislator for the universal Church. As a rule, he himself exercises this power except for very limited competencies of the congregations of the Roman Curia in this area. Papal laws appear under various and manifold forms, a fact that can lead to certain confusion. They can be promulgated as constitutions or as motu proprios. The laws of the papal congregations, which generally carry the same binding character, are generally published as decrees, although they can also be in the form of instructions or ordinances. General (papal) laws are promulgated through publication in the official publication Acta Apostolicae Sedis (c. 8, §1).

The pope is also the supreme judge "for the entire Catholic world." This noteworthy expression is found in canon 1442. Although this canon speaks of the fact that the pope can exercise his judicial power either personally or through the ordinary tribunals of the Apostolic See or judges delegated by him, it has been quite a while since the pope has judged cases himself. While he does not normally delegate his legislative power, the pope regularly delegates his judicial power. The Catholic opinion, however, is that the pope "himself" judges by means of the tribunals of the Apostolic See or delegated judges; that is, the delegated judges on the papal judgment seat decide cases in his name. In other words, since there is no division of powers, these tribunals or judges do not decide cases independently of the pope. Yet, since time immemorial, there has never been a case in which the pope has had a direct or indirect influence on the administration of justice in his courts. At the most, he has admonished the judges. He has done so especially in recent years in addresses to the Roman Rota on questions concerning marriage nullity.

As has already been said, the pope can be judged by no one (c. 1404). He has competence in canonical matters regarding heads of state, cardinals, papal envoys, and bishops (only in penal matters). These and other rights or prerogatives are mentioned in canon 1405. As already mentioned, "by reason of the primacy" every member of the faithful may appeal to the Apostolic See in every contentious and penal canonical procedure and in every phase of a procedure (c. 1417). The papal tribunals are mentioned only briefly in the code (c. 360). Further regulations are found in the June 28, 1988, apostolic constitution Pastor bonus (art. 117–130). There are three papal tribunals: the Apostolic Signatura, the Roman Rota, and the Apostolic Penitentiary. The last one is not a tribunal in the proper sense. Rather, it is an administrative body that grants absolutions and especially dispensations in the internal forum.

Finally, the pope exercises a supreme and extensive (as well as difficult to grasp) executive power over the universal Church. This power is expressed primarily and best in the multitude of administrative competencies of the congregations of the Roman Curia (cc. 360–361; PB). Furthermore, the pope is supported by his legates in exercising this power (cc. 362–367). In this context it should also be mentioned that the extent of his exercise of executive power appears in his supervision of particular churches and institutes of consecrated life (orders, congregations, etc.). This supervision occurs by means of quinquennial reports and ad limina visits of the local ordinaries to Rome (c. 400), his dominant influence on the naming of bishops and equivalent ordinaries, on the division of ecclesial territories, in ordination and marriage law (in those dispensations reserved to the pope), and in many other areas. Through decrees of the Second Vatican Council, papal executive power was reduced in some areas from what it had become through the centuries, especially in the decrees of the Council of Trent and Vatican I which developed the centralized structure of the Catholic Church. Still, the enormous potential of papal executive power is still overly prevalent and dominating.

Canon 331 and canon 43 of the Eastern code extensively coincide. There is only a slight change of wording. At the end of its canon, the Eastern code uses potest instead of valet. This makes little difference in the meaning. There is agreement, but also a great difference between canon 331 and canon 29, §2 of the 1980 draft of the Fundamental Law.[22]

Papal Election and Resignation

Canon 332 — §1. The Roman Pontiff obtains full and supreme power in the Church by his acceptance of legitimate election together with episcopal consecration. Therefore, a person elected to the supreme pontificate who is marked with episcopal character obtains this power from the moment of acceptance. If the person elected lacks episcopal character, however, he is to be ordained a bishop immediately.

§2. If it happens that the Roman Pontiff resigns his office, it is required for validity that the resignation is made freely and properly manifested but not that it is accepted by anyone.

As already expressed in the commentary on canon 331, the law is concerned with the question of how the bearers of papal, as well as episcopal, office receive their power. Hence, the difference between the power of orders and the power of governance takes on special importance. As far as the papal office is concerned, along with the extensive powers, competencies, and rights connected to it, the law states that the pope receives "full and supreme power in the Church by his acceptance of legitimate election together with episcopal consecration" (c. 332, §1). Thus, if a bishop is elected pope, which has been the normal case for a long time, he receives all the rights of the papal office by accepting the election.

The details of the papal election are not regulated by the code although it mentions essential elements of that election, such as the fact that active voice in a papal election belongs exclusively to cardinals (c. 349). Throughout this century, provisions concerning papal elections have been issued more and more through special papal legislation.[23] The most recent example is the apostolic constitution Universi Dominici gregis of February 22, 1996, which provided new regulations for the "vacancy of the Apostolic See and the election of the pope of Rome." Since the Third Lateran Council (1179), and thus for more than eight hundred years, the pope had to be elected by a two-thirds majority of the cardinals.[24] Currently, an absolute majority is de facto required since, according to the new provisions, unsuccessful balloting that takes place by traditional means can be passed over in favor of another method of election. The 1975 election rules provided for this as well, but the change in election method had to be approved by all legitimate electors while the new and now valid rules require only an absolute majority.

In the postconciliar period, several changes in the method of papal elections took place. The number of cardinal electors was limited to 120. Cardinals possessed active voice in an election only until the completion of their eightieth birthday (Universi 33). There was no discussion of the variously expressed desires in the postconciliar period to change papal elections completely, for instance, to allow election by all bishops or at least all diocesan bishops, etc. Nor at present are there any such proposals to consider.

In principle, according to canon 1024,[25] every rational Catholic man is eligible. Actually, however, since 1378 only cardinals have been elected pope.

Canon 332, §1 uses only the terms "full" and "supreme" to describe the power that the pope possesses "in" the Church. This is similar to the description of the college of bishops in c. 336![26] The canon says only how he receives the power, not from whom. According to the traditional position, he receives it from God. The "how" is further clarified by three elements: legitimate elec-clesiae his in terris Pastor; qui ideo vi muneris sui suprema, plena, immediata et universali in Ecclesia gaudet ordinaria potestate, quam semper libere exercere valet."

[23] After the 1917 code one may note the 1945 apconst Vacantis Apostolicae Sedis, the 1962 mp Summi Pontificis Electio, and the 1975 apconst Romano Pontifici Eligendo.

[24] The 1975 apconst Romano Pontifici Eligendo stated in n. 65 that for the election of a new pope a two-thirds plus one majority was required. See T. Reese, "Revolution in Papal Elections," America (April 13, 1996) 4.

[25] Canon 1024: "A baptized male alone receives sacred ordination validly."

[26] However, the order of the terms is changed.

tion, free acceptance of the election, episcopal consecration. It is noteworthy that the second part of canon 332, §1 states positively what should actually read as follows: If a non-bishop is elected pope, this legitimately elected person does not receive power in the Church through acceptance of the election. This canon again expresses the preeminence of the power of orders over the power of jurisdiction. On the other hand, canon 219 of the 1917 code stated that the legitimately elected person received full power of supreme jurisdiction by divine right by accepting the election. That code did not recognize the essential connection between jurisdiction and the power of orders.

The new law correctly provides for the resignation of a pope even if in a limited measure (c. 332, §2). Such a resignation must be freely submitted and duly manifested. However, its acceptance is not a requirement. The general provisions on resignation of an office are contained in canons 187–189. These legal regulations are only guidelines since, due to his supreme power, the pope can always pass new laws, and stands above already valid laws (Papa supra omnes canones). Until now only one pope has relatively "freely" resigned his office, i.e., Celestine V (1294, d. 1296).

The resignation from office of the pope must be sufficiently manifested and requires no acceptance "by anyone." The recipient of the "manifestation" is not specified. Some commentators are of the opinion that the college of cardinals or its dean as the competent electoral body must be informed of the resignation.

Quite clearly there is a lacuna in canon law, since it makes no legal provisions for a case in which the pope is temporarily or permanently incapacitated, e.g., due to political obstruction, physical or mental illness, etc. Canon 335 states merely that if the "Roman See" is fully impeded no innovations are to take place in the governance of the universal Church.

In addition to a few insignificant rearrangements or modifications of individual words as well as stylistic improvements, there is an interesting difference between canon 332 and canon 44 of the Eastern code. In paragraph one, instead of the words consecratio episcopalis (episcopal consecration), the Eastern code contains the more juridical phrase ordinatio episcopalis (episcopal ordination). There is no substantial difference between canon 332 and canon 30 of the 1980 draft of the Fundamental Law although there are a few formal differences.

Exercise of Primacy

Canon 333 — §1. By virtue of his office, the Roman Pontiff not only possesses power over the universal Church but also obtains the primacy of ordinary power over all particular churches and groups of them. Moreover, this primacy strengthens and protects the proper, ordinary, and immediate power which bishops possess in the particular churches entrusted to their care.

§2. In fulfilling the office of supreme pastor of the Church, the Roman Pontiff is always joined in communion with the other bishops and with the universal Church. He nevertheless has the right, according to the needs of the Church, to determine the manner, whether personal or collegial, of exercising this office.

§3. No appeal or recourse is permitted against a sentence or decree of the Roman Pontiff.

Canon 333, whose content is connected to that of canon 331, describes the papal primacy of power, and an especially significant aspect of this power, the primacy (principatus) of ordinary power that the pope possesses over all particular churches. The issue here is the extremely delicate problem of the so-called concurring power of jurisdiction of the pope and bishop in the particular churches. The notion of principatus ordinariae potestatis (primacy of ordinary power) was not introduced by the 1983 code. The author of the code was supported by the 1965 papal decree Christus Dominus (n. 2). In this context, generally speaking, one can wonder what influence a reference to paragraphs 22 and 27 of Lumen gentium would have had on Christus Dominus or the drafts of the Fundamental Law since the constitution emphasized the independence of the bishops over against the pope.[27] The principatus ordinariae potestatis (primacy of ordinary power) is a concept of the First, not of the Second Vatican Council. The expression arises out of the third chapter (De primatu Romani Pontificis) of the dogmatic constitution Pastor aeternus of Vatican I. Even the addition in canon 333, §1 according to which "this primacy strengthens and protects the proper, ordinary, and immediate power which bishops possess in the particular churches entrusted to their care" is based on the same First Vatican Council text.

This canon is based on older legal documents.[28] However, it is new to ecclesial law if one disregards the non-promulgated canon 31 of the 1980 draft of the Fundamental Law.

As was mentioned, paragraph one regulates one of the most difficult issues of Catholic ecclesial structure, that of the so-called concurring power of jurisdiction of the pope and bishops over their particular churches and their groupings. The Latin terminology and the content of the words used are hardly suitable for translation into modern languages, as the translations of the code in various languages make clear. The central notion of paragraph one is principatus, inadequately translated into English as "primacy." Principatus is related to princeps. In the Roman Empire this word described the emperor. This association is consciously aroused here, suggesting that the pope also has an imperial preeminence in the Catholic Church.

It is very much a question of whether or not this canon agrees with the spirit of the Second Vatican Council. In Lumen gentium the council had to overcome the ever present danger in church history of an extreme papalism on the one hand, and a just as extreme episcopalism on the other hand. Therefore it refrained from viewing bishops as papal delegates as the Council of Trent had seen them. It also gave up the earlier concession system (concessions of the pope to the bishops, especially in the form of the so-called quinquennial faculties)[29] in favor of a system of reservations (the pope reserves certain rights to himself). The council expressly stated in Lumen gentium that bishops are "not to be understood as vicars of the bishop of Rome, for they have their own proper power, and are truly heads of the people they govern.... [Therefore,] their power is not eliminated by the supreme and universal power, but is affirmed, strengthened, and safeguarded by it" (LG 27b). A part of this text is found in the current canon 333, §1, but clearly it was appropriated into that canon in a very particular way.

Canon 333, §1 must also be understood together with canons 375 and 381, §1, in which the power of the bishop (i.e., the diocesan bishop) is described. Paul VI had attempted to demarcate the competencies of the pope and bishops in his 1963 motu proprio Pastorale munus as well as in his 1966 motu proprio De episcoporum muneribus; these attempts were not entirely successful. Later work on the 1983 code also proved unsuccessful in establishing objective limits to papal power over against that of the bishops.[30] On the one hand, canon 381, §1 speaks of "all ordinary, proper, and immediate power" of the diocesan bishop over his particular church. On the other hand, it contains an even clearer exception in favor of papal power, that is, when there is a legal provision or a decree of the pope. Canon 591 should also be mentioned in this context: the pope can "exempt institutes of consecrated life from the governance of local ordinaries and sub-

[27] One need think only of LG 22, 2, which concerns the bishops in their relation to the pope: "They are not to be understood as vicars of the bishop of Rome, for they have their own proper power, and are rightly called heads of the people they govern."

[28] See, for instance, CIC 218, §2 and various texts in LG and CD.

[29] The faculties (facultates) were given the diocesan bishops every five years (quinque anni) by the pope, especially in the areas of marriage and penal law. Opposed to this system, which was introduced in the seventeenth century, were the German Febronians. According to them the bishops possessed these faculties in their own right.

[30] Comm 8 (1976) 89.

ject them to himself alone or to another ecclesiastical authority."

In canon 333, §1, the play with the terms munus (ministry, office) and potestas (power, authority) is also noteworthy. First of all, the position of the pope is described with the softer term munus, which is used in canon 375, §2 to describe the competence of the bishops. It is also stated there that the bishops stand in hierarchical communion (communio) with the head of the college, that is, the pope. This early church concept of communion has been viewed by some canonists as a guarantee against the head of the college abusing his power of jurisdiction (potestas). On the occasion of the promulgation of the code, Pope John Paul II in the apostolic constitution Sacrae disciplinae leges expressly referred to the "doctrine in which the Church is seen as a communion and which therefore determines the relations which are to exist between the particular churches and the universal Church, and between collegiality and the primacy." The code still does not recognize legal provisions against possible abuses of the primacy although the "Explanatory Note" to Lumen gentium clearly stated that communio is "not some vague feeling, but an organic reality that requires a legal form" ("Explanatory Note" 2).[31] This is precisely what the code did not accomplish, and this is one of its central weaknesses.

How communio is to be understood in contemporary Catholic ecclesiology is found in canons 204, §2 and 205. According to those canons, the Church is governed by the successor of Peter and the bishops in communion with him (in eius communione). "Full communion" with the Catholic Church is explained by the triad: confession of faith, acceptance of the (seven) sacraments, and ecclesial governance (the pope and the bishops united with him). When one of these three criteria is lacking, in traditional terms it becomes a matter of heresy (with reference to confession of faith and sacraments), schism (with regard to ecclesial governance), or apostasy, provided that there is a complete abandonment of the faith and separation from the Church.

Canon 333, §2 of the code also explains how one is to understand the concurring jurisdiction of the pope and bishop in a particular church. This definition is completely new, and is not found either in the former code or in the declarations of the Second Vatican Council. It first appeared in the process of drafting the 1976 version of the Fundamental Law. From there it was appropriated by the 1983 code. This provision states: "In fulfilling the office of supreme pastor of the Church, the Roman Pontiff is always joined in communion with the other bishops and with the universal Church. He nevertheless has the right, according to the needs of the Church, to determine the manner, whether personal or collegial, of exercising this office."

According to this provision, the pope can intervene in the affairs of particular churches according to his own discretion. The word "communion" is even mentioned in this canon. From the early days of the Church, this word described the communion of the particular churches, but primarily the communion of faith of the particular churches with Rome. In particular, then, when the pope sees that the "communion" between Rome and a particular church is endangered, he can intervene in a personal or "collegial" manner. "Collegial" is to be interpreted in this context in which it appears. The pope can, as is his duty, govern the affairs of the universal Church as well as the particular churches with the help of the college of bishops. He may do so with the college as a whole (for instance, in an ecumenical council or through a so-called epistolary council [Briefkonzil]) or through the selection of representatives of the college of bishops (e.g., through a synod of bishops over whose composition the pope has extensive influence).

The terms munus and communio are both found in canon 333, §2. It is noteworthy that the term "hierarchical" is not used here in connection with communion, but it is still to be understood in the sense in which canon 375, §2 uses it. The terminology of canon 330 is also applicable to canon 333, §2. The former canon uses "Peter and the other Apostles," while the latter uses "the Roman Pontiff... with the other bishops." But canon 333, §2 then refers again to the objective reality. The pope decides whether to exercise his office (munus) personally or collegially. Further qualifications of what the possible collegial exercise of the office implies are found in canon 334.

Canon 333, §3 contains the very old provision that there is no legal recourse against a judgment or decree of the pope. Canon 1404 of the procedural law corresponds to it by stating that the pope (here Prima Sedes or First [episcopal] See) can be brought to trial by no one. According to the decrees of the Council of Constance (1414–1418; the decrees Sacrosancta and Frequens), which were reaffirmed by the Council of Basel (1431–1439), an ecumenical council stands above the pope. However, popes later provided penalties for an appeal to a council (see CIC 2332). Current law threatens a penalty for those who seek recourse to an ecumenical council or the college of bishops against a measure of the pope (c. 1372).

The primacy of the pope is safeguarded through numerous individual provisions of the code. According to canon 361, the terms "Apostolic See" and "Holy See" also describe the pope. The pope possesses exclusive rights regarding an ecumenical council and other activities of the college of bishops (cc. 337–338; 341). Currently the nomination of bishops rests exclusively in his hands. On the one hand, diocesan bishops are obliged to make a report to the pope (c. 399). On the other hand, the pope controls the particular churches through his envoys (cc. 362–367). Clerics are bound in a particular way to obey the pope (c. 273). This is also true for members of institutes of consecrated life (religious—c. 590, §2). Authority to dispense from the obligation of celibacy is reserved to the pope alone (c. 291), as is the dissolution of a nonconsummated marriage between the baptized (cc. 1142; 1698, §2). The pope possesses the faculty to hear confessions in the entire Church (c. 967, §1), and he can dispense from private vows at any time and in any case (c. 1196). Furthermore, he has authority over the ownership of ecclesiastical goods (c. 1256), and he possesses the power of supreme administration and disposal of ecclesiastical goods (c. 1273). The pope alone has competence in certain processes (judging heads of state, cardinals, etc.—c. 1405, §1). Without papal permission, a judge cannot rule on a legal act or document expressly confirmed by the pope (c. 1405, §2). Recourse against a papal decree is not possible (cc. 1732; 333, §3). Reservations and provisions in favor of papal power are found in all parts of the code, for example, the right to review decrees of particular councils (c. 446) or of bishops' conferences (c. 455, §2) or the right to grant dispensations from impediments in ordination and marriage law.

There are merely terminological rather than substantial differences between canon 333 and canon 45 of the Eastern code. The assertion of canon 333 is found in canon 31 of the 1980 draft of the Fundamental Law, although in a different formulation.[32]

Assistance in Exercising Primacy

Canon 334 — Bishops assist the Roman Pontiff in exercising his office. They are able to render him cooperative assistance in various ways, among [32] LEF/1980, c. 31: "§1. "§2. Romanus Pontifex in munere supremi Ecclesiae Pastoris explendo, communione cum ceteris Episcopis immo et universa Ecclesia semper est coniunctus; ipsi ius tamen est, iuxta Ecclesiae necessitates, determinare modum, sive personalem sive collegialem, huius muneris exercendi.

"§3. A sententia Romani Pontificis non datur appellatio."

which is the synod of bishops. The cardinals also assist him, as do other persons and various institutes according to the needs of the times. In his name and by his authority, all these persons and institutes fulfill the function entrusted to them for the good of all the churches, according to the norms defined by law.

Canon 334 mentions some possibilities for cooperation between bishops and the pope in the exercise of the papal office: the synod of bishops (cc. 342–348), cardinals (cc. 349–359), and "other persons and various institutes according to the needs of the times." The "institutes" refer first of all to the Roman Curia (cc. 360–361) as well as the papal diplomatic corps (cc. 362–367).[33]

Thus canon 334 provides further clarifications of the final phrase of canon 333, §2, which states that the pope can exercise his office in a collegial manner. The former law limited the collegial exercise of the papal office both actually and legally to cooperation between the pope and the college of cardinals (CIC 230). However, various documents of Vatican II, such as Christus Dominus 9 and 10, as well as a series of postconciliar documents, broadened the circle of those able to participate in this collegiality. Of current significance is the apostolic constitution Pastor bonus.

Canon 334 corresponds to the ecclesiology of Vatican II when it lists the bishops first among the co-workers (cooperatores, derived from the word cooperatrix used in the Latin text). Cooperator can also mean "assistant." More likely this is the sense given to the word in the other formulations according to which bishops, cardinals, and other persons carry out this task "in his [the pope's] name and by his authority." The canon makes special mention of the synod of bishops (cc. 342–348), an institute first suggested by the Second Vatican Council. The fact that ecumenical councils are not mentioned in this canon is appropriate from an ecclesiological standpoint since they do not act in the name and under the authority of the pope. Rather, they are an institute of a unique nature. In this context, one should recall that in a council the college of bishops exercises power over the universal Church together with its head, the pope (c. 337, §1).

In canon 32 of the 1980 draft of the Fundamental Law, the content of the current canon 334 was clearly subdivided into two paragraphs.[34] The first paragraph mentioned the bishops as well as the synod of bishops, and the second paragraph mentioned the cardinals and the Roman Curia, in order to stress their distinct foundations, namely, either ordo (orders) or the power of jurisdiction derived from the pope. Controversial discussions concerning the function of the college of cardinals occasionally took place at Vatican II, especially concerning the extent to which this college truly represented the world-wide episcopate. The compromise solution to these critiques resulted in the creation of the new institute of the synod of bishops as well as the internationalization of the college of cardinals.

Apart from a few stylistic differences, there are two textual differences between canon 334 and canon 46 of the Eastern code. The Eastern code expressly mentions not only the cardinals, but also the Roman Curia as well as the papal legates as institutions or persons assisting the pope (as some commentators on c. 334 do). Moreover, the phrase at the end of canon 334, "according to the norms defined by law," is enlarged to read: "according to the norm of law established by the Roman Pontiff himself."

Interim Governance of Apostolic See

Canon 335 — When the Roman See is vacant or entirely impeded, nothing is to be altered in the governance of the universal Church; the special laws issued for these circumstances, however, are to be observed.

During the time between the death of a pope and the election of his successor, the Roman See in considered vacant. According to canon 335, during such times, as well as during those in which the pope is impeded from exercising his office, there can be no innovations in the governance of the universal Church (Sede vacante nihil innovetur). When the see is vacant, the college of cardinals assumes the immediate care of the daily business of the Holy See. Essentially, during this time the activity of the college of cardinals is directed to the swift and orderly completion of the papal election. The tasks and rights of the cardinals and the Roman Curia during a vacant see are regulated by the apostolic constitution Universi Dominici gregis. The parts of the constitution regarding daily operations while the see is vacant can possibly be used also in times when the pope is fully impeded from exercising his office. A clear legal provision or even a separate law does not exist. In the realm of possibilities, the provisions of the code for an impeded episcopal see (cc. 412–415) could be used in the case of an impeded Apostolic See. Moreover, the provisions of the code for a vacant episcopal see, especially canon 428, §1, could be applied analogously since it would be a case of the vacancy of the episcopal see of Rome.

As has been mentioned, while the Roman See is vacant, the college of cardinals assumes the governance of the universal Church. But the college obviously cannot issue any acts involving the power of jurisdiction that have been reserved to the pope. It can merely regulate daily and urgent affairs, and only within the limits of the boundaries set out by Universi Dominici gregis (see c. 359). The offices of the cardinals, those who are heads of the congregations of the Roman Curia, as well as that of the cardinal secretary of state, expire with the vacant see. Actually, the function of the college of cardinals remains during the vacant see even if limited to preparing for and completing the papal election. Before the papal election conclave begins, those cardinals present in Rome gather daily for a meeting of the college. A vacant see has further legal consequences. An ecumenical council is immediately interrupted (c. 340) as is a synod of bishops (c. 347, §2). However, the office of a papal legate does not expire with the vacant see unless the papal letter of appointment establishes otherwise (c. 367).

There are merely stylistic differences between canon 335 and canon 47 of the Eastern code. Canon 33 of the 1980 draft of the Fundamental Law contained the additional provision that the exercise of the ministry of the pope is suspended while the see is vacant or impeded. Thus, during these times it ceases functioning.[35]

ARTICLE 2: THE COLLEGE OF BISHOPS [cc. 336–341]

Description

Canon 336 — The college of bishops, whose head is the Supreme Pontiff and whose members are bishops by virtue of sacramental consecration and hierarchical communion with the head and members of the college and in which the apostolic body continues, together with its head and never without this head, is also the subject of supreme and full power over the universal Church.

[35] LEF/1980, c. 33: "Sede romana vacante aut prorsus impedita, supremi Pastoris muneris exercitium suspenditur et nihil innovetur in Ecclesiae universae regimine: serventur autem leges speciales pro iisdem adiunctis iam latae."

Canon 336 must be the one canon of the code that gives rise to the largest number of difficulties in interpretation. It bears a fundamental significance for Catholic ecclesiology, and it is a product of the Second Vatican Council. Accordingly, the composition of the text, as opposed to its actual content, has no prior model in the history of canon law. It is based on Lumen gentium 20, 22, 23 and the "Explanatory Note" as well as on Christus Dominus and Ad gentes. It simplifies canon 29, §3 of the 1980 version of the Fundamental Law.[36] As mentioned above, an entirely new composition arose out of these texts. It is noteworthy that the tenor of the source texts emphasizes in a special way the exceptional significance of the college of bishops while canon 336 serves to stress the supremacy of the pope over the college of bishops. As far as the organization of the legal text is concerned, a remarkable change should be noted. The 1917 code spoke of the ecumenical council (CIC 222–229) in the chapter following the chapter on the pope (CIC 218–221). That chapter on the council is no longer formally recognized by the 1983 code. Rather, its provisions were appropriated, in a transformed fashion, into an "article" entitled "The College of Bishops." That is how canon 336 was shaped. There is a connection between canon 336 and canon 228, §1 of the 1917 code as far as content is concerned. Both canons speak of supreme power in the Church: in the 1917 code in reference to the ecumenical council, and in the 1983 code in reference to the college of bishops. The use of the term "power" or "authority" (potestas) is of great importance in this canon, just as it was in the provisions on the power of the pope in canon 331. The 1917 code used such terms far less frequently than the 1983 code does, and then only in reference to both the pope and the ecumenical council. At least the use of the terms in the former law was thoroughly adequate for describing clearly the power of jurisdiction of the pope and the council. As regards the council, the 1917 code spoke of a "supreme power" over the universal Church. The 1983 code is more reserved with regard to the power of the council. Canon 337 speaks merely of a "power" of the ecumenical council over the universal Church. Nevertheless, canon 336 now contains two terms in its description of the power of the college of bishops. It exercises "supreme and full" power with regard to the universal Church.

Canon 336 is the only self-contained statement in the code concerning the college of bishops. As opposed to the rather detailed section on the pope, there are no more statements on the function and tasks of the college in the code besides the provisions of canon 337, §2 and §3. Instead, one finds merely the traditional statements concerning the ecumenical council (with modifications). Canon 336 speaks of membership in the college of bishops, its origin in the apostolic college, the function of the pope as head of the college, and the power of the college of bishops.

Membership in the College of Bishops

Bishops are members of the college of bishops based on their consecration and hierarchical communion with the head of the college, that is, the pope, as well as with the other members of the college. The unbreakable connection between both requirements is continuously emphasized in Catholic ecclesiology (LG 22a; c. 375, §2). The word order used in this statement is important, since the element of consecration is of greater importance than that of jurisdiction (i.e., the power of jurisdiction and hierarchical jurisdiction). Bishops receive the three munera with consecration: the office of sanctifying, of teaching, and of governing (LG 21b; c. 375, §2). This ontological participation is determined by hierarchical communion. According to number two of the "Explanatory Note," the determination of power occurs through hierarchical authority according to rules approved by the supreme authority. "Supreme authority" (suprema auctoritas) in the texts of Vatican II is an expression synonymous with the pope. It is clear that the appropriate rules for the determination of power (potestas) must be made by the pope. The statement of the "Explanatory Note" that the determination itself must come "through hierarchical authority" is rather vague. According to Catholic tradition, the hierarchical authority for or over the universal Church is the pope, and for or over the particular church is the bishop or ordinaries equivalent to him (c. 381, §2; see c. 368).

[36] LEF/1980, c. 29, §3: "Una cum Romano Pontifice ceteri Episcopi, in quibus nempe omnibus perseverat munus pascendi Ecclesiam omnibus Apostolis concessum et successoribus eorum transmittendum, Corpus constituunt seu Collegium Episcoporum, cuius Caput est Summus Pontifex, Petri successor, et cuius membra sunt Episcopi vi sacramentalis consecrationis et hierarchica communione cum Collegii Capite et membris; quod Collegium Episcoporum, in quo Corpus apostolicum continuo perseverat, una cum Capite suo, et numquam sine hoc Capite, subiectum quoque supremae et plenae potestatis in universam Ecclesiam exsistit, quae quidem potestas nonnisi consentiente Romano Pontifice exerceri potest."

According to Catholic doctrine, hierarchical communion includes acceptance of the (jurisdictional) primacy of the pope. Concerning this, the "Explanatory Note" (n. 3) says that the head of the college of bishops must be "the bearer of the supreme and full power over the entire Church," and "his office as Vicar of Christ and Shepherd of the Universal Church must be protected from being diminished."

The "Explanatory Note," and with it the Second Vatican Council, found brief but not thoroughly clear words for dealing with the question of validly ordained bishops who are not in hierarchical communion with the pope and the bishops united with him. On the one hand, the council maintained that the munus (office) cannot be exercised without hierarchical communion. On the other hand, it did not want to go into the questions of liceity and validity. These questions were expressly left to further theological research.

Apostolic Origin

The provisions of canon 336 on the apostolic origin of the college of bishops bring to mind the provisions of canon 330, although there is an essential difference between them. The word "college" and its legal notion have a central place in canon 330. Canon 336, on the other hand, uses the word "body" (corpus), which was given priority by the conservative faction at the Second Vatican Council (LG 22b). In another place, the council used an alternative and more functional phrase for the apostolic college: "stable group" (coetus stabilis—LG 19). However, "college" remained the dominant term in the council as well as in canon 336. This correctly corresponds to the word's more juridical meaning as compared to the terms corpus and coetus. At the same time, mention can be made of the change in the order of collegium and corpus from canon 29, §3 of the 1980 version of the Fundamental Law to canon 336. The term "apostolic" has a traditional place in the phrase "apostolic succession" (successio apostolica) in which all bishops stand. The phrase seeks to express the fact that current bishops by the reception of ordination (ordo) are united in an unbroken tradition and historical continuity with an apostle chosen by Jesus. This also (indirectly) highlights the greater significance of the power of ordination over the power of jurisdiction.

The Function of the Pope as Head of the College

The emphasis on the function of the pope as head of the college in canon 336 is noteworthy, especially since it occurs in the one canon of the code dedicated exclusively to the college of bishops. The word or the concept "head" (caput) appears four times in this brief text. In terms of content, canon 336 is based on numbers 3 and 4 of the "Explanatory Note," which are dedicated solely to the function of the pope as head of the college. Accordingly, without its head the college of bishops does not possess supreme and full power over the universal Church. This does not agree with historical facts, with the very notion of a college, or with the teachings of the legitimate ecumenical councils of Constance and Basel. Thus it can—indeed, must—be said that the ecclesiological doctrine on the primacy and its relationship to the episcopacy has changed. And yet, given historical experiences, a situation similar to that which occurred in the fifteenth century cannot be ruled out in the future of the Church; namely, the question of how the Church must deal on a structural level with a schismatic or heretical pope. This question is not addressed by current church law. The problem is heightened by the fact that, according to currently operative church law, the college of bishops cannot act without its head. In contrast, the head (the pope) can act or exercise power over the universal Church without the college of bishops. Collegial acts of the bishops always require the consent of the pope (LG 22b; cc. 341, 343). This was treated expressly by the "Explanatory Note" (n. 4). The term "consent" is used "so that no one thinks of dependence on someone who stands outside." The expression calls to mind the communion between the head and the members. The question naturally arises, therefore, whether the college of bishops even possesses a "proper" power or whether its power is derived from the head since without the head it cannot even exercise its power. It should be noted as well that papal power is in no way derived from the college of bishops. Rather, it is exercised by the mandate of Christ. Furthermore, it should be clearly seen that diverse types and origins of the power of jurisdiction are spoken of in this context. As far as the essentially greater power of orders is concerned, there is but the one ordo (orders), which the pope and bishops possess equally.

The Authority of the College of Bishops

The college of bishops possesses supreme and full power over the universal Church and is thus also responsible for it. It is noteworthy that the ecclesial legislator, in both the wording of canons as well as in the divisions of material, speaks always first concerning the pope and then concerning the college of bishops, something that is contrary to the unambiguous teaching of the Second Vatican Council and canon 330 of the code. The ecclesiologically correct order is found only in canons 330, 336, and 755, §1. In contrast, canon 782 refers first to the pope and then to the college of bishops. A reference to the comparable power of the pope and college of bishops represented in an ecumenical council is found in canon 1732, according to which the decrees published by them have a special value.

Finally, the formulations of canon 336 express a general ambiguity in postconciliar Catholic ecclesiology. Certainly the conciliar teaching has hopefully put a final end to the earlier extreme positions of papalism and conciliarism (conciliar theory). Still, Paul VI's insight into the necessity of the "Explanatory Note" has shown that there are ambiguities and difficulties of interpretation in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church.[37] The "Explanatory Note" itself is ultimately not clear in every regard. It leaves room for further theological research. This has led to at least two consequences following the council. The first is that theologians and canonists have taken two different positions. The first sees the college of bishops with the pope as its head as the bearer of supreme power in the Church. This view is held primarily, although not exclusively, by theologians (e.g., Congar, Rahner, Schillebeeckx). Others, primarily canonists (e.g., Corecco, Mörsdorf), maintain that the pope and college of bishops are two inadequately distinct subjects of supreme power. The second consequence, which cannot be overlooked, is that as a result especially of the 1983 code, but also of the numerous legally relevant postconciliar acts of the pope, a de facto strengthening of the emphasis on papal power in the universal Church has occurred. The 1992 letter of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith Communionis notio should be mentioned in this regard.[38]

There are only two terminological differences between canon 336 and canon 49 of the Eastern code, possibly out of consideration for the Eastern churches in union with Rome: instead of Summus

Exercise of Power

Canon 337 — §1. The college of bishops exercises power over the universal Church in a solemn manner in an ecumenical council.

§2. It exercises the same power through the united action of the bishops dispersed in the world, which the Roman Pontiff has publicly declared or freely accepted as such so that it becomes a true collegial act.

§3. It is for the Roman Pontiff, according to the needs of the Church, to select and promote the ways by which the college of bishops is to exercise its function collegially regarding the universal Church.

Canon 337 speaks of the diverse forms of the exercise of the supreme power of the college of bishops over the universal Church. The ecumenical council, based on the decrees of Vatican II (LG 22b; "Explanatory Note," 3; CD 4), is now but one possibility, even if it is the first or most preeminent. There are two other forms, with the form and structure of the third involving the power of the pope expressly exercised on his own initiative. Hence one must speak of a relativization of the traditional significance of the ecumenical council. To be perfectly clear, it must be said that even the ecumenical council and the so-called epistolary council mentioned in paragraph two occur only at the initiative of the pope. The college of bishops is seen as a reality having a purely abstract importance, whose realization in the forms mentioned in this canon depends on the initiative of the pope. Only through him can the college become an acting subject of supreme and full power over the universal Church. The threat of sanctions in canon 1372 applies to recourse taken to the college of bishops, since the canon provides a penalty for recourse against an act of the pope "to an ecumenical council or the college of bishops" (one should note the word order!). The first two paragraphs of canon 337 are based on Lumen gentium 22 and Christus Dominus 4. Paragraph three has been taken from the "Explanatory Note" (n. 3).

The Ecumenical Council (§1)

According to the provisions of the 1917 code (CIC 228, §1), the ecumenical council possessed supreme power over the universal Church. This phrase has been dropped. According to the currently operative formulation, the college of bishops exercises this power "in an ecumenical council." Since the college of bishops is thus an active subject, the definition of its power in canon 336 ("supreme and full power") applies. The essential structural elements of an ecumenical council are mentioned in or regulated by canons 338–341. However, the code says nothing about the term "ecumenical." According to the Catholic Church's own understanding, the term "ecumenical" applies to a council whose participants are bishops and other persons (c. 339) who accept the function of the pope as head.

According to Catholic calculations, the Second Vatican Council was the twenty-first ecumenical council. Other Christian churches, foremost among them the Orthodox, agree with the Catholic Church only in recognizing the first four councils as ecumenical (Nicea, Constantinople I, Ephesus, Chalcedon). The emperors had a great influence at the early councils. They convened the councils and also made their dominant authority felt during the course of the council. The medieval emperors of the Holy Roman Empire attempted to carry on this tradition, but their influence remained relatively limited. On the other hand, the influence of popes on the council grew. Since the Council of Florence (1431–1445) the pope's influence has been dominant at all councils with the exception of the Councils of Constance and Basel. Councils have served in a special way in times of ecclesial crisis by deciding disputed questions of ecclesial doctrine and discipline. The last three councils (Trent, Vatican I and II) were and are of outstanding significance for the current law of the Church. In former times, due to the insufficient means of communication, councils were representative ecclesial gatherings only in a very limited sense. Only the two Vatican councils can be referred to as ecumenical. Still, despite their designation as ecumenical councils, they were actually councils of only the Catholic Church (the Latin church and the Eastern churches united with Rome). Incidentally and surprisingly, Catholic Church law, structurally speaking, recognizes no council (or synod) that is exclusively and solely for the Latin church.

United Exercise of Office (§2)

One of the most problematic provisions of the 1983 code is found in paragraph two. It states that "through the united action of the bishops dispersed in the world... it becomes a true collegial act." According to references to the source of this text, it is based on Lumen gentium 22. But, as far as this question is concerned, that source text contains a much more general formulation ("The same collegial power can be exercised together with the pope by the bishops living throughout the world..., such that a truly collegial act results"). If one takes seriously as a juridical concept the term "collegial act" found in both formulations, the idea that bishops dispersed throughout the world could posit such an act is highly questionable. The prerequisites for a collegial act are that it be placed at the same time, in the same place, by the members of the college convoked according to the regulations of the statutes. That these prerequisites do not exist or are not guaranteed in the situation mentioned in canon 337, §2 was also sensed by the legislator since he formulated the end of the canon to read: "so that it becomes a truly collegial act." In canon 341, §2 the code again speaks of this possibility. Interestingly, that canon speaks of the college taking "truly collegial action in another way."

So far there have been no provisions or regulations governing the exercise of this juridical possibility, nor has there yet been a need for such a possibility. Usually this regulation is understood as referring to an epistolary council [Briefkonzil]. In the past, bishops were consulted by Pius XII before the proclamation of the dogma of the bodily assumption of Mary into heaven (1950), and other popes made similar inquiries during the last 150 years. It has also been occasionally asserted that the synod of bishops issues collegial acts vicariously (!), which is an expression of episcopal collegiality. These examples are troubling. The synod of bishops itself in its most comprehensive form, namely, as an ordinary general gathering, is merely a representation of the college of bishops, and was conceived as such from the beginning. Besides, an epistolary council does not possess the already mentioned criteria for a collegial act. Canon 337, §2 is based on Lumen gentium 22b where, in fact, these same provisions are made. Even those statements of the council were interpreted in various ways.

Canon 337 makes provisions similar to those of canon 333, §2. It is up to the pope to determine whether and how the college of bishops should collegially exercise its mission regarding the universal Church. Even here problems can arise if the pope, for whatever reason, is not prepared to allow the college to exercise its task. One of the most important legal actions in the Church occurs without the pope, that is, the papal election. This is also a collegial act, even if it involves only the college of cardinals and not the entire college of bishops. Still, according to current opinion, the college of cardinals is representative of the college of bishops. However, one senses a certain ambivalence in the code when paragraph two speaks of the pope being able to accept freely a united action of the bishops. Apparently, this refers to a subsequent acceptance of the action. There is an unmistakable parallel with canon 341 (confirmation of conciliar decrees or free acceptance of conciliar decrees by the pope). This invites further reflection on the differences between the two processes.

The Role of the Pope (§3)

It is the pope's right to confirm the collegial form of action of the college of bishops. As has already been mentioned, this text originates from part three of the "Explanatory Note." It contains the formulation according to which the pope directs, promotes, and approves collegial actions in light of the good of the Church "according to his own judgment." This wording was not appropriated by the code; instead, the provision of the code was strengthened through a not-so-subtle wording which maintains that this is a prerogative or right of the pope.

There is no difference in content between canon 337 and canon 50 of the Eastern code. The former canon corresponds to canon 35 of the 1980 version of the Fundamental Law.

Ecumenical Council: Role of the Pope

Canon 338 — §1. It is for the Roman Pontiff alone to convoke an ecumenical council, preside over it personally or through others, transfer, suspend, or dissolve a council, and to approve its decrees.

§2. It is for the Roman Pontiff to determine the matters to be treated in a council and establish the order to be observed in a council. To the questions proposed by the Roman Pontiff, the council fathers can add others which are to be approved by the Roman Pontiff.

This canon presents special provisions regarding the ecumenical council. While appropriating extensively the provisions of the 1917 code (CIC 222–229), the 1983 code also made changes that arise only partly out of the decrees of the Second Vatican Council.

Canon 338 reflects the content of canons 222 and 226 of the 1917 code as well as Lumen gentium 22b and the "Explanatory Note" (n. 3).

It is the pope's right to convoke an ecumenical council. Lumen gentium 22b addressed this point a bit more extensively. An ecumenical council occurs only when it is determined to be such by the pope or at least recognized by him. Only in that context did the council speak of a "prerogative" of the bishop of Rome to convene councils. If canon 338 has redefined the content of canon 222, §1 of the 1917 code by another wording of it, this must be viewed as an ecclesiological step backwards. Certainly the formulation of the council took into consideration historical experiences. The first councils were convened by Roman emperors, even if on the advice of bishops. Medieval councils too occurred at the initiative of emperors and others, rather than absolutely or solely at the popes' initiative. The wording of the code, according to which it belongs to the pope alone to convene an ecumenical council, permits the sole interpretation that this is a prerequisite for the validity of the council.

It also belongs to the pope to preside at the council. He can permit others to represent him, something that happened, for instance, at the Second Vatican Council. Furthermore, the pope (alone) can transfer the place where the council is held, interrupt its work for a certain period of time, or dissolve it. This form of dissolving a council is to be distinguished from the interruption of a council regulated by canon 340 at the death of a pope. Conceivably a majority of the council fathers might oppose a dissolution of the council by the pope. However, the decrees of such a council would acquire validity only if the pope or his successor freely accepted them (see c. 337, §2).

This canon further mentions the (sole) right of the pope to approve the decrees of the council. Canon 341, §1 also speaks of this. We find here evidence of an inconsistent redaction of the canons, and discrepancies on this point between both canons are proof of different ecclesiologies. Canon 338, §1 follows the teaching of Vatican I (CIC 222, §2) by granting the pope alone the right to approve decrees. Canon 341, §1, on the other hand, follows the view of Vatican II by maintaining that the pope approves the decrees "together with the council fathers."[39]

Canon 338, §2 regulates the rather technical or formal aspects of a council. Every responsibility and initiative lies legitimately with the pope. He determines the matters the council will address, although the "council fathers" can add to them with the approval of the pope. Council fathers include all bishops as well as those who are nominated by the pope according to canon 339, §2 to be participants in the council. Finally, the pope alone confirms the topics of a council. One might question whether this filtration process in the preparation of a council corresponds to the idea of collegiality, since a council, according to canon 337, §1, is an occasion during which the college of bishops exercises power over the universal Church. In preparation for the Second Vatican Council, commissions, conferences of bishops, orders, universities, scientific organizations, etc., all made recommendations to the Roman Curia or reacted to suggestions that came from institutions of the Curia. This often very time-consuming process can give rise to the impression that the topics of the council were also determined by these persons and institutions. In fact, however, the topics on the daily agenda of the council were those to which the pope had consented. In this way, Paul VI expressly excluded discussion of the important topics of birth control and clerical celibacy from the Second Vatican Council.

The order to be followed in a council is determined by the pope.[40]

Apart from rather small terminological differences, canon 338 corresponds to canon 51 of the Eastern code. It corresponds literally to canon 36 of the 1980 version of the Fundamental Law.

Participants at a Council

Canon 339 — §1. All the bishops and only the bishops who are members of the college of bishops have the right and duty to take part in an ecumenical council with a deliberative vote.

§2. Moreover, some others who are not bishops can be called to an ecumenical council by the supreme authority of the Church, to whom it belongs to determine their roles in the council.

Canon 339 possesses great ecclesiological significance. It contains changes in traditional canon law that in themselves bear welcome consequences in the evaluation of episcopal consecration, but which are also partly alarming. This is clearly demonstrated by a comparison between canon 339 and canon 223 of the 1917 code.

Canon 339, §1 is based on Christus Dominus 4.[41] It gives all bishops (diocesan as well as titular and emeritus bishops) the right to take part in the council with a deliberative vote. The former law granted this right to titular bishops as well, but included the possibility of reserving it.[42] Participants in the council also have the right to vote. They must be members of the college of bishops, that is, they must fulfill the requirements of canons 336 and 375, §2: episcopal consecration as well as hierarchical communion with the pope and the other members of the college of bishops. Participation in a council is described as a right and duty (officium) of bishops. The translation of officium as "duty" is certainly correct, even though the notion of officium has a more extensive connotation, namely, that of an office. The former law's provision for the appointment of a proxy (without the right to vote) in cases where a member was legitimately prevented from attending a council has been dropped.

The now clear provision of paragraph one is welcome. The group of participants has been limited to bishops alone in accord with the ecclesiology of the Second Vatican Council. The 1917 code mentioned a series of other legitimate participants: cardinals (even if they had not been consecrated bishops), diocesan bishops not yet consecrated, abbots and prelates nullius, abbot primates, and superiors general of exempt religious orders of clerics. Earlier councils also included secular representatives among their participants, although these individuals were not granted the right to vote. The decisive difference is that until Vatican II the right to participate in an ecumenical council and the right to vote in one were considered to be exercises of the power of jurisdiction, which in the case of titular bishops was seen as something conferred by the pope. Since the Second Vatican Council both rights have been based on episcopal consecration, an indication of the high esteem given it in the council's ecclesiology.

[41] It is noteworthy that this source was not reported in the sources for the code.

[42] CIC 223, §2: "unless it was expressly precluded in the convocation" ("nisi aliud in convocatione expresse caveatur").

It is quite regrettable that the clear description of the right to participate and vote has been seriously attenuated in paragraph two. Some "others" who are not bishops can be called to participate in a council. Apparently the canon envisions only a small number of such persons. It was once assumed, with regard to the synod of bishops, that the pope could appoint up to an additional fifteen percent of its members beyond the number that the law provided for. Although this limit has been dropped from the code, if the need arose, one could apply this method of determining the number of participants in an ecumenical council. Although theoretically this provision could be applied to the pope and/or the college of bishops, some maintain that the ecclesial legislator intended it to apply exclusively to the pope. In the texts of the Second Vatican Council it was reserved to the pope. The whole context of the canons on the ecumenical council also supports the view that at least in this canon the pope alone is intended to have this right. The "supreme authority" determines the roles of those appointed by him to a council.

A structural change for the Catholic Church that does not correspond to the ecclesiology of the Second Vatican Council lies concealed in the subordinate clause of canon 339, §2, which does not state what type of vote these appointees have. The supreme authority is to determine whether they will have a deliberative vote or merely a consultative vote. The 1917 code gave detailed provisions concerning who would have a deliberative vote. Following the ecclesiological view current at the time, a deliberative vote was granted to persons who were not bishops only if they were ecclesiastical dignitaries with a higher power of jurisdiction. At the same time, a deliberative vote was expressly denied to theologians and canonists who had been invited to the council as experts (periti; CIC 223, §3). According to the new provision, it is left to the (not clearly defined) "supreme authority" to determine the type of vote the appointed members will have.

Apart from a few small terminological changes (obligatio, "obligation," instead of officium, "duty," in §1), canon 339 corresponds to canon 52 of the Eastern code. The former text also corresponds to canon 37 of the 1980 version of the Fundamental Law.

Automatic Interruption

Canon 340 — If the Apostolic See becomes vacant during the celebration of a council, the council is interrupted by the law itself until the new Supreme Pontiff orders it to be continued or dissolves it.

Canon 340 is comparable to canon 229 of the 1917 code although it is worded more generally. The earlier provision regulated the dissolution of a council only in the case of the death of a pope. The new regulation includes the possibility of the resignation of a pope as a cause of a vacant Roman See. Moreover, up until recently it was envisioned that a new pope would reconvene the council and bring it to completion. Now it is clearly stated that a new pope can also dissolve a council.

According to the "Explanatory Note" (n. 4), every collegial act of the college of bishops requires the consent of its head. This statement is the reason for this canon. The canon also demonstrates the consequences of the traditional provision "Sede vacante nihil innovetur" ("When a see is vacant nothing is to be altered"—cc. 335; 428, §1) as well as of canon 336, according to which the pope is head of the college of bishops. The council cannot dissolve itself during a vacant see, since the right of dissolving a council is reserved to the pope (c. 338, §1).

As with canon 332, §2, there are important and clearly possible situations that are not regulated by canon 340. As opposed to canon 335, there is no mention in this canon of the possibility of the pope being "entirely impeded." Furthermore, regulations are lacking in this canon, as they are in the canons on the pope himself, for the possibility of incapacity resulting from physical or psychic causes, for cases in which the pope is prevented from exercising his office (e.g., due to political causes), or for the possibility of a pope or competing popes committing heretical or schismatic acts. All of the foregoing incidents are attested to in church history (cf. Council of Constance, 1414–1418). This canon, as well as the canons on the pope, demonstrate a certain reluctance for regulating by means of the law a breakdown in papal power.

With regard to content, there is no difference between canon 340 and canon 53 of the Eastern code. Canon 340 corresponds literally to canon 38 of the 1980 version of the Fundamental Law.

Binding Force of Decrees

Canon 341 — §1. The decrees of an ecumenical council do not have obligatory force unless they have been approved by the Roman Pontiff together with the council fathers, confirmed by him, and promulgated at his order.

§2. To have obligatory force, decrees which the college of bishops issues when it places a truly collegial action in another way initiated or freely accepted by the Roman Pontiff need the same confirmation and promulgation.

Paragraph one broadens the formulation of canon 227 of the 1917 code on the basis of conciliar ecclesiology (LG 22b) and corrects an unfortunate inconsistency in the final redaction of canon 338, §1 of the 1983 code. Paragraph two similarly takes into consideration expressions of the Second Vatican Council and corresponding other provisions of the 1983 code whereby collegial acts of the college of bishops could take place in ways other than in an ecumenical council.

Paragraph one describes the three stages leading to a legally binding conciliar decree. The first involves the pope "together with the council fathers," and the last two involve the pope alone. The first step, referred to as approval (approbatio), is the foundation of the entire process. As far as this stage is concerned, the canon makes it clear that the head and members of the college work together. Without the head, the pope, this step cannot be completed. With regard to the indispensable cooperation of the council fathers, there is no mention here of the required majority. The regulation of this matter is left to the procedural rules of an ecumenical council. However, it would certainly have been wise to include a fundamental reference to it in the code. As to the meaning of the phrase "together with the council fathers," commentaries on the code generally speak only of a "majority," which could also mean a simple majority of those present at the council with a right to vote, and not the usual qualified majority.

After the collegial act of approval (approbatio) come the primatial acts of confirmation (confirmatio) and promulgation (promulgatio). These correspond to canon 227 of the 1917 code. The subsequent free approval of conciliar decrees, as foreseen by Lumen gentium 22b and still found in the drafts of the Fundamental Law,[43] was eliminated.

The fact that two primatial acts must follow a collegial act in order for conciliar decrees to become legally binding is ecclesiologically dubious and, from a legal standpoint, not without logical problems. On the one hand, the collegial act of approval by the pope and the other council fathers is necessary for the legally binding character of a decree since it is a decree of the college of bishops represented in a council. On the other hand, according to canon 341, the primatial acts of confirmation and promulgation are necessarily involved. They follow the constitutive act of approval. However, they apparently possess the same legal quality as approval.

Pope Paul VI used the following formula of promulgation for the acts of the Second Vatican Council: "What is expressed in this constitution (decree, declaration) in whole and in part, has been approved by the fathers. And we, by virtue of the apostolic authority granted us by Christ, approve, decide, and decree it, together with the venerable fathers in the Holy Spirit, and inasmuch as it has been so ordered by the council, we command that it be promulgated for the glory of God." The same pope signed the documents with the significant title "Bishop of the Catholic Church" (Catholicae Ecclesiae Episcopus).

Paragraph two regulates the possibility of the college of bishops, not gathered in a council, taking collegial action in another manner. (see c. 337, §2). The legal difficulty that such a (not yet realized) act conceals has been discussed in the commentary on canon 337. The formal steps necessary for such an act to achieve a legally binding character are the same as those necessary in a council: confirmation and promulgation by the pope. Since this act must be "initiated or freely accepted by the Roman Pontiff," his cooperation is required for the act to come into being. However, it is noteworthy that in this case the term approbatio (approval) is not used as it is in the case of a council (§1). As has already been mentioned, the notion was expressly rejected that the pope can accept collegial acts of the college of bishops subsequent to their having taken place.

It is highly questionable that a concept as important as approbare (approve) would be used in different senses in canons 338, §1 and 341.

Canon 341 and canon 54 of the Eastern code diverge only in some details of wording, but not in regard to content. Canon 341 corresponds to canon 39 of the 1980 version of the Fundamental Law. There is merely a small stylistic difference in paragraph one.

CHAPTER II
THE SYNOD OF BISHOPS
[cc. 342–348]

During the preparation for the Second Vatican Council, several bishops suggested the establishment of some kind of permanent council whereby the bishops could exercise their authority over the universal Church, but this idea had little influence on the two schemas on bishops which were drafted for the first session of the council. In written comments on these drafts, several bishops repeated the proposal that some kind of episcopal council be created. By the time the schema on bishops and diocesan governance came up for discussion, the council had endorsed the proposition that, under the headship of the pope, the episcopal college was the subject of supreme power in the universal Church. The discussion could thus focus on appropriate ways to exercise this power.

In the light of this discussion, and in the light of papal comments indicating that Paul VI would welcome suggestions of ways in which bishops could more effectively assist him in carrying out his responsibilities, the drafting committee prepared a revised draft of the schema which included the following paragraph:

> 5. [The Central Coetus or Council]. Since the universal mission of the Supreme Pontiff demands greater resources of help and assistance each day, the Fathers of this Holy Council vehemently wish that some bishops from the different regions of the world may offer to the Supreme Pastor of the Church more effective aid, in a manner to be determined at the proper time, even, if it should please the Supreme Pontiff, coming together in a certain coetus or council, which could at the same time be a sign of the participation of all the bishops in solicitude for the universal Church.[1]

The drafting committee did not intend this gingerly worded paragraph to mean that the proposed council of bishops involved an exercise of episcopal ministry; the institute would exist "only to assist the Supreme Pontiff in the government of the universal Church."[2] This intention did not satisfy all the bishops, but the Fathers never resolved the issue. On September 14, 1965 Pope Paul VI anticipated (or forestalled) the achievement of a conciliar consensus by announcing his impending creation of the synod of bishops.[3] He formally established the institute the following day.[4]

Even so cursory an account of the conception of the synod of bishops demonstrates that the institute can be understood in at least two not entirely complementary ways. On the one hand, one can view its creation as a papal response to some bishops' expectations that a structure should exist through which the college of bishops might exercise their supreme power over the universal Church.[5] On the other hand, one can view the synod as an instrument by means of which the pope allows bishops to assist him in the exercise of his ministry.[6] It seems evident that the conciliar drafting commission strongly advocated the second view,[7] and Pope Paul VI never disavowed it. The phrasing of some of the following canons (the synod meets "to assist the Roman Pontiff"—c. 342; the pope may give the synod deliberative power—c. 343) reflects the same view.[8] However, if the synod was not conceived and does not function as an instrument for the exercise of the power of the college of bishops, then the Church's government structure suffers from a handicap: the Church has recognized herself as endowed with a power but has not created an ordinary means for exercising it.

[5] This view found official representation in the treatment of the synod in the Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops. The SCB situated its brief comments on the synod, not in part two, chapter 2, The Bishops' Collaboration with the Roman Pontiff (§§44–49), but in part two, chapter 3, Collaboration of the Bishops with the Episcopal College (§§50–53). Cf. SCB, Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops, trans. Benedictine Monks of the Seminary of Christ the King (Ottawa: Canadian Catholic Conference, 1974) §29, 52.

The seven canons of this chapter comprise only one source of law governing the synod. The 1965 motu proprio Apostolica sollicitudo contains more detailed prescriptions concerning the nature, purpose, and procedures of the institute; and it constitutes an authentic expression of the canonical tradition in the light of which the canons must be interpreted (cf. c. 6, §2). Moreover, the Ordo Synodi Episcoporum Celebrandae[9] contains norms about the structures and procedures of the synod. It is therefore necessary to refer to these documents in interpreting the canons.

The first two canons in this chapter define the synod and specify its function. Canon 344 lists some papal prerogatives vis à vis the synod. Canon 345 indicates the three forms of celebration of a synod (ordinary, extraordinary, and special), and canon 346 discusses the membership of each form. Canon 347 discusses an ordinary and an extraordinary way in which the celebration of a synod might cease. Canon 348 describes the officials necessary for the operation of the synod.

All of these canons are new, because the synod did not exist at the time the 1917 code was formulated, and the materials from which they are crafted come from Apostolica sollicitudo, from the Ordo, and from Christus Dominus 5.

Definition

Canon 342 — The synod of bishops is a group of bishops who have been chosen from different regions of the world and meet together at fixed times to foster closer unity between the Roman Pontiff and bishops, to assist the Roman Pontiff with their counsel in the preservation and growth of faith and morals and in the observance and strengthening of ecclesiastical discipline, and to consider questions pertaining to the activity of the Church in the world.

This canon is one of three officially promulgated definitions of the synod. The first and most detailed is contained in the first two norms of Apostolica sollicitudo:

> I. . . . The Synod of Bishops, whereby bishops chosen from various parts of the world lend their valuable assistance to the Supreme Pastor of the Church, is so constituted as to be: a) a central ecclesiastical institution, b) representing the complete Catholic episcopate, c) by its nature perpetual, d) as for its structure, performing its duties for a time and when called upon.

[6] See, for example, J. L. Gutiérrez, "Chapter II: The Synod of Bishops," in Pamplona ComEng, 271: "The Synod of Bishops is not a form of exercising collegiality in the governance of the Church, but it is a way of collaborating with the Roman Pontiff in his primatial function."

[7] For a detailed and persuasive argument in favor of this conclusion, cf. J. Arrieta, "El sinodo de los obispos: criterios que enmarcan su evolución normativa," Ius Canonicum 24 (1984) 51–85.

[8] The positioning of the canons in the code is ambiguous. The chapter on the synod could be seen either as the completion of the code's treatment of the college of bishops or as the beginning of its discussion of the instruments of papal government.

[9] This document was originally issued by the SS prior to the celebration of the 1967 synod (AAS 59 [1967] 775–780). It was revised in the light of experience prior to the 1969 synod (AAS 61 [1969] 525–539; CLD 7, 322–338). At the recommendation of the 1969 synod, some additions were made prior to the 1971 synod (AAS 63 [1971] 702–704; CLD 7, 338–341). The commentary will cite the Ordo by reference to its articles.

II. By its very nature it is the task of the Synod of Bishops to inform and give advice. It may also have deliberative power, when such power is conferred upon it by the Sovereign Pontiff, who will in such cases confirm the decisions of the Synod.

1. The general aims of the Synod of Bishops are: a) To encourage close union and valued assistance between the Sovereign Pontiff and the bishops of the entire world; b) To insure that direct and real information is provided on questions and situations touching upon the internal action of the Church and its necessary activity in the world of today; c) To facilitate agreement on essential points of doctrine and on methods of procedure in the life of the Church.

2. The special and proximate ends of the Synod of Bishops are: a) To communicate useful information; b) To proffer advice on the topics proposed for discussion in the individual meetings of the Synod.[10]

The text from Christus Dominus 5 is vaguer and shorter:

Bishops from various parts of the world, chosen through ways and procedures established or to be established by the Roman Pontiff, will render especially helpful assistance to the supreme pastor of the Church in a council to be known by the proper name of Synod of Bishops. Since it will be acting in the name of the entire Catholic episcopate, it will at the same time demonstrate that all the bishops in hierarchical communion share in the responsibility for the universal Church.[11]

Like its progenitors, the definition in canon 342 specifies what the synod of bishops is (a gathering of bishops from around the world) and the purposes for which it exists: (a) the fostering of communion, especially between the pope and his brother bishops; (b) assisting the pope in discharging his responsibilities; and (c) formulating possible answers to questions arising from the changing situation of the Church in the world.[12] Unlike the conciliar decree, the canon says nothing about the representative function of the synod[13] nor about its manifestation of the episcopal college's responsibility for the universal Church. Unlike the motu proprio, the canon pays little attention to the information-gathering and information-sharing possibilities of the synod. The canon's more matter-of-fact approach to the institute need not imply a repudiation of the council's or Pope Paul VI's views. It may reflect only the humble realization that the law is not the best forum for resolving theological questions.

Authority of the Synod

Canon 343 — It is for the synod of bishops to discuss the questions for consideration and express its wishes but not to resolve them or issue decrees about them unless in certain cases the Roman

[10] AAS 57 (1965) 776–777.

[11] AAS 58 (1966) 675.

[12] McGrath prefers a fourfold division of synod functions: (1) fostering communion; (2) assisting the pope "in the defense and development of faith and morals"; (3) assisting the pope "in the preservation and strengthening of ecclesiastical discipline"; and (4) considering the mission of the Church in the world. A. McGrath, "Chapter II: The Synod of Bishops," in CLSGBI Com, 197. Because the canon itself uses three parallel purpose clauses to specify the synod's functions, this author prefers the threefold division.

[13] From available documentation it would appear that the committee responsible for drafting this section of the code deliberately excluded from the text language parallel to the phrase "acting on behalf of the whole Catholic episcopate." Three reasons for this exclusion emerged during the discussion: (1) if the phrase were true, the synod ought to have deliberative power, and it does not; (2) the synod has functioned as an institute of the Latin church rather than of the whole Church; (3) the special assembly of the synod certainly does not represent the whole episcopate. Comm 14 (1982) 92–93. See also J. Tomko, "Il sinodo dei vescovi e Giovanni Paolo II," in Il Sinodo dei Vescovi, ed. J. Tomko (Rome: Libreria Editrice Vaticana, 1985) 27.

Pontiff has endowed it with deliberative power, in which case he ratifies the decisions of the synod.

"To issue decrees" is technical language: the synod of bishops is not a legislature. It is by nature a consultative body.[14] Rather than resolving the issues on its agenda, the synod offers the pope a wealth of information and makes suggestions, from among which the pope is free to choose or not, as he deems best.[15]

The canon envisages the possibility—not realized as of this writing—that the pope might endow the synod with decision-making power, but only for specific cases. In such an event the synod would be exercising delegated papal power (cf. c. 131, §1).[16]

Relationship with the Pope

Canon 344 — The synod of bishops is directly subject to the authority of the Roman Pontiff who:

1° convokes a synod as often as it seems opportune to him and designates the place where its sessions are to be held;

2° ratifies the election of members who must be elected according to the norm of special law and designates and appoints other members;

3° determines at an appropriate time before the celebration of a synod the contents of the questions to be treated, according to the norm of special law;

4° defines the agenda;

5° presides at the synod personally or through others;

6° concludes, transfers, suspends, and dissolves the synod.

This list of papal prerogatives is derived almost verbatim from Apostolica sollicitudo III. Number two of the canon supplements the reference to the pope's right to certify the election of some of the members with an accurate reference to his right to appoint others. The "norm(s) of special law" to which the canon refers are Apostolica sollicitudo VII and article 6 of the Ordo.[17] Apostolica sollicitudo III, 3 had expressed the preference that the assembly's topic be determined "at least six months, if possible, before the date for the convening of the Synod."[18] The canon more generously refers to "an appropriate time." It defers to particular law further specification of the method of determining the topic.[19] Apostolica sollicitudo contained a norm on "dispatching of material to those who are to take part in the discussion." The code omits this, too, apparently because it is a matter more properly dealt with in particular law.

These papal rights and duties are similar to those the pope exercises vis à vis the ecumenical council (cf. c. 338). Clearly, the laws governing the celebration of ecumenical councils served as a model for the laws governing the synod—with two significant differences. Possibly because participation in an ecumenical council is the right and duty of all and only bishops (c. 339, §1), the pope has no right (indeed, no need) to confirm the election of any members, although he does have the right (as does the college itself, acting under his headship) to call others who are not bishops to an ecumenical council and determine their partici-

[14] Cf. AS II: "By its very nature it is the task of the Synod of Bishops to inform and give advice." AAS 57 (1965) 776–777.

[15] It has become customary for ordinary sessions of the synod of bishops to prepare for the pope lists of "propositions" which, with the assistance of the consilium, he uses to prepare an apostolic exhortation.

[16] For a synopsis of the positions various authors take on the source of the power exercised by the synod, cf. J. Johnson, "The Synod of Bishops: An Exploration of Its Nature and Function," Stud Can 20 (1986) 298–305.

[17] The election must be by secret ballot. Each representative must be elected in turn—i.e., the first must be elected before the conference begins to vote on the second, etc. The Ordo even contains advice on the qualifications of candidates (6, §2, 5°).

[18] AAS 57 (1965) 777.

pation in it (c. 339, §2). The participants in an ecumenical council, unlike the participants in a synod, can add other questions for the council to discuss, subject to papal approval (c. 338, §2).

Forms of Assembly and Membership

Canon 345 — The synod of bishops can be assembled in a general session, that is, one which treats matters that directly pertain to the good of the universal Church; such a session is either ordinary or extraordinary. It can also be assembled in a special session, namely, one which considers affairs that directly pertain to a determinate region or regions.

Apostolica sollicitudo IV treated each form of celebration (general, extraordinary, and special) as a distinct species. The canon, following article 4 of the Ordo, is more systematic: there are two species (general and special), depending on whether the synod in question is convoked to discuss matters of concern to the entire Church or matters of concern primarily to a given territory.[20] The first species contains two sub-species (ordinary and extraordinary) depending on the urgency of the questions to be discussed.

Canon 346 — §1. A synod of bishops assembled in an ordinary general session consists of members of whom the greater part are bishops elected for each session by the conferences of bishops according to the method determined by the special law of the synod; others are designated by virtue of the same law; others are appointed directly by the Roman Pontiff; to these are added some members of clerical religious institutes elected according to the norm of the same special law.

Ordinary general sessions of the synod are celebrated with some regularity (1967, 1971, 1974, 1977, 1980, 1983, 1987, 1990, 1994). They have dealt with such issues as evangelization, the role of the laity, family life, justice, the formation of priests, and reconciliation and penance. The distinguishing characteristic of the ordinary session is that the majority of its episcopal participants are elected by the episcopal conferences: a conference with twenty-five or fewer members elects one representative; a conference with fifty or fewer elects two; a conference with one hundred or fewer elects three; and a conference with more than one hundred elects four.[21] In addition, the assembly includes: (1) the patriarchs, major archbishops, and metropolitans of Eastern sui iuris churches; (2) representatives of religious elected by the Union of Superiors General; (3) the cardinal prefects of Roman dicasteries; (4) and any papal appointees.[22] Generally more than two hundred ecclesiastics participate in an ordinary general assembly of the synod of bishops.

§2. A synod of bishops gathered in an extraordinary general session to treat affairs which require a speedy solution consists of members of whom the greater part are bishops designated by the special law of the synod by reason of the office which they hold; others are appointed directly by the Roman Pontiff; to these are added some members of clerical religious institutes elected according to the norm of the same law.

As of this writing there have been two extraordinary synods—one called in 1969 to discuss collegiality, and one convoked in 1985 to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of Vatican II. In neither case were there "affairs which require[d] a speedy [20] According to c. 433, §1, an ecclesiastical region is a grouping of some (but not all) of the ecclesiastical provinces within the territory of a single episcopal conference. The first draft of c. 433, by contrast, proposed the gathering into an ecclesiastical region of all of the provinces in a given nation. See Comm 17 (1985) 97–98 for background discussion and p. 105 for the original text of c. 12. It seems likely that c. 345 retains this earlier meaning. In other words, a special synod would be convoked, not for New England, but for an entire country (the Netherlands) or several countries (Africa).

solution." Why Pope Paul VI decided to convoke an extraordinary synod for 1969 is still a mystery.[23] Pope John Paul II regarded the celebration of a synod as a fitting commemoration of a significant episode in the life of the Church.[24] No crisis precipitated either assembly.

A more distinguishing characteristic of the extraordinary assembly is that the majority of its participants serve ex officio. The categories of membership are identical with those of the ordinary assembly: hierarchs from the Eastern sui iuris churches, prefects of Roman dicasteries, representatives of religious, papal appointees, and representatives of episcopal conferences. Instead of electing representatives, however, the episcopal conferences send their presidents.[25] Because these officials are already known, assembling the participants in such a synod (as opposed to other elements of preparation) can be fairly rapid. Because each episcopal conference sends a single representative, the assembly is also smaller than an ordinary session. The synod of 1969, for example, had 146 participants.

§3. A synod of bishops gathered in a special session consists of members especially selected from those regions for which it was called, according to the norm of the special law which governs the synod.

The first special session of the synod of bishops was the 1980 synod for the Netherlands.[26] There have been special synods for Europe (1991), Africa (1994), and Lebanon (1995).[27] Synods for the Americas, Asia, and possibly Oceania[28] are in the planning stages.[29]

The members of a special synod come from the same general categories as those for the participants in general synods. All participants, however, including the prefects of Roman dicasteries, must have some connection with the territory for which the synod is being celebrated.[30]

This particular form of synod can raise serious questions. How can one understand a special [23] Cf. J. Johnson, The Synod of Bishops: An Analysis of Its Legal Development (Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1986) 46–50, for a discussion of the preparation for this synod. If a sense of urgency marks the celebration of an extraordinary session, it is puzzling that more time elapsed between the convocation and assembly of the 1969 extraordinary session of the synod than between the convocation and assembly of the 1967 ordinary session.

[26] This classification follows T. Reese, Inside the Vatican: The Politics and Organization of the Catholic Church (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University, 1996) 45. J. Schotte ("The Synod of Bishops: A Permanent yet Adaptable Church Institution," Stud Can 26 [1992] 299–300) calls the Dutch synod "particular" rather than "special" because it occurred before the promulgation of the 1983 code and because it involved all rather than representatives of the bishops from the Netherlands. For a more detailed exposition of arguments in favor of Schotte's position, cf. Johnson, The Synod of Bishops: An Analysis, 185–193.

[27] Reese, 45. Schotte offers an overview of the European synod (300–304) and brief comments on the synods for Lebanon (304) and Africa (304–305). G. Caprile, Il Sinodo dei Vescovi 1991: Assemblea Speciale per L'Europa (Rome: La Civiltà Cattolica, 1992) is a detailed discussion of the European synod.

[28] In his aplett, "Tertio millennio adveniente," AAS 87 (1995) 30–31, Pope John Paul II announced his intention to convoke these synods. See Reese, 45, 47 for brief comments on the preparations for the synods for the Americas and Asia. [29] Most commentaries (J. Provost, in CLSA Com, 285; McGrath, in CLSGBI Com, 198; Gutiérrez, in Pamplona ComEng, 274) classify the Ukrainian synod of 1980 as a special synod. Johnson (The Synod of Bishops: An Analysis, 210–214) argues that it does not fit that category. There have recently been other synods of Eastern hierarchs: another synod of Ukrainian bishops in February 1991 and a synod of the Armenian Catholic Church in November, 1992.

synod as a consilium (advisory council) for the entire Church?[31] The synod exists to offer advice to the pope; how effective can such an institute be in addressing issues of concern to only some particular churches?[32] For example, if the bishops of the Netherlands had gathered in plenary council rather than in a special synod, they would have been capable of making decisions and issuing decrees, provided their acts received a papal recognitio (cf. cc. 445 and 446). Gathered in special synod, however, the bishops could in theory do no more than propose suggestions to the pope.[33]

Conclusion or Suspension of an Assembly

Canon 347 — §1. When the Roman Pontiff concludes a session of the synod of bishops, the function entrusted in it to the bishops and other members ceases.

§2. If the Apostolic See becomes vacant after a synod is convoked or during its celebration, the session of the synod and the function entrusted to its members are suspended by the law itself until the new Pontiff has decided to dissolve or continue the session.[34]

This canon deals with two ways in which a synod might come to an end. Canon 344, 6° and particular law add a third. (1) When the pope convokes a session of the synod of bishops, he specifies the date on which the participants will convene and the date on which he anticipates the session will conclude.[35] When the synod completes its work on the assigned date, its participants with the exception of the members of the consilium (cf. c. 348, §1) cease to have any official status (AS XI). Although the synod itself is a permanent institute, membership in a synod is always ad hoc.

(2) When any diocese falls vacant, "nothing is to be altered" (c. 428, §1). When the Roman See falls vacant, the prohibition against innovations extends to the governance of the universal Church (c. 335). Even an ecumenical council, in which the college of bishops exercises its own supreme power over the universal Church (c. 337, §1), is suspended in the event of the pope's death (c. 340). It is therefore only logical that a session of the synod of bishops, one of whose principal functions is "to assist the Roman Pontiff," would come to a halt during the vacancy of the chair of Peter. Like the parallel canon concerning the ecumenical council (c. 340), paragraph two does not decree the dissolution of the synod. The new pontiff is free to decree its continuance; but he is also free to dissolve it or change the focus of its discussion. During the interval, those whose membership in the synod had received papal approval would continue to be members; and officers who had been appointed for the session would continue to be officers; but they would not function.

(3) Article 1, §7 of the Ordo notes that the pope has the authority "to transfer, suspend, and dissolve the synod."[36] The pope's authority over the synod is complete: if its activities no longer seem useful to him, he can simply decree that its session is at end. Were he to do so, the members and officers of the particular session would cease to be so.

[32] Cf. J. Arrieta, "Circa la natura giuridica delle conferenze generali dell' episcopato latinoamericano," Ius Ecclesiae 5 (1993) 866.

[33] The synod actually issued, with formal papal approval, a substantial document—something of a joint pastoral letter: AAS 72 (1980) 215–232 (French text) and 232–250 (Dutch text). The European (cf. Origins 21 [1991] 457–465) and African (cf. Origins 24 [1994] 1–11) synods likewise issued final documents which do not appear to have been published in AAS.

[34] Article 17, §4 of the Ordo is slightly different: "If it should happen that the Supreme Pontiff departs this life after the convocation of a meeting of the Synod or during its celebration, the meeting is by that fact suspended until the new Pontiff has decreed that it is to be resumed or has convoked a new meeting." AAS 61 (1969) 533; CLD 7, 331.

[35] Cf., for example, Pope Paul VI, alloc "Il Cardinale," December 23, 1966, AAS 59 (1967) 54; the first synod was summoned for September 29, 1967, and its work was to be completed on October 24, 1967.

Secretariat of the Synod

Canon 348 — §1. The synod of bishops has a permanent general secretariat presided over by a general secretary who is appointed by the Roman Pontiff and assisted by the council of the secretariat. This council consists of bishops, some of whom are elected by the synod of bishops itself according to the norm of special law while others are appointed by the Roman Pontiff. The function of all these ceases when a new general session begins.

Apostolica sollicitudo XII had decreed that the institute would have "a permanent or general secretary, who will be provided with an appropriate number of assistants,"[37] but said nothing about his duties. The most recent version of the Ordo amply fills that lacuna.[38] The general secretary is appointed by the pope and serves at the pope's good pleasure (article 12, §1). He accordingly performs any tasks given him by the pope (§2). He participates in the sessions of the synod, directs the activities of the secretariat (§3), and chairs the council of the general secretariat (§4). With papal approval, he prepares the agenda for meetings of the council and reports to the pope about those meetings. He is responsible for communications from the pope to episcopal conferences and to other interested parties. He keeps curial officials, Eastern hierarchs, and presidents of episcopal conferences abreast of the activities of the synod. He fulfills any responsibilities assigned to him by the synod itself. He "collects, arranges, and preserves" the acts and documents of the synod. In fulfilling these responsibilities, he enjoys the services of assistants whom he can appoint with papal approval (§6).

One of the major conclusions of the 1969 first extraordinary synod of bishops was that the general secretariat needed reorganization in order to make both it and the synod more effective. The 1971 additions to the Ordo were intended to accomplish this end. Article 13 created a "council of the general secretariat" of the synod of bishops. It consists of fifteen members, twelve of whom are to be elected by the participants at the end of each general assembly.[39] The three remaining members are papal appointees. Because a large majority of the members of the council would be participants in the concluding session of the synod, they would be well positioned to assist in presenting to the pope the synod's recommendations and in implementing whatever he returned to them for execution. They would also be able to assist the general secretary in gathering suggestions from episcopal conferences and Eastern synods concerning possible topics for future synods and in preparing for the celebration of the next synod. The members of the council of the secretariat are not ex officio members of the succeeding assembly of the synod.[40]

§2. Furthermore, for each session of the synod of bishops one or more special secretaries are constituted who are appointed by the Roman Pontiff and remain in the office entrusted to them only until the session of the synod has been completed.

The special secretary is an expert in the matter to be discussed by a given assembly of the synod of bishops (Ordo 14, §1). The Ordo provides that one special secretary is to be appointed for each topic treated in a given session. The special secretary is heavily involved in the development of the synodal process. He assists the relator[41] in preparing and presenting the preliminary report that commences the genuine work of each synod. If the delegated presidents decide that a special study commission is necessary to assist the synod in completing its work, the special secretary attends all meetings of that commission. After the participants have discussed the agenda, both in general assembly and in small, language-based discussion groups, they express their opinions in writing. It is the task of the special secretary to collect these observations and reduce them to some kind of order. A printed copy of his summary serves as the basis for the final voting of the assembly. After the work of the synod is concluded, the special secretary assists the general secretary in preparing a report on its labors and conclusions.

[38] The following comments on the role of the general secretary derive from article 12 of the "revised and augmented" Ordo, AAS 63 (1971) 702–704; CLD 7, 338–341.

[39] Article 13, §2 of the Ordo prescribes that the election of the council should take into account the geographical distribution of bishops. In practice this has meant electing three representatives from Europe, Africa, the Americas, and Asia/Oceania/Australia respectively.

[40] Cf. AAS 72 (1980) 767.

CHAPTER III
THE CARDINALS OF THE HOLY ROMAN CHURCH
[cc. 349–359][1]

Unlike the recent institution of the synod of bishops, the college of cardinals is an ecclesiastical law institution with a long history of papal service. Although certain Eastern patriarchs may occasionally be members of this college, the cardinals are a distinctly Latin church phenomenon which is not treated in the Eastern code. While the synod of bishops has addressed various noteworthy postconciliar ecclesial concerns, the cardinals have continued to exercise significant ecclesial influence due to several factors.

First of all, the cardinals elect the pope, and most popes have come from their ranks. Second, contemporary popes, especially John Paul II, have increasingly sought their corporate counsel in addressing significant issues such as curial reform and Vatican finances. Third, as individuals, they occupy major curial positions and increasingly govern major sees around the world.

Before examining the canons on cardinals, this commentary will place them briefly in their proper historical context.[2]

Name

The term "cardinal" comes from the Latin word for hinge (cardo). In the early church a cleric was ordained to a particular post for life. This position was his "title" and he was called a "titular" there. If he changed his attachment from the title to which he was ordained to some other position, he was said to have been "incardinated" in the new position. This reflected the meaning of cardo, or hinge, that attaches a door to the wall. Such clergy were called "cardinals," not "titulars." The former term was used throughout the Western church and was accepted as a technical canonical term by the time of Pope Gregory the Great (590–604).

Some clerics were transferred (becoming "cardinals" instead of "titulars") because of their outstanding ability. Bishops, such as the bishop of Rome, wanted to utilize that ability; and gradually such clerics became pivotal episcopal aides (another meaning of cardo).

Roman liturgical practice influenced a unique use of "cardinal." Priests assigned to the various ancient house churches ("titles") were asked to provide liturgical services at the major shrines of the martyrs, e.g., the basilicas of Saints Peter, Paul, Mary Major, and the Lateran. When providing such services, these priests were known as "cardinals," for they were inserted there temporarily, acting outside their proper church or "title." This was the origin of today's "cardinal presbyters."

The bishops of the suburban towns around Rome performed episcopal services at the Lateran, the cathedral church of Rome. They were "titulars" in their own dioceses but "cardinals" when functioning liturgically at the Lateran. In addition to having a liturgical role, cardinals were increasingly consulted by the pope on various ecclesial issues. This was the origin of today's "cardinal bishops," who are attached to the seven suburbicarian sees around Rome.

Especially after the popes took over the civil governance of Rome, various social services were provided by deacons, who initially were direct papal aides attached to the Lateran palace. Later, however, they were also sent to diaconiae or social service centers throughout Rome, each with a chapel attached. Their significant role in administering church goods for the poor eventually gave rise to today's "cardinal deacons."

The aforementioned "cardinals" increasingly became the pope's pivotal aides in discharging his responsibilities as bishop of Rome and head of the college of bishops. They served as envoys in carrying out special papal commissions, including representing the pope at ecumenical councils.

Rise of the Cardinalate

The reform aspirations of the eleventh century popes led them to call various like-minded spirits to Rome where various churches were attributed to them without any burden of daily service. Such "cardinals" became the cornerstone of ecclesial reform. Presumably such a cadre of committed clergy would improve the pastoral life of Rome and carry the renewal of Christian life to other places in the Church.

A key development enhancing the status of this "college of cardinals" was a 1059 decree of Nicholas II on papal elections, attributing a key electoral role first to the cardinal bishops and then to the cardinal presbyters and deacons. The rest of the clergy and faithful were subsequently to ratify the election. In 1179 the Third Lateran Council determined the exclusive electoral competency of the cardinals without the other clergy and faithful.

Besides having this competency, the cardinals were increasingly involved in universal church governance to the point where some authors viewed them as sharing in the fullness of papal power and succeeding the apostolic college. However, canonists generally insisted that most of their rights were derived from the pope even when the Roman See was vacant.[3]

Increasingly, from the late eleventh century, one notes the development of consistories, or meetings of the cardinals, during which the pope consulted them on various spiritual and temporal issues, e.g., choice of bishops, sending of papal legates, etc.

The cardinals' prestige was further enhanced because of their missions as papal legates, their receiving broad powers, and their participating in papal ceremonies. A significant development was the naming of abbots and residential bishops from outside Rome as cardinals. They enjoyed a certain precedence over other hierarchs including patriarchs.

Reforms of the College of Cardinals

Sixtus V (1585–1590) significantly reformed the college of cardinals. He fixed its number at seventy (see CIC 231, §1), specified various requirements to improve the quality of its members, and strove to internationalize it. Sixtus also reformed the Roman Curia, placing cardinals at the head of its fifteen congregations. Their importance was increasingly linked to this role, and the aforementioned consistories accordingly were much less influential than they had been from the twelfth to the sixteenth centuries.

The next significant change in the college of cardinals occurred only in the 1960s and 1970s although it was not discussed at Vatican II. Besides increasing the number of cardinals, John XXIII decreed that they all should be ordained bishops.[4] Paul VI reorganized the college's internal structure and imposed certain age restrictions.

[4] John XXIII, mp Cum gravissima, April 15, 1962, CLD 5, 273–274.

For example, cardinals at seventy-five years of age were obliged to resign from the various Roman curial dicasteries and other institutions which they headed. Furthermore, at eighty years of age they lost their offices in the Curia and in Vatican City and could no longer elect the pope.[5]

The 1983 code reflects many of these reforms, although it does not explicitly restate the age limit on papal electors, which is still operative. The code situates the cardinals between the synod of bishops (cc. 342–348) and the Roman Curia (cc. 360–361); all of these institutes can be understood properly only in light of special law governing them.

The code clarifies certain basic issues regarding membership in and the functioning of the college of cardinals. However, it generally leaves the details of its inner operations to its statutes or special law, contained particularly in contemporary papal documents mentioned in this commentary. This law retains its force unless it specifically contradicts the code. Frankly, it is not always clear why certain issues are treated in the code and not in special law, e.g., movement within cardinalatial ranks (c. 350, §§5–6).

The canons describe the notion and basic role of the college of cardinals, its triple ranks, certain movements from one rank to another, the creation of cardinals, the organization of the college (e.g., dean), resignation from curial leadership positions, and the cooperative relationship of cardinals with the pope.

The aforementioned changes in the status of cardinals are basically reaffirmed in post-1983 code documents of John Paul II such as the 1988 apostolic constitution Pastor bonus (Roman Curia reform) and the 1996 apostolic constitution Universi Dominici gregis (papal election).

College of Cardinals: Notion and Purpose

Canon 349 — The cardinals of the Holy Roman Church constitute a special college which provides for the election of the Roman Pontiff according to the norm of special law. The cardinals assist the Roman Pontiff either collegially when they are convoked to deal with questions of major importance, or individually when they help the Roman Pontiff through the various offices they perform, especially in the daily care of the universal Church.

This introductory constitutional canon describes the notion and three major functions of the college of cardinals. First of all (although Paul VI had considered possibly including certain members of the council of the synod in the papal electoral college),[6] the cardinals are exclusively competent to elect the pope according to special law.[7] Furthermore, they fulfill an interim governance role for the universal Church and Vatican City when the Apostolic See is vacant (see cc. 359, 335). In its own way the college of cardinals is both Roman and universal in character because of its ties (at least titular) to the various Roman churches and the fact that cardinals are chosen from around the world.

The cardinals also constitute a special advisory body that the pope consults regularly on significant ecclesial issues. Finally, they individually assist the pope in various ways, especially by heading special curial offices for universal church governance. This chapter explicates certain implications of the earlier cryptic reference to the cardinals' assisting the pope in various ways (c. 334).

Canon 349 modifies the 1917 code (CIC 230) in light of various contemporary motu proprios.

Foster, "The Election of the Roman Pontiff: An Examination of Canon 332, §1 and Recent Special Legislation," J 56 (1996) 691–705; E. Williamson, "The Apostolic Constitution Universi Dominici gregis," CLSGBIN no. 109 (March 1997) 95–104; Reese, 74–105. The code does not include all the significant provisions of such special law, e.g., the limitation of the electoral college to 120 members (Universi, introduction).

The former code spoke only generically of the cardinals as papal counselors and assistants. The present code describes their functions more precisely. It refers to them as a "special college" rather than as the "senate of the Roman Pontiff," and especially mentions their responsibility to elect the pope.

The use of the term "college" rather than "senate" is noteworthy. In the Middle Ages some viewed the college of cardinals as succeeding not only the apostolic college, precisely as a college, but also the ancient Roman Senate in governing Rome, the Papal States, and the universal Church.[8] However, the revised code replaces this secular analogue with language which is more ecclesial than civil.

The phrase "college of cardinals" means a specific juridic collegial body, which functions under the leadership of the dean (c. 352, §1) according to the law on public collegiate juridic persons (cc. 115, §2; 116, §1). The cardinals assist the Roman Pontiff collegially by advising him on major ecclesial issues and individually by sharing in the daily care of the universal Church, e.g., service as papal legates (c. 358).

Cardinals advise the pope collegially especially in consistories (c. 353) and other general meetings, which John Paul II has convoked more frequently to revitalize the institution. Unlike the synod of bishops, which performs its generally consultative function on a temporary and occasional basis, the college of cardinals is available for such a role on a somewhat more permanent and ongoing basis.[9] The cardinals also head various curial offices or serve as members of various curial congregations for five-year terms (PB 5, 1) even if they primarily govern a particular church elsewhere in the world.

[8] C. Lefebvre, "Les origines et la rôle du cardinalat au moyen âge," Apol 41 (1968) 59–70.

[9] Interestingly enough, it is not only the whole college of cardinals that performs such a collegial consultative function. A papally appointed board of fifteen cardinals advises the pope on economic and organic matters pertaining to the administration of the Holy See (PB 24–25).

Ranks

Canon 350 — §1. The college of cardinals is divided into three orders: the episcopal order, to which belong cardinals to whom the Roman Pontiff assigns title of a suburbicarian church and Eastern patriarchs who have been brought into the college of cardinals; the presbyteral order; and the diaconal order.

§2. The Roman Pontiff assigns each of the cardinals of the presbyteral or diaconal orders his own title or diaconia in Rome.

§3. Eastern patriarchs who have been made members of the college of cardinals have their own patriarchal see as a title.

§4. The cardinal dean holds as his title the Diocese of Ostia together with the other church he already has as a title.

§5. Through a choice made in consistory and approved by the Supreme Pontiff and with priority of order and promotion observed, cardinals from the presbyteral order can transfer to another title, and cardinals from the diaconal order to another diaconia and if they have been in the diaconal order for ten full years, even to the presbyteral order.

§6. A cardinal transferring through choice from the diaconal order to the presbyteral order takes precedence over all those cardinal presbyters who were brought into the cardinalate after him.

Canon 351 on eligibility to be a cardinal, the exclusive papal choice of cardinals, and the mode of announcing such a choice presumably should have preceded this canon on the organization of the college of cardinals. However, such is not the case.

Although all cardinals are to be bishops (unless dispensed) and hence are basically equal (c. 351, §1), they are ranked within the college of cardinals in terms of the three clerical ranks of bishop, presbyter, and deacon. This division reflects the college's historical roots in the Roman presbyterate,[10] a purely formal relationship without juridical implications. Rather than reflecting a true communion of ministerial orders, which was true when the college contained bishops, priests, and deacons, the present organization more notably expresses episcopal collegiality.

[10] See introductory historical material at the beginning of this chapter. During the code revision process John Paul

Cardinal presbyters or deacons may opt to change the church or diaconia to which they are assigned, and the latter may move from the rank of deacon to that of presbyter. They are to do so in consistory (c. 353) and such a change requires papal approval. Considerations of seniority in terms of ordination and promotion to the college are especially relevant here. This is probably the only instance in the code of one's acquiring a right by declaration with papal approval.

This canon reflects former provisions on the organization of the college and possible options within it (CIC 231, 236), as modified by John XXIII[11] and Paul VI.[12]

There are two types of cardinal bishops: those appointed by the pope to one of the seven suburbicarian dioceses surrounding Rome and Eastern patriarchs named to the college. Some have questioned whether patriarchs ought to belong to such a quintessentially Roman institution. However, they keep the title of their patriarchal church, giving some indication of their special status within the college and embodying a concern to respond to such criticism. Furthermore, they do not vote for the cardinal dean (c. 352, §2).

Seven suburbicarian sees surround Rome: Albano, Ostia, Porto and Santa Rufina, Palestrina, Sabina and Mentana, Frascati, and Velletri. Cardinal bishops are appointed to six of these; in addition to his titular see, the cardinal dean holds title to the see of Ostia (c. 350, §4). Interestingly enough, the honorary title gives the cardinal no legal-pastoral authority over the suburbicarian see (c. 357, §1); rather, another bishop provides pastoral care for its people.[13]

Since the 1961 motu proprio Ad suburbicarias dioceses of John XXIII, cardinal presbyters may not opt to become cardinal bishops, who are named solely by the pope.

Cardinal presbyters are assigned one of the tituli (titular churches) in Rome; this is perhaps the clearest symbol of the college's historic tie to the Roman church. In consistory cardinal presbyters can later opt to change to a vacant title with papal approval. Like cardinal bishops, cardinal presbyters have no legal-pastoral authority in their titular church (c. 357, §1), but they are expected to support it financially.[14] The largest number of cardinals are cardinal presbyters, and this number has varied most significantly throughout history.

Cardinal deacons are assigned one of the diaconiae or aid stations that used to be staffed by deacons in early medieval Rome. Their relationship to the church is the same as that of the other cardinals (c. 357, §1). Cardinal deacons are curial officials and prior to 1965 were often not bishops. In consistory and with papal approval they can change the diaconia to which they are assigned; and, after ten years as a cardinal deacon, they may become cardinal presbyters. If they do so, they outrank cardinal presbyters who were named after the former were named cardinal deacons.

While the number of cardinals has varied historically, the former code, like Sixtus V (1586), fixed their number at seventy: six bishops, fifty presbyters, and fourteen deacons (CIC 231, §1). However, since John XXIII there has been no maximum number, although since Paul VI only 120 may vote in the papal election. Presumably this figure sufficiently represents the Church's universality in such a central decisional process.[15]

II rejected a proposal to drop this traditional threefold distinction because of its contemporary inappropriateness despite its historic origins. See Comm 14 (1982) 182.

Creation of Cardinals

Canon 351 — §1. The Roman Pontiff freely selects men to be promoted as cardinals, who have been ordained at least into the order of the presbyterate and are especially outstanding in doctrine, morals, piety, and prudence in action; those who are not yet bishops must receive episcopal consecration.

§2. Cardinals are created by a decree of the Roman Pontiff which is made public in the presence of the college of cardinals. From the moment of the announcement they are bound by the duties and possess the rights defined by law.

§3. When the Roman Pontiff has announced the selection of a person to the dignity of cardinal but reserves the name of the person in pectore, the one promoted is not bound in the meantime by any of the duties of cardinals nor does he possess any of their rights. After the Roman Pontiff has made his name public, however, he is bound by the same duties and possesses the same rights; he possesses the right of precedence, though, from the day of reservation in pectore.

Cardinals are freely chosen by the pope without any juridic claims by states or particular episcopal sees. Prescinding from whatever consultation actually occurs, the pope is not required to consult any group or individual. Nor, as noted above, is there any fixed number of cardinals.

The canon simplifies the former code (CIC 232–233) and reflects John XXIII's motu proprio Cum gravissima.[16]

The qualifications of cardinals are stated broadly (§1). The 1917 code contained more detailed requirements, such as the exclusion of those not of legitimate birth or subject to various irregularities (CIC 232, §2). These requirements reflected efforts to address difficulties prompted by the unwarranted influence of members of the college or secular authorities.

To be eligible one must be at least a priest and characterized by outstanding doctrinal gifts, moral character, and practical administrative and pastoral experience. This latter point is particularly significant given the college's important consultative role. Furthermore, since the time of John XXIII, cardinals are generally to be bishops; hence the qualifications for bishops also seem pertinent. For example, one must be at least thirty-five years old, five years ordained, and expert in the sacred sciences even if lacking a doctorate or a licentiate (c. 378, §1). Occasionally the pope dispenses from such qualifications; for example, certain cardinals have been dispensed from becoming bishops, e.g., theologians Hans Urs von Balthasar, Yves Congar, Henri de Lubac. Interestingly enough, today such cardinal presbyters would not automatically have a deliberative vote at an ecumenical council as was the case in the 1917 code (c. 339, §1; CIC 223, §1, 1°).

The choice of cardinals seems to reflect a concern for a body representative of both older established churches and younger churches. Among those named cardinals one notes especially heads of prominent sees such as New York or Paris, significant curial officials, and those who have served in the Vatican diplomatic corps. Certain Eastern patriarchs may also be named cardinals.

The pope formally announces the new cardinals in a consistory with the existing members of the college of cardinals (§2). Occasionally he may withhold the name of one selected for the college, keeping it in his heart (in pectore), perhaps because of Church-State conflicts rendering such an announcement inappropriate at a given time (§3).

Such an announcement of new cardinals takes place in a secret consistory. This reflects the time when the college served as the papal court and appointments to the cardinalatial dignity were subject to debate and required the consent of the col-to Universi. According to the 1997 Annuario Pontificio there were 6 cardinal bishops, 128 cardinal priests, and 17 cardinal deacons, making a total of 151 cardinals. However, on January 18, 1998 John Paul II named 22 new cardinals, temporarily waiving the papal elector limit of 120 since there were then 123 potential electors. See Origins 27/32 (January 29, 1998) 530.

lege. Today this is more of a formality. The subsequent formal public consistory involves conferring the ring and the biretta and assigning a titular church or diaconia.

From the moment of the aforementioned announcement, the new cardinals enjoy the full rights of cardinals, including that of electing the pope. They also assume various obligations specified in the code (e.g., cc. 354; 356) and in special law. Those whose names are not published, however, neither possess cardinalatial rights nor are bound by their duties. If the pope dies without revealing their names, the appointment ceases. If, however, he later reveals their names, those cardinals enjoy the rights of precedence as if their names had been published on the date the appointment in pectore was announced.

The code no longer lists in detail here various obligations and privileges of cardinals (CIC 234–235, 239).[17] However, certain prerogatives of cardinals in the code might be mentioned. They are personally exempt from the jurisdiction of local bishops (c. 357, §2). They have the unrestricted faculty to hear confessions everywhere in the world (c. 967, §1). They may be buried in their church (c. 1242). The pope alone may judge them in formal processes (c. 1405, §1, 2°), and they may choose the place where they testify in such processes (c. 1558, §2).

Dean of the College

Canon 352 — §1. The dean presides over the college of cardinals; if he is impeded, the assistant dean takes his place. Neither the dean nor the assistant dean possesses any power of governance over the other cardinals but is considered as first among equals.

§2. When the office of dean is vacant, the cardinals who possess title to a suburbicarian church and they alone are to elect one from their own group who is to act as dean of the college; the assistant dean, if he is present, or else the oldest among them, presides at this election. They are to submit the name of the person elected to the Roman Pontiff who is competent to approve him.

§3. The assistant dean is elected in the same manner as that described in §2, with the dean himself presiding. The Roman Pontiff is also competent to approve the election of the assistant dean.

§4. If the dean and assistant dean do not have a domicile in Rome, they are to acquire one there.

As a collegial juridic person (c. 115, §2) the college of cardinals has its own officials. Chief among these are the dean and assistant dean, whose election is provided for in this canon, which revises the former law (CIC 237).

Paul VI[18] changed the former provision whereby the dean was automatically the cardinal who had been cardinal bishop the longest. Now the selection is by vote, but the vote and the candidates are restricted to the cardinals who have a title to a suburbicarian diocese without any other restrictions. Hence the cardinals who are patriarchs may not vote in such an election or be elected dean. The election must be approved by the pope. The same provisions govern the election of the assistant dean.

Thereafter the dean and assistant dean must reside in Rome, the seat of the college as a juridic person. Such residence should facilitate their discharging various functions in the college of cardinals—with the dean serving as first among equals without any juridic power over his peers. The dean ex officio holds title to the see of Ostia as well as his other titular see (c. 350, §4).

Besides carrying out the various internal functions within the college that are governed by its own norms, the dean has several key responsibilities when the Apostolic See is vacant.[19] For example, he convenes the general congregations, or regular meetings of the cardinals, prior to the conclave that elects the new pope (Universi 9) and sends the official notice to all the cardinals to come to the conclave (Universi 19). If he is not over eighty years old himself, he also chairs the conclave (e.g., Universi 53, 87). Otherwise the assistant dean takes his place in the conclave. If he, too, is over eighty, then the cardinal elector who is first in rank and age takes their place. If the dean is in the conclave, he has the right to consecrate the newly elected pope if the one elected is not already a bishop (c. 355, §1).

Consistories[20]

Canon 353 — §1. The cardinals especially assist the supreme pastor of the Church through collegial action in consistories in which they are gathered by order of the Roman Pontiff who presides. Consistories are either ordinary or extraordinary.

§2. For an ordinary consistory, all the cardinals, at least those present in Rome, are called together to be consulted concerning certain grave matters which occur rather frequently or to carry out certain very solemn acts.

§3. For an extraordinary consistory, which is celebrated when particular needs of the Church or the treatment of more grave affairs suggests it, all the cardinals are called together.

§4. Only the ordinary consistory in which some solemnities are celebrated can be public, that is, when prelates, representatives of civil societies, and others who have been invited to it are admitted in addition to the cardinals.

This canon deals with a significant way in which the cardinals assist the pope collegially in governing the universal Church, i.e., through various consistories. A consistory is a formal gathering of the college of cardinals, chaired by the pope, which has a couple of forms, i.e., ordinary (generally secret but sometimes public) and extraordinary. The topics addressed by such consistories have been determined by tradition, changing pastoral practice, and the college's internal regulations.

Originally the papal consistory was a meeting characterized by open discussion between the pope and the cardinals. However, such consistories gradually became highly formalized events like European royal court ceremonies and served more of a ceremonial than a genuinely consultative purpose.

The 1917 code did not describe consistories. This new canon may reflect an effort to revitalize a consultative institution whose functioning had become somewhat pro forma over the years. Although the synods of bishops frequently address noteworthy ecclesial issues, John Paul II has increasingly consulted the college of cardinals on diverse matters of universal church governance. Actually, the precise rationale for the pope's consulting the synod on certain issues and consistories of cardinals on others is not entirely clear.

The new organization of consistories envisions both ordinary and extraordinary sessions, although there is not always an appreciable difference between the two.

Ordinary consistories deal with serious but regularly recurring issues or carry out certain more solemn acts, e.g., creation of new cardinals or canonization of saints. At least all the cardinals resident in Rome must be invited to be present for such a consistory.

Extraordinary consistories are held when the special pastoral, organizational, and governmental needs of the Church suggest it, e.g., Roman Curia reform or Vatican finances. Or, on occasion, it may be necessary to deal with more serious and pressing affairs. John Paul II has held such consistories more frequently than his immediate predecessors.[21] All the cardinals are to be called to an extraordinary consistory, even those living outside Rome (PB 23).

[19] For a somewhat more detailed treatment of the role of the dean and other officials such as the cardinal camerlengo (chamberlain) of the Roman church and the cardinal camerlengo (chamberlain) of the college of cardinals, see Arrieta, 290–293.

Normally a consistory is held in secret although the press, various civil and ecclesiastical dignitaries, and the public at large can be invited to certain ordinary consistories, e.g., those involving canonizations, the conferral of the pallium,[22] or the public celebration of the creation of new cardinals.

Resignation from Curial Offices

Canon 354 — The cardinals who preside over dicasteries and other permanent institutes of the Roman Curia and Vatican City and who have completed the seventy-fifth year of age are asked to submit their resignation from office to the Roman Pontiff who will see to the matter after considering the circumstances.

This canon does not concern resignation from the college of cardinals.[23] Rather it states that cardinals presiding over curial dicasteries and other permanent institutions are subject to the regulations that apply to other curial officers concerning resignation at age seventy-five (PB 5, 2).

The code treats this issue in a manner comparable to that of the resignation of bishops (cc. 401, 411) and pastors (c. 538, §3) at age seventy-five. Such officials are requested to submit their resignation; however, they do not automatically lose their office because an age limit has been reached (c. 184, §1). Furthermore, they actually lose their office only after the competent authority (i.e., the pope vis-à-vis cardinals) communicates it in writing (c. 186, §1). The competent authority is also to see to the provision of appropriate support for the retiree (c. 281).

This innovation was introduced by Paul VI in the motu proprio Ingravescentem aetatem.[24] That document also prescribed that when cardinals reach the age of eighty, they automatically cease being members of curial congregations (PB 5, 2) and can no longer be electors for a new pope (Universi 33). Aging cardinals would presumably be unduly burdened by such weighty deliberations although they may participate in pre-conclave discussions (Universi, Introduction). The code commission debated this matter at some length during the 1981 plenary session and finally decided not to include this latter provision in the code but to leave it to the special law on cardinals.[25] Again one wonders why certain provisions on cardinals are placed in the code and others in special law.

Functions of Cardinal Dean/ Senior Cardinal Deacon

Canon 355 — §1. The cardinal dean is competent to ordain as a bishop the one elected as Roman Pontiff if he needs to be ordained; if the dean is impeded, the assistant dean has the same right, and if he is impeded, the oldest cardinal from the episcopal order.

§2. The senior cardinal deacon announces the name of the newly elected Supreme Pontiff to the people; likewise, in the place of the Roman Pontiff, he places the pallium upon metropolitans or hands it over to their proxies.

The college of cardinals has a special relationship with the pope. The next five canons (cc. 355–359) spell out certain aspects of this relationship regarding the election of the pope, personal [21] Reese identifies six such extraordinary consistories, the first being held in November 1979 and the most recent in June 1994. They have considered such issues as Roman Curia reform, Vatican finances, the reform of the code, threats to human life, the emergence of sects, and preparation for the millennium (Reese, 71).

[22] See the commentary on c. 437.

[23] The code does not address the issue of one's ceasing to be a cardinal, but Universi 36 on papal electors mentions the exclusion of cardinals who have been canonically deposed (presumably dismissed from the clerical state) or whose resignation as cardinals has been accepted by the pope.

[25] Plen, 374–376.

contact with him, special missions the cardinals perform on his behalf, and their role when the Apostolic See is vacant. In light of this relationship, cardinals also enjoy a special personal exemption from the jurisdiction of local bishops.

These canons simplify the 1917 code (CIC 239, §§2 and 3; 240; and 241) in light of motu proprios of John XXIII[26] and Paul VI.[27]

Canon 355 restates the ancient privilege of the dean of the college to consecrate the one elected pope if he is not already a bishop; it also provides for the situation where the dean may be impeded from doing so (§1; Universi 88–90). The canon also affirms that the senior cardinal deacon has the privilege of announcing the election of a pope (§2; Universi 89). Furthermore, in the pope's absence the senior cardinal deacon bestows the pallium on metropolitans, or archbishops who head an ecclesiastical province (cc. 435–438), or gives it to their proxies. This ritual symbolizes the communion between the Roman See and ecclesiastical provinces around the world (see c. 437).

Cooperation of Cardinals with Pope

Canon 356 — Cardinals are obliged to cooperate assiduously with the Roman Pontiff; therefore, cardinals who exercise any office in the curia and who are not diocesan bishops are obliged to reside in Rome. Cardinals who have the care of some diocese as the diocesan bishop are to go to Rome whenever the Roman Pontiff calls them.

Cardinals are to share the pope's solicitude for the universal Church in various ways, collegial and individual. While canon 353 on consistories focuses on collegial assistance, this canon seems to emphasize individual cooperation with the pope. To assure that cardinals may "cooperate assiduously" with him, they have been traditionally required to reside in Rome unless they are diocesan bishops elsewhere. However, even such bishops formerly had to obtain the pope's permission to leave Rome when they came to the city (CIC 238).

That provision is now somewhat revised, and the present canon expresses a concern to revitalize the college and ensure cardinals' availability to assist the pope. Cardinals exercising a curial office who are not diocesan bishops must reside in Rome; however, retired curial cardinals are not so obliged. Furthermore, cardinals who are diocesan bishops do not have the same obligation, given their primary duty to reside in their dioceses (c. 395). However, they must come to Rome whenever the pope calls them, be it for a consistory or for curial service. Indeed, the assignment of titular churches symbolizes their ongoing tie to the church of Rome, although the former legal fiction that they are part of the Roman clergy is no longer operative.

Relationship to Titular Church/ Personal Exemption

Canon 357 — §1. The cardinals who have been assigned title to a suburbicarian church or a church in Rome are to promote the good of these dioceses or churches by counsel and patronage after they have taken possession of them. Nevertheless, they possess no power of governance over them nor are they to intervene in any way in those matters which pertain to the administration of their goods, their discipline, or the service of the churches.

§2. In those matters which pertain to their own person, cardinals living outside of Rome and outside their own diocese are exempt from the power of governance of the bishop of the diocese in which they are residing.

Unlike the former code (CIC 240), the current code stipulates that cardinals have no pastoral jurisdiction, spiritual or temporal, in their titular churches in Rome or in the suburbicarian dioceses. In fact, despite certain honorary prerogatives, they are explicitly prohibited from interfering in the governance of such churches, which is the prerogative of the competent authority, e.g., the cardinal vicar of Rome. However, their titular relationship requires that they foster the well-being of such churches after formally taking possession of them (§1).

Given the significant ecclesial role of cardinals, when they are outside Rome and outside their own dioceses if they are diocesan bishops, they are personally exempt from the local episcopal authority (§2). This exemption is not as broad as the liturgical privileges that cardinals formerly enjoyed (CIC 239, §1), although some of those privileges are now part of the expanded competency of diocesan bishops. The exemption corresponds more to the general norm that pastoral activities in a diocese are always subject to the diocesan bishop although some persons may be exempt from his authority in their personal lives. For example, members of religious institutes enjoy an appropriate autonomy of life (c. 586, §1) while still being subject to the diocesan bishop in certain pastoral, liturgical, and educational matters (c. 678, §1).

Special Missions for the Pope

Canon 358 — A cardinal to whom the Roman Pontiff entrusts the function of representing him in some solemn celebration or among some group of persons as a legatus a latere, that is, as his alter ego, as well as one to whom the Roman Pontiff entrusts the fulfillment of a certain pastoral function as his special envoy (missus specialis) has competence only over those things which the Roman Pontiff commits to him.

In addition to relying on the regular and stable service of pontifical legates, who are treated in canons 362–367, the pope often entrusts special temporary missions to individual cardinals. The former code addressed this matter, perhaps more logically, in the chapter on such legates (CIC 266).

Canon 358 specifies two types of missions, only the first of which was in the former code. One is more ceremonial in nature (legatus a latere, literally, a legate from the side [of the pope], or his alter ego), e.g., a cardinal representing the pope at a eucharistic congress. The other is more pastoral in nature (missus specialis, or one especially sent), e.g., a cardinal representing the pope in a situation such as that in Bosnia, where political conflict jeopardizes the Church's task of evangelization. Both types of envoys enjoy only the authority granted them by the pope for the given task.

Vacancy of Apostolic See

Canon 359 — When the Apostolic See is vacant, the college of cardinals possesses only that power in the Church which is attributed to it in special law.

During the vacancy of the Apostolic See, the college of cardinals has a special role in ensuring a certain continuity in universal church governance (see c. 335). It exercises this temporary governance role in accord with special law, e.g., especially the 1996 apostolic constitution Universi Dominici gregis.

Given the general prohibition of any innovations during a vacant see (cc. 335; 428, §1), the role of the college is a limited one, and it must strictly comply with the special law governing that situation.[28] Neither the college of bishops nor the college of cardinals possesses primatial power at this time.

The cardinals have no power regarding matters within the exclusive competence of the pope during his lifetime. Rather, they are limited to dealing with ordinary ecclesiastical business, treating non-deferrable matters, and preparing for the conclave.

[28] See Universi 1–32 on the vacancy of the Holy See. Norms 1–6 govern the competence of the college of cardinals. Norms 7–13 regulate the composition and specific functions of pre-conclave congregations, or meetings, of cardinals. Norms 14–26 provide for the functioning of certain necessary curial offices, e.g., that of the cardinal chamberlain of the holy Roman church, who handles various practical details related to the death and funeral of the pope and safeguards and administers the goods and temporal rights of the Holy See. These norms also provide for the exercise of certain faculties by the curial dicasteries (e.g., congregations, councils, tribunals, offices, etc.—PB 2) during the vacancy. Norms 27–32 deal with the deceased pope.

They may not change the papal election norms or any other papal norms. They may not make decisions binding a future pope. They are not to prejudice the rights of the Apostolic See or the diocese of Rome. They are competent, however, to resolve questions about the meaning of Universi Dominici gregis by majority vote. They may also decide by majority vote matters viewed as urgent by the majority (c. 119, 2°). They also possess all the civil power of the pope concerning the government of Vatican City State, yet they can issue pertinent decrees only in emergency situations.

CHAPTER IV
THE ROMAN CURIA
[cc. 360–361]

Canon 360 — The Supreme Pontiff usually conducts the affairs of the universal Church through the Roman Curia which performs its function in his name and by his authority for the good and service of the churches. The Roman Curia consists of the Secretariat of State or the Papal Secretariat, the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church, congregations, tribunals, and other institutes; the constitution and competence of all these are defined in special law.

Canon 361 — In this Code, the term Apostolic See or Holy See refers not only to the Roman Pontiff but also to the Secretariat of State, the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church, and other institutes of the Roman Curia, unless it is otherwise apparent from the nature of the matter or the context of the words.

Introduction

Significant officeholders often need the assistance of others in discharging their responsibilities. There is and has been great diversity in the ways of rendering such assistance. The matter may be left to the officeholder's discretion, but more often the law specifies detailed supportive structures in order to foster the common good.

Despite the Church's primarily supernatural dimension, its distinctly human character makes it subject to human variables in carrying out its mission in space and time. The bishops as successors of the apostles continue Christ's threefold mission in collaboration with others, e.g., the diocesan curia (cc. 469–494).

This is also true for the pope who, as bishop of Rome and successor of Peter, has distinctive spiritual and temporal responsibilities. In discharging their expanding responsibilities, popes have increasingly required the collaboration of others, which has been gradually systematized historically on a permanent and stable basis in the Roman Curia (henceforth Curia).

The 1917 code treated the Curia's structure and competency in some detail while not mentioning its purpose (CIC 242–264). However, canons 360–361 sketch only its basic nature, purpose, and structure while most details are left to special law. According to canon 360, which has no Eastern code counterpart, the Curia is an instrument enabling the pope to deal with various issues affecting the universal Church.

The Curia is expected to serve the good of the particular churches (c. 368);[29] it acts in the pope's name and by his authority. When the code was promulgated in 1983, the Curia essentially encompassed the Secretariat of State, the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church, the congregations, tribunals, and other institutes (c. 360). However, the code's terminology here needs to be updated slightly in light of post-1983 code curial developments, especially the 1988 apostolic constitution of John Paul II, Pastor bonus.[30] The Curia's rich and varied history, its successes and failures reflect various reform efforts with successive curial forms embryonically contained in their predecessors.

It is important to have some understanding of the Curia's history and operations. Hence this introduction briefly discusses that history, especially during the twentieth century. The bulk of this commentary will briefly describe the various curial dicasteries in light of the 1983 code, but especially in terms of Pastor bonus. Occasional reference will be made to the 1992 Regolamento governing the operation of the curial dicasteries.[31]

History of the Curia[32]

The basic curial structure today can be traced to the following popes:

(a) Sixtus V: January 22, 1588 constitution Immensa aeterni Dei.
(b) Pius X: June 29, 1908 constitution Sapienti consilio.
(c) Paul VI: August 15, 1967 constitution Regimini.
(d) John Paul II: June 28, 1988 constitution Pastor bonus.

After a few words about the first three constitutions, we will briefly note the significant theological-juridical principles underlying Pastor bonus, some of its key organizational norms, and certain details about the individual curial dicasteries and comparable institutions.

a. Sixtus V: Immensa aeterni Dei (1588)

Sixtus did not create the Curia, since there was a pre-existing complex of papal collaborators in liturgical, administrative, and judicial matters somewhat comparable to the imperial court. Such collaborators (particularly cardinals) aided the pope in governing the diocese of Rome and the universal Church, especially as church governance became increasingly centralized during the second millennium.

Sixtus V systematized the work of the various congregations of cardinals which operated permanently or temporarily in a fragmentary or partial fashion. Besides setting up a "college of cardinals," he created smaller "colleges" to deal with specific issues. To cope with the burdens of his office, he sought the assistance of others and carefully delineated their responsibilities.

[32] For a slightly more detailed curial history see J. Provost, in CLSA Com, 292–294. For a rather extensive history, see N. del Re, La Curia Romana: Lineamenti storico-giuridici, 3rd rev. ed. (Rome: Ed. di Storia e Letteratura, 1970). See also J. Sanchez y Sanchez, "La Curia Romana hasta Pablo VI," REDC 32 (1976) 439–458; A. Stickler, "Le riforme della Curia nella storia della Chiesa," in La Curia Romana, 1–15.

b. Pius X: Sapienti consilio (1908)

Despite certain curial developments after Sixtus, the next significant curial reform did not occur for three centuries. The curial reorganization of Pius X was largely incorporated in the 1917 code. Despite the historical organizational variables, there was one constant factor: the Curia was a complex of dicasteries aiding the pope in governing the universal Church. Furthermore, the Curia encompassed congregations (CIC 246–257), tribunals (CIC 258–259), and offices (CIC 260–264).

c. Paul VI: Regimini (1967)

Ecclesial changes influenced especially by two world wars and the experience of Vatican II prompted further curial reform. For example, there had been a significant conciliar critique of the Curia, especially in light of the emerging themes of collegiality, the enhanced role of the laity, and the Curia's mission to serve the bishops, the particular churches, and the universal Church. Papal and collegial power needed to be integrated better in an era of more decentralized governance structures (CD 9).

In Regimini Paul VI basically maintained the traditional curial structure of congregations, tribunals, and offices but also dropped certain older entities and added secretariats. He defined more clearly curial competencies and procedures and facilitated the coordination of the various dicasteries. He appointed certain diocesan bishops to curial positions to internationalize the Curia and specified five-year terms and age limits for key curialists. The Secretariat of State and the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church assumed especially significant roles.

Regimini was the basis for John Paul II's distinctive curial reorganization initiatives, which ultimately led to the promulgation of Pastor bonus in 1988. A key feature of Pastor bonus was its effort to offer a theological-juridical rationale for the Curia within the context of the communion of churches and episcopal collegiality.[33] Such a rationale preceded the detailed organizational norms.

d. Theological and Juridical Principles in Pastor bonus

Whatever may be the historic and continuing tensions between the particular churches and the Curia, Pastor bonus highlights its pastoral character rooted in the ecclesial service calling of Peter and his successors.

The pope's primatial office entails service of the universal Church, the particular churches, and the individual faithful. His task is especially to foster the unity of the diverse ministerial functions in the Church.

The Curia is not a divine law reality like the papacy but rather an ecclesiastical law response to the varying requirements of the Petrine ministry. The Curia is ideally both pastoral and ministerial in character; it is not of the essence of the Church but it has a profoundly ecclesial character.

The Petrine ministry is to serve the college of bishops and individual bishops in building up the Church as a communion of the faithful with God and among themselves. The reciprocal communion of and communication between pope and bishops is extremely important in fostering unity of faith, sacramental life, and discipline (c. 205).

While the Curia is evidently closely linked to the pope, it should also be viewed ideally as linked to all bishops. Its being composed significantly of cardinals and bishops bespeaks a certain "collegial" character although not in the proper sense of the term.

[33] For a thoughtful critique of Pastor bonus given its own stated goals and the curial reform expectations of the conciliar fathers, canonists, and the 1969 synod, see J. Provost, "Pastor bonus: Reflections on the Reorganization of the Roman Curia," J 48 (1988) 499–535. Space does not permit a proper examination of contemporary concerns about the exercise of papal primacy and functioning of the Curia. However, several non-canonical sources seem worth citing in this connection. See Reese, 270–283; M. Buckley, Papal Primacy and the Episcopate (New York: Crossroad, 1998); P. Zagano and T. Tilley, eds., The Exercise of the Primacy: Continuing the Dialogue (New York: Crossroad, 1998).

The Curia also expresses the solicitude of bishops vis-à-vis the universal Church; this solicitude is shared with the pope and depends on him. While fostering ecclesial unity in service of the pope, the Curia is also to protect legitimate diversity in the various particular churches.

Pastor bonus highlights the significance of the quinquennial ad limina visits of bishops to the pope (c. 400), which enable them mutually to address various pressing pastoral problems. These visits may help greatly to foster church unity and serve the values of catholicity and collegiality. Proper preparation for such visits includes the timely forwarding to the Curia of the corresponding quinquennial reports (c. 399).

The Curia exercises vicarious papal power in virtue of its essential and foundational relationship with the pope (cf. c. 334 implicitly). It is called to express his will in fostering the good of the particular churches and serving their bishops. Such a subsidiary and subordinate relationship to the pope gives the Curia its distinctive authority but also limits its prerogatives.

The Petrine primacy and the Roman episcopate pertain to the office of the pope and are institutionally differentiated in the complex reality of the Apostolic See. The diocese of Rome is governed by the pope not precisely in virtue of canonical mission but in virtue of the fullness of his power as successor of Peter and head of the episcopal college (cf. c. 332 on papal election).

Canon 361 does not strictly identify the Apostolic See and the Curia. The Apostolic See as identified with the office of the primacy is indeed a moral person in virtue of divine law and independent from the State (c. 113, §1). However, the Curia is an historically-conditioned institute of ecclesiastical law. It is to be clearly distinguished from the papal office from which it derives and from which it differs in terms of the nature and extent of its authority.

Although canon 361 must be updated slightly in light of the terminology of Pastor bonus,[34] the canon provides a useful rule of canonical interpretation. Hence it might be situated more appropriately in Book I on general norms as it was formerly (CIC 7). The canon clarifies the meaning of the frequently used terms "Apostolic See"[35] or "Holy See"[36] in the code. Unless they clearly mean the pope (e.g., c. 340 on the vacancy of the Apostolic See), then they include the various curial dicasteries and other institutes.

Certain practical principles highlighted in Pastor bonus may help one evaluate the adequacy of contemporary curial reforms:

- The Curia is to be reformed in light of contemporary pastoral exigencies in continuity with Vatican II and Regimini.
- The legal renewal exemplified in the 1983 code[37] is to be duly implemented. However, curial activities are also regulated by special law (e.g., PB) and the special rules governing the individual dicasteries.
- Curial organisms are to be better adapted to their various governmental and pastoral purposes.
- Collaboration (e.g., communication in preparing documents) among the dicasteries is imperative.

[34] In identifying the Curia, c. 361 speaks of the "Secretariat of State, the Council for the Public Affairs of the Church, and other institutes of the Roman Curia." However, PB 1 speaks simply of the Curia as a "complex of dicasteries and institutes." Furthermore, PB 2, §1 indicates that the term "dicasteries" means the "Secretariat of State, Congregations, Tribunals, Councils and Offices, namely the Apostolic Camera, the Administration of the Patrimony of the Apostolic See, and the Prefecture for the Economic Affairs of the Holy See." The Council for the Public Affairs of the Church no longer exists as such; its functions are fulfilled by the second section of the Secretariat of State. See also CCEO 48.

[35] For a list of over 130 code references to "Apostolic See," see X. Ochoa, Index verborum ac locutionum Codicis Iuris Canonici, 2nd ed. (Vatican City: Libreria Editrice Lateranense, 1984) 436–437.

[36] For a list of over forty code references to "Holy See," see Ochoa, 428.

[37] While PB was promulgated prior to the 1990 Eastern code, curial activities must also be assessed in terms of their fidelity to that significant text which, along with PB and the 1983 code, constitutes the basic legal corpus of the Catholic Church.

– Curial structure and activity are to correspond closely to conciliar ecclesiology.

General Norms in Pastor bonus

*1. Notion of Curia (*PB 1)

The Curia is a complex of dicasteries serving the pope (PB 1). Such dicasteries include the Secretariat of State, nine congregations, three tribunals, twelve councils, and three offices. The Curia facilitates the pope's service of the universal Church and the particular churches. It is to reinforce the unity of faith and communion of the people of God and promote the Church's proper mission in the world.

*2. Structure of Dicasteries (*PB 2–10)

(a) Equal Dignity of Dicasteries

While the dicasteries are technically juridically equal, they are not equal in importance or power. Normally no dicastery has any power over another; each responds directly to the pope regarding its activity. However, in the case of alleged legal violations, each dicastery is subject to the judgment of the Signatura or supreme court (PB 123) regarding the former's compliance with the law. De facto the dicasteries occasionally need to respond to the secretary of state, given his immediate relationship with the pope.

(b) Ordinary Structure of Dicasteries

A cardinal prefect or archbishop president heads the dicasteries (PB 3, §1). Only selected cardinals or bishops are normally dicastery members with five-year terms; yet occasionally additional clerics or other faithful may be members of certain councils with due regard for the general restriction of governance functions to clerics (cc. 129, 274).

The dicastery secretary supervises its personnel and expedites its business.

The consultors are clerics or laity chosen stably or on an ad hoc basis for their competence and prudence, generally in light of the criterion of universality. Normally they study issues individually and prepare written opinions, but there may be an occasional collegial consultation.

Major curial officials and other collaborators are chosen in light of the above criteria. The particular churches and religious institutes and societies are invited to supply personnel.

3. Procedures

(a) Competencies of Dicasteries (cf. PB 13)

This is usually determined by the nature of the material, e.g., sacraments and divine worship, unless it is explicitly determined otherwise, e.g., a personal criterion such as the Eastern Catholic faithful.

The congregations, or at least dicasteries with executive power, generally handle issues exceeding the competence of individual bishops and their groupings and therefore reserved to the Holy See or committed to the dicasteries by the pope.

Given their preeminently pastoral nature, pontifical councils study serious ecclesial problems transcending the scope and resources of the particular churches and foster pastoral initiatives for the good of the universal Church.

The tribunals and other dicasteries with judicial power judge disputed issues referred to the Holy See or reserved to it in law (e.g., c. 1405).

Unless the pope provides otherwise, the Signatura resolves conflicts of interdicasterial competence when a complex issue potentially pertains to more than one dicastery (PB 20).

Issues of mixed competency clearly involve more than one dicastery. For example, the CDF is necessarily involved whenever a question addressed to another dicastery has doctrinal-moral implications, e.g., ecumenical policy. In such circumstances there are two possibilities: an interdicasterial consultation with an independent decision by each dicastery or a single solution by a joint commission (PB 21; Regolamento 85–95).

*(b) Treatment of Various Questions (*PB 15)

All issues are treated by the curial executive or judicial dicasteries according to law. The three key legal sources of curial activity in descending importance are the codes, Pastor bonus (constitutive law), and the Regolamento (cf. c. 95). The individual dicasteries also have their own special law, which must normally be obtained when consulting them (cf. PB 37–38).[38] All such curial activity is ideally to foster justice, the good of the Church, and the salvation of persons (c. 1752).

*(c) Plenary Assemblies (*PB 23)

Ordinary daily decisions are made by the dicastery head, the secretary, and other minor officials. However, some significant questions (e.g., policy decisions) are reserved to plenary assemblies (plenaria) potentially involving all dicastery members. Extraordinary plenaria occur once a year and involve all the members; ordinary plenaria, however, occur more frequently and involve the members living in Rome.

*(d) Papal Approval (*PB 18; cf. also PB 15)

The various dicasteries are to execute the pope's wishes willingly, since they function vicariously in his name and with his authority. He alone acts with properly papal authority.

The dicasteries (e.g., congregations) do not have legislative power unless they have a special papal mandate expressly delegating such power (cf. cc. 29–30; Regolamento 110). They neither can derogate from universal law nor authentically interpret it, which is the task of the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts (PB 154–158).

Judicial power is generally exercised only by tribunals such as the Rota and the Signatura.

Executive power is generally exercised only by the congregations and not the councils barring certain exceptions, e.g., Council for the Laity vis-à-vis lay associations (PB 134). Within the areas of their competency, dicasteries with executive power may issue general executory decrees (cc. 31–33) or instructions (c. 34).

With due regard for the specific procedures of the papal tribunals in issuing sentences, there are various ways in which the pope intervenes in other curial activities. In three instances they remain distinctly curial acts against which one may possibly take recourse although they are posited in the pope's name and so have a distinctive authority. First of all, he must approve all major curial decisions, e.g., publication of a congregation document (common papal approval—Regolamento 115–116). Second, he may grant a dicastery special faculties to exceed its ordinary competency. Third, he may sanate a curial act that exceeds a dicastery's ordinary competence or violates ordinary procedures.

Fourth, however, the pope may make a dicastery act his own by giving it a special type of approval (in forma specifica) according to specific conditions articulated in Regolamento 110. This papal intervention changes the nature of such an act; it becomes a properly papal act, and neither recourse nor appeal is possible against it (cc. 1404; 1406, §1).

*(e) Hierarchic Recourse (*PB 19; Regolamento 118–122)

One may make hierarchic recourse (cc. 1732–1739) against lower level administrative acts to the various dicasteries in light of the nature of the matter. For example, the Congregation for the Clergy normally reviews recourse against episcopal disciplinary or penal action against clerics.

There is a limited possibility of such recourse to the Signatura against alleged legal violations in the administrative acts of the dicasteries (c. 1445, §2; PB 123).

4. Meetings of Cardinals

As presidents, prefects, or members of the dicasteries the cardinals (cc. 349–359) play a central curial role. For example, several times a year, by papal mandate, the cardinal dicastery heads meet to examine key issues, coordinate curial efforts, and exchange information (PB 22).

[38] By way of exception one may find the latest (April 16, 1994) norms of the Rota in AAS 86 (1994) 508–540. For the still operative March 1968 norms of the Signatura see X. Ochoa, ed., Lex Ecclesiae (Rome: Commentarium pro Religiosis, 1972) 3, 5321–5332; CLD 7, 246–272.

A separate council of fifteen cardinals aided by experts is to advise the pope on Holy See organizational and economic problems (PB 24–25). Its establishment reflects a concern about safeguarding and administering the capital destined for charitable and religious works. Various heads of particular churches are named for five-year terms. The council normally meets twice a year after being convened by the secretary of state.

Specific Curial Structures in Pastor bonus[39]

We now briefly describe the various curial dicasteries, especially their areas of competency.[40]

*Secretariat of State (*PB 39–47)[41]

The Secretariat occupies a central curial position. Headed by the cardinal secretary of state, it enjoys a particularly close relationship to the pope in the daily exercise of his supreme mission. It has a comprehensive competence, be it vis-à-vis other dicasteries or in terms of its own distinctive responsibilities.

The Secretariat's first section for general ecclesial business (PB 41–44) is directed by the cardinal secretary's deputy. It examines extraordinary issues transcending the competency of individual dicasteries, coordinates curial activities, monitors the work of papal legates (cc. 362–367), draws up apostolic letters, and oversees publications such as Acta Apostolicae Sedis and L'Osservatore Romano.

The Secretariat's second section for governmental affairs (PB 45–47) is directed by its own secretary, aided by an undersecretary and a body of cardinals and bishops. This section handles such matters as accrediting diplomatic representatives, supervising the activity of papal legates, assuring Holy See representation in international institutes and meetings, drawing up concordats (c. 3), and expediting episcopal nominations and seeing to the establishment and modification of particular churches requiring negotiations with civil governments (cf. PB 78).

Congregations[42]

The congregations, which have surrendered some of their former preeminence to the Secretariat of State, have a distinctive organization.

[39] After discussing the Secretariat of State (PB 39–47) we will briefly discuss the following nine congregations: Doctrine of the Faith (PB 48–55), Eastern Churches (PB 56–61), Divine Worship-Sacraments (PB 62–70), Causes of Saints (PB 71–74), Bishops (PB 75–84), Evangelization of Peoples (PB 85–92), Clergy (PB 93–104), Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life (PB 105–111), and Catholic Education (PB 112–116).

Then we will consider the three tribunals: Apostolic Penitentiary (PB 117–120), Signatura (PB 121–125), and Rota (PB 126–130).

Subsequently we will comment on the twelve councils: Laity (PB 131–134), Christian Unity (PB 135–138), Family (PB 139–141), Justice and Peace (PB 142–144), "Cor Unum" (PB 145–148), Migrants and Itinerant People (PB 149–151), Health Care Workers (PB 152–153), Interpretation of Legislative Texts (PB 154–158), Interreligious Dialogue (PB 159–162), Dialogue with Non-Believers (PB 163–165), Culture (PB 166–168), and Social Communications (PB 169–170).

After briefly discussing certain commissions, we deal with three offices: Apostolic Camera (PB 171), Patrimony of the Apostolic See (PB 172–175), and Prefecture for the Economic Affairs of the Holy See (PB 176–179).

Finally we will briefly consider two other institutes: the Prefecture of the Papal Household (PB 180–181) and the Office for the Liturgical Celebrations of the Supreme Pontiff (PB 182).

[40] For a more detailed examination of the dicasteries, see the pertinent bibliographical references mentioned in connection with each dicastery. For specific details on the personnel, addresses, and phone numbers of the various dicasteries, see the annual Annuario Pontificio published by the Vatican Press. While the various dicasteries issue numerous documents in discharging their responsibilities, limitations of space preclude listing such documents in the following brief comments on those responsibilities. For observations on such documents, see the individual commentaries on the pertinent canons.

[41] See R. Bertagna, "La Segreteria di Stato," in La Curia Romana, 163–176; V. Buonomo, "La Segreteria di Stato: Competenze nella funzione diplomatica," in ibid., 177–188.

[42] See P. Palazzini, "Le Congregazioni," in La Curia Romana, 189–206.

Technically, a "congregation" is a group of cardinals and bishops who collegially address particular ecclesial concerns such as education on behalf of supreme church authority and in service to the particular churches. Each congregation is normally chaired by a "prefect," who is assisted by a secretary (usually a titular archbishop) and a staff whose size varies from congregation to congregation.

The congregation's membership includes both cardinals resident in Rome and cardinals and bishops who head dioceses around the world and reflect distinctive ecclesial experiences.[43] The congregation gathers annually for a plenary meeting (plenarium) to discuss major pastoral matters and make policy decisions on matters within its competence.

Ordinary meetings of all the members who are in Rome are held regularly throughout the year. Theoretically, all major decisions implementing policy are made or affirmed at these meetings. The agenda for them and accompanying documentation are developed by the congregation's staff.

The cardinal prefect, secretary, and major staff personnel meet frequently to carry on the ordinary business of the congregation in light of the policy set by the plenary session and decisions reached in the ordinary meetings. This group (the congressus) also decides how to handle issues brought to the congregation's attention: whether to submit them directly to the pope, place them on the agenda for a plenary session, or address them in an ordinary meeting.

The congregations draw on experts in their respective fields, usually those living in Rome but also others from around the world. Consultors can be asked their advice by mail. They can also be called to meetings of the council of consultors where their advice is sought as a body (consulta).

Certain congregations are responsible comprehensively for various ecclesial concerns affecting only a certain group of people, e.g., Eastern Churches or Evangelization of Peoples. However, other congregations are responsible for only a given ecclesial concern that affects all the faithful, e.g., CDF in doctrinal matters.

For a long time, the congregations were called "sacred," probably because they dealt with various sacred or religious issues. However, this is no longer true, perhaps because such nomenclature seems inappropriate in characterizing such bureaucratic entities even given their religious concerns.

1. Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (CDF) (PB 48–55).[44] While all congregations are technically juridically equal (PB 2, §2), the CDF enjoys a certain preeminence given its comprehensive competence to promote (PB 49–50) and safeguard (PB 51) the integrity of faith and morals throughout the Church. Accordingly, other dicasteries must submit proposed documents to the CDF for prior review in light of such doctrinal concerns (PB 54).[45] The CDF is also expected to assist the bishops in exercising their individual and corporate teaching roles.

In promoting the faith, the CDF is to foster studies of the faith in light of new questions posed by science and culture. The Pontifical Biblical Commission and the International Theological Commission assist in that enterprise (PB 55).

In safeguarding the faith against errors, the CDF examines new teachings and opinions, books, and other writings, utilizing its own norms for doctrinal examination. It also occasionally punishes crimes against faith or morals, e.g., in celebrating the sacraments, especially penance (PB 52).[46]

The CDF also handles privilege of the faith cases (PB 53). Furthermore, it reviews requests for dispensations from celibacy arising before 1989

(cc. 290, 3°–292). It proceeds administratively or judicially depending on the nature of the issue.

2. Congregation for the Eastern Churches (PB 56–61).[47] The name of this congregation reflects conciliar teaching on the equality of the diverse ritual churches sui iuris that form the worldwide Catholic communion.[48] In addition to the assigned cardinals, the various Eastern patriarchs and major metropolitans are automatically congregation members as is the president of the Council for Promoting Christian Unity. The congregation officials and consultors should reflect the aforementioned ritual diversity (PB 57).

This congregation exercises for members of the Eastern Catholic churches a comprehensive competency in various teaching, sanctifying, or governing areas which would be handled by different Latin church congregations, e.g., Bishops, Catholic Education, etc. This is the case even in mixed matters involving Latin as well as Eastern Catholics where consultation with the corresponding other dicasteries may be necessary (PB 58). Furthermore, this congregation has exclusive responsibility for ecclesial activities in specific geographic areas (e.g., Middle East) traditionally ministered to by Eastern Catholic churches (PB 60). There are, however, exceptions to this broad competency, e.g., doctrinal matters (CDF) or judicial matters (Signatura or Rota) (PB 58, §2).

The congregation has a special relationship to the Pontifical Councils for Promoting Christian Unity and Interreligious Dialogue given their common ecumenical concerns (PB 57, §1; 61).

[47] See M. Brogi, "La Congregazione per le Chiese Orientali," in La Curia Romana, 239–267.

[48] Besides the Latin church there are twenty-one Eastern Catholic churches corresponding to five Eastern liturgical traditions: Alexandrian, Antiochian, Byzantine (Constantinopolitan), Chaldean, and Armenian. Roberson, The Eastern Catholic Churches, 5th ed. (Rome: Edizioni Orientalia Christiana, 1995).

3. Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments (PB 62–70).[49] This congregation underwent some noteworthy postconciliar organizational changes both before and after the 1983 code was promulgated.[50] In 1984 the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Congregation for Sacraments were separated into two distinct congregations headed by the same prefect. Pastor bonus, however, again unified the two congregations in one dicastery, appropriately viewing liturgy and the sacraments in an integrated fashion.

The congregation's worship section moderates and promotes the liturgy, monitors the development and revision of liturgical texts, reviews episcopal conference translations and adaptations of such texts (c. 838, §3), communicates with various liturgical commissions, fosters international liturgical meetings, and oversees the observance of liturgical norms (c. 838, §2) (PB 64–66).

The congregation's discipline of the sacraments section fosters the integrity of their celebration and deals with such issues as granting dispensations from non-consummated marriages (cc. 1142, 1697–1706), processing the laicization of clerics (c. 290, 3°), and adjudicating allegations of the invalidity of ordination (cc. 290, 1°; 1708–1712) (PB 63, 67–68).

This congregation is competent for the whole Latin church, including those areas under the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

4. Congregation for the Causes of Saints (PB 71–74).[51] This congregation deals with the beatification and canonization of saints in the Latin and Eastern Catholic churches and monitors the authentication and preservation of relics.

The congregation works through three offices. The first one (the "judicial office") establishes and implements the procedures for beatification and canonization cases (c. 1403), which are initially processed in local dioceses. The second office, that of the promoter general of the faith (the so-called "devil's advocate"), examines any objections to the sanctity of a proposed saint and assures the integrity of the procedure. A third office, the historico-hagiographical office, investigates cases for which there are no living witnesses and through careful historical research is to determine the heroic virtue of persons whose causes have been presented long after their death.

5. Congregation for Bishops (PB 75–84).[52] This congregation is principally responsible for overseeing the constitution and provision of particular churches and the exercise of the episcopal ministry along with the Congregations for the Eastern Churches and the Evangelization of Peoples and the Secretariat of State.

The Congregation for Bishops provides for the erection, division, suppression, or other changes in dioceses (c. 373), ecclesiastical provinces (c. 431, §3), regions (c. 433), military ordinariates, and personal prelatures (c. 294). Likewise, it oversees the selection of bishops, apostolic administrators, military ordinaries, and various vicars or prelates with personal jurisdiction. When civil governments are involved in such decision-making, the congregation proceeds in close consultation with the second section of the Secretariat of State (c. 377).

The congregation receives the five-year report on the diocese (c. 399) submitted by diocesan bishops and arranges for the corresponding ad limina visits of bishops (c. 400—Regolamento 123–127). Occasionally it orders an apostolic visitation of a diocese,[53] and it deals with whatever else touches bishops personally in their ministry or retirement.

The congregation also handles matters concerning particular councils (cc. 439–446) and episcopal conferences (cc. 447–459). In the latter instance it sees to their establishment and reviews their statutes; and in both instances it reviews their legislative enactments after appropriate consultation with the pertinent other dicasteries.

6. Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples (PB 85–92).[54] For centuries this ancient congregation has exercised extensive jurisdiction in territories considered still to be "missionary," i.e., where the ordinary diocesan organization has not been fully established for various reasons. However, that somewhat broad competency has been somewhat restricted during the twentieth century. For example, tribunals such as the Rota and Signatura exercise exclusive judicial competency even in missionary territories.

The congregation is primarily responsible for directing and coordinating the world-wide work of evangelization and missionary cooperation except in areas subject to the Congregation for the Eastern Churches. Among other things, this entails fostering theological research, assisting the pastoral work of missionaries and developing appropriate norms for such work, fostering missionary vocations, and promoting missionary works such as the Society for the Propagation of the Faith.

Like the Congregation for Bishops, this congregation establishes and modifies ecclesiastical circumscriptions and provides for church leaders in missionary areas. It monitors the activities of missionary societies of apostolic life as well as the distinctly missionary work of members of institutes of consecrated life, individually and corporately.

The congregation administers its own funds and other goods destined for the missions, but must report on this administration to the Prefecture for Economic Affairs of the Holy See (PB 176–179).

7. Congregation for the Clergy (PB 93–104).[55] This congregation was formerly the Sacred Congregation of the Council, established to implement and interpret the decrees of the Council of Trent. Hence, the congregation has extensive responsibilities transcending the realm of clerical life and ministry.

Three offices exist within this congregation. The first deals with the life and ministry primarily of the secular clergy, ranging from their holiness of life to continuing education, pastoral ministry, and their appropriate distribution throughout the Church. This office exercises vigilance over priests in pastoral ministry regarding their fidelity to clerical discipline and also oversees the activity of presbyteral councils (cc. 495–501). This congregation also oversees the functioning of diocesan (cc. 511–514) and parish pastoral councils (c. 536), although such entities involve laity and religious as well as clergy.

The second office addresses questions of preaching and catechetics (cc. 762–780). It is to promote and approve pastoral and catechetical directories prepared by episcopal conferences (c. 775, §2) and may itself indicate opportune norms for the religious instruction of children, youth, and adults after consultation with the CDF.

The third office is competent for matters of temporal administration, e.g., expediting Holy See permission to alienate ecclesiastical goods (c. 1292, §2). Similarly it oversees the proper administration of Mass obligations, pious foundations, pious wills, and legacies (cc. 1308, §1; 1310, §3). It is also concerned about the proper support and social security of clergy (c. 281).

8. Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and for Societies of Apostolic Life (PB 105–111).[56] The name of this congregation (CICLSAL) reflects the twofold structure of the pertinent canons of the 1983 code. After general norms (cc. 573–606), it deals with institutes of consecrated life (cc. 607–730) and societies of apostolic life (cc. 731–746).

With due regard for the competency of other congregations (e.g., Evangelization of Peoples for missionary institutes), CICLSAL is primarily responsible for promoting and supervising the living of the evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity, and obedience. It does this for formally recognized institutes or societies, individuals such as hermits (c. 603) or consecrated virgins (c. 604), and other forms of consecrated life (c. 605).

While assisting institutes and societies to flourish with fidelity to the spirit of their founders in serving the Church's mission, CICLSAL exercises certain pastoral governance functions. For example, it establishes new institutes or societies or advises bishops on their comparable initiatives (c. 579); it approves constitutions (c. 587, §2); it authorizes the alienation of property where necessary (c. 638, §3); it grants indults of departure in various institutes or societies (c. 691, §2) and confirms dismissals from pontifical institutes or societies (c. 700). CICLSAL also establishes conferences of major superiors of men and women, approves their statutes, and monitors their activities to assist them in achieving their purpose (cc. 708–709).

9. Congregation for Catholic Education (PB 112–116).[57] This congregation deals with the varied dimensions of the Church's educational mission, except for catechetics (Congregation for the Clergy).

The Congregation for Catholic Education oversees the varied dimensions of the formation of sacred ministers: spiritual, doctrinal, and pastoral. For example, it approves episcopal conference programs of priestly formation (c. 242). It also exercises a certain vigilance over the direction, discipline, and temporal administration of seminaries.

The congregation's responsibility to promote and organize Catholic education in light of basic magisterial principles technically encompasses elementary, secondary, college, and university level education. However, in the post-1983 code period, the most noteworthy congregation attention has been focused on the post-secondary level of Catholic colleges and universities.

The authority the congregation exercises over educational institutions varies depending on the degree to which the Holy See is juridically involved in their governance. For example, such jurisdiction is much more extensive in ecclesiastical universities and faculties (cc. 815–821) than in other Catholic universities and institutions of higher studies (cc. 807–814).

Tribunals[58]

The Roman Curia contains three tribunals, each of which has a unique organization and specialized competence[59] (unchanged in PB) in exercising the pope's judicial power. The Apostolic Penitentiary deals with internal forum matters, sacramental or non-sacramental (PB 117–120), while the Roman Rota and the Apostolic Signatura address external forum concerns. The Rota is the preeminent appellate tribunal in second and higher instances, e.g., fostering the protection of rights and assuring a unified jurisprudence. Occasionally it handles first instance cases, e.g., those involving heads of state (PB 126–130). The Signatura functions both judicially and administratively in ensuring the correct administration of justice in the Church (PB 121–125). It reviews various procedural challenges to Rotal sentences, resolves conflicts of competency among Roman dicasteries, and hears recourses against administrative acts of such dicasteries.

Since the code does not mention the Apostolic Penitentiary, a few words are warranted regarding its functioning.[60] From the early Middle Ages a cardinal has customarily been named to absolve from censures reserved to the pope. His competence was gradually restricted to the internal forum, and today he functions at the universal church level in many ways similar to the canon penitentiary at the diocesan level (c. 508). The Penitentiary grants various internal forum indulgences, favors, absolutions, dispensations, commutations, sanations, and condonations. In deciding such issues, the cardinal penitentiary is assisted by a regent, a theologian, a canonist, and other officials.

*Pontifical Councils (*PB 131–170)[61]

In Regimini Paul VI added a new dicastery called a "secretariat" to the traditional triad of congregations, tribunals, and offices. Later additional secretariats, councils, and commissions were added; however, it was frequently difficult to clarify their precise juridic status. For example, the same term "council" designated the juridically significant Council for the Public Affairs of the Church and the less juridically significant, however pastorally important, Council for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and the Apostolate of the Sea and Air.

Pastor bonus reorganized the juridic profile and activity of such councils, whose focus differs from older curial entities such as congregations. The latter exercise various governance tasks while [59] The competence of the Rota (cc. 1443–1444; 1405, §3) and the Signatura (c. 1445), unlike the competence of other curial dicasteries, is also mentioned in Book VII of the code. See the commentary on the pertinent canons.

[60] See L. DeMagistris and U. M. Todeschini, "La Penitenzieria Apostolica," in La Curia Romana, 419–429. For a somewhat detailed treatment including questions about whether the Penitentiary should technically be considered a tribunal, see Aymans and Mörsdorf, 254–257.

the former are primarily engaged in activities of promotion, study, providing information, and consultation in service of the particular churches. Furthermore, some councils such as those for the laity and the family have lay members.

Pastor bonus mentions twelve councils, some of which have a certain autonomy while others depend on other dicasteries. For example, the Council for Social Communications closely collaborates with the Secretariat of State (PB 169, §2).

The term "council" indicates the stability and relative independence of such organisms. The term "commission" was dropped because it seemed to indicate an undue dependency. Despite their various tasks, the councils have a similar purpose: promotional service of the ecclesial community.

It is sometimes difficult to clarify how the councils differ from the traditional dicasteries. However, while the latter generally address inner church issues, the councils frequently focus on extra-ecclesial pastoral and human concerns, e.g., various dialogue-oriented councils such as Christian Unity (PB 135–138) or Interreligious Dialogue (PB 159–162).

While most councils primarily focus on the study and promotion of pastoral life, some exercise certain governmental functions. For example, in implementing the conciliar ecumenical decrees and the two codes, the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity issued the 1993 Ecumenical Directory, a general executory decree addressing various ecumenical policy issues (PB 136; cc. 31–33).

We will now briefly indicate the competency of the various councils.

1. Pontifical Council for the Laity (PB 131–134).[62] This council promotes and coordinates the apostolate of the laity, discusses issues affecting their Christian life, and handles whatever concerns distinctly lay associations.

2. Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity (PB 135–138). This council fosters ecumenical activity at all levels in fidelity to Vatican II (c. 755). It monitors the activity of various ecumenical groups and oversees the conducting of various bilateral and multilateral dialogues with various Christians not in full communion. It collaborates especially with the CDF and the Congregation for the Eastern Churches. Furthermore, a special commission handles religious relationships with the Jews.

3. Pontifical Council for the Family (PB 139–141). This council promotes the pastoral care of families and fosters their dignity in the Church and in civil society. It strives to understand better the Church's official teaching on marriage and the family in light of contemporary challenges.

4. Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace (PB 142–144). This council fosters justice and peace in the world in light of the gospel and the Church's social teaching. It deals with issues of the development of peoples and human rights, especially in collaboration with the Secretariat of State.

5. Pontifical Council "Cor Unum" (PB 145–148). This council, closely linked to the preceding one, expresses the Church's concern for the needy, fosters pertinent research on human development, and coordinates relief efforts.

6. Pontifical Council for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Itinerant People (PB 149–151).[63] This council expresses the Church's pastoral care for those forced to leave their native land or lacking one. It also seeks to motivate the particular churches to care for migrants, refugees, nomads, seafarers, airport and airline employees, etc.

7. Pontifical Council for Pastoral Assistance to Health Care Workers (PB 152–153). This council reflects the Church's solicitude for the sick, especially by aiding health care workers in ministering in light of church teaching.

8. Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts (PB 154–158).[64] This canonically significant council authentically interprets universal laws for both the Latin and Eastern churches (c. 16, §1; CCEO 1498, §1) and publishes such interpretations with papal confirmation. It assists the other dicasteries in ensuring that their general executory decrees and instructions conform to universal law and are expressed in the proper juridic form. The council also examines the juridical aspects of the general decrees of episcopal conferences during the necessary review (recognitio) process (cc. 455, §2; 456). Finally, at the request of interested parties, the council may review the conformity to universal law of particular laws and general decrees issued by other lower level legislators such as diocesan bishops.

9. Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue (PB 159–162). This council fosters relations with non-Christian believers and promotes greater mutual esteem and sharing of information between them and Christians. The council especially is to collaborate with the CDF, the Congregation for the Eastern Churches, and the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples. A special office handles religious relations with Moslems.

10. Pontifical Council for Dialogue with Non-Believers (PB 163–165). This council studies the contemporary phenomenon of atheism as well as the lack of faith and religion. It also fosters relations with cooperative atheists and non-believers.[65]

[64] See J. Herranz, "Il Pontificio Consiglio per l'Interpretazione dei Testi Legislativi," in La Curia Romana, 467–481.

[65] On March 25, 1993 this council was integrated with the Pontifical Council for Culture. See John Paul II, mp Inde a pontificatus, AAS 85 (1993) 549–552. Also related to the latter council, though independent from it, is the Pontifical Commission on the Preservation of the Church's Artistic and Historical Patrimony (PB 99–104).

11. Pontifical Council for Culture (PB 166–168). This council embodies the Church's concern about the faith-culture relationship by fostering appropriate dialogues with those involved in science, literature, and the arts. It collaborates with the Secretariat of State in dealing with cultural activities involving states and international agencies.

12. Pontifical Council for Social Communications (PB 169–170). In strict collaboration with the Secretariat of State, this council treats of questions involving the communications media so that they may be imbued with a human and Christian spirit (c. 822) and so better communicate the gospel and duly foster civil culture and mores.

Commissions[66]

The Curia contains numerous commissions, such as the Pontifical Commission for Latin America, which is attached to the Congregation for Bishops (PB 83–84). The commissions vary in different ways, e.g., in terms of their newness, their permanent or temporary character, their relationship to an existing dicastery, their necessary or discretionary nature, their authority, and their possible interdicasterial dimension, e.g., regarding a more equitable distribution of priests (cf. PB 95, §2).

However diverse they may be, such commissions respond to curial exigencies of adaptability, flexibility, and therefore efficiency—characteristics which occasionally are lacking in the older established dicasteries given their somewhat more fixed structure, competency, and procedure.

Generally the commissions are purely consultative or promotional without governmental power, yet they also function vicariously in the pope's name. They usually operate according to Regolamento 93–95, the special norms of a given dicastery, and their own proper statutes.

[66] See G. Dalla Torre, "Le Commissioni," in La Curia Romana, 207–224.

Offices (PB 171–179)[67]

From the outset, in addition to the congregations and tribunals, there have been other curial organizations with different structures depending on their competencies, leadership personnel, and the immediacy of their relationship to the pope, in whose name they function. A personal rather than collegial style of functioning characterizes their exercise of various technical executive functions, generally but not exclusively economic in character.

The term "offices" used in Pastor bonus seems to be a convenient nomenclature for heterogeneous departments which support the Curia but whose competence and powers have not always been clearly delineated.

Three offices are mentioned: the Apostolic Camera, which manages the Holy See when the see is vacant (PB 171), the Administration of the Patrimony of the Apostolic See, which administers its temporal goods (PB 172–175), and the Prefecture for the Economic Affairs of the Holy See, which establishes the annual Holy See budget, prepares the annual financial report, and supervises the economic activities of the dicasteries (PB 176–179).

Other Institutes of the Roman Curia (PB 180–182)

Finally, there are two other bodies which, while not technically "dicasteries" like the preceding entities (PB 2, §§1 and 3), are called "other institutes of the Roman Curia": the Prefecture of the Papal Household, which monitors its internal order (PB 180–181), and the Office for the Liturgical Celebrations of the Supreme Pontiff (PB 182).

Institutions Linked to Holy See (PB 186–193)

These are varied entities which respond to certain Holy See exigencies although they do not directly serve the Petrine ministry, e.g., archives, Vatican Library, Academy of Sciences, The Fabric (maintenance) of St. Peter's Basilica.[68]

[67] See F. Salerno, "Gli Uffici," in La Curia Romana, 483–503.

[68] Various other agencies or persons are mentioned in Pastor bonus despite not being situated under any of the aforementioned categories, e.g., the central labor office (PB 136) and the translation center (PB 16). See Gutiérrez, in Pamplona ComEng, 286.

CHAPTER V
LEGATES OF THE ROMAN PONTIFF
[cc. 362–367]

Since the earliest times of the Church's history, the Roman Pontiffs have sent legates to represent them, such as, for example, at the major ecumenical councils.[1] As the practice developed over the centuries, legates were sent also to civil authorities, with permanent papal representation beginning to appear by the end of the fifteenth century. The period following the Council of Trent brought about reforms regarding the preparation, designation, and functions of pontifical legates. These reforms were consolidated in the subsequent centuries, leading to the current practice by which the Roman Pontiff sends legates to particular churches and to civil authorities in order to act as his representatives in a permanent and stable fashion.

The principal source for the canons that follow is the 1969 motu proprio Sollicitudo omnium ecclesiarum, which responded to the desire expressed during the Second Vatican Council regarding a clarification of the role of the pontifical legates in relation to the proper pastoral ministry of the bishops.[2]

The reorganization of the Roman Curia brought about by the 1988 apostolic constitution Pastor bonus did not directly affect the pontifical legates[3] nor does the 1990 Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches contain legislation on this matter.

Right of Legation

Canon 362 — The Roman Pontiff has the innate and independent right to appoint, send, transfer, and recall his own legates either to particular churches in various nations or regions or to states and public authorities. The norms of international law are to be observed in what pertains to the mission and recall of legates appointed to states.

The Roman Pontiff, in exercising his responsibilities as the visible head and the principal spiritual leader of the Catholic Church, makes use of representatives or legates to act as liaisons both to the particular churches and to the states and public authorities throughout the world.

The right of the Roman Pontiff to appoint, send, transfer, and recall his legates is innate, that is, proper to his office, since he can freely exercise supreme, full, immediate, and universal ordinary power in the Church (c. 331).

The canon, based substantially on Sollicitudo III, 1, reflects the theological reality that, as the successor of Peter, the Roman Pontiff is "a permanent and visible source and foundation of unity of faith and fellowship"[4] and has the mission to confirm his brother bishops and the people of God in the faith, in that communio which is the Church. The bishops, as pastors of the particular churches spread throughout the world, exercise their office collegially, in communion with and under the authority of the Roman Pontiff. In this context, with due regard for the external, social, and juridical dimensions of the Church, the pontifical legates are recognized as an effective, though certainly not exclusive, means of maintaining the bonds which link the Roman Pontiff with the bishops of the world, as well as with all the members of the Christian faithful.

Following the internal logic of the canon, the pontifical legates are sent, first of all, to the particular churches, as an expression and extension of the aforesaid mission of the Roman Pontiff. Therefore, they have a primarily ecclesial role.

The pontifical legates are sent also to states and public authorities. The Church addresses itself to every aspect of human life in exercising its mission to proclaim the gospel to all, to communicate to society Christian values, and to safeguard the rights of the Christian faithful as well as the transcendent quality and the fundamental rights of all human persons. Therefore the Church attempts to engage in constructive dialogue with political authorities and with the international community of nations and supranational organizations.[5] In this secular aspect of their mission, the pontifical legates exercise a role which is rooted in a fundamentally ecclesial reality.

For their part, states and public authorities, recognizing the particular mission of the Church, send representatives, or ambassadors, to the Roman Pontiff. Hence, the Holy See exercises a right of active (sending) and passive (receiving) legation.

The Roman Pontiff sends his legates in virtue of his spiritual and moral authority, rather than as the supreme temporal ruler of the State of Vatican City. To illustrate this point, during the nearly sixty-year period when the Roman Pontiff did not possess a territory, the international community, in accord with a long accepted practice,[6] continued to recognize his right to send legates and receive ambassadors. In fact, during that period, the number of diplomatic missions accredited to the Holy See increased.

The Roman Pontiff exercises his rights concerning the pontifical legates independently, since he is not subject to any other authority, either civil or ecclesiastical.

History is replete with attempts on the part of civil authorities to circumscribe, either totally or partially, the rights of the Roman Pontiff regarding his legates. These have included attempts to limit them to merely diplomatic or political functions, in order to control the Church and to hinder contacts, whether on the part of the hierarchy or of the lay faithful, between the particular churches and the Apostolic See.

The usefulness of sending pontifical legates has, at times, been questioned within the Church. During the Second Vatican Council, while the bishops as a whole requested greater clarity regarding the role of the pontifical legates, some went so far as to suggest that the practice was an anachronism and should be totally suppressed. The idea was not entirely new since, prior to the twentieth century, some bishops opposed the sending of pontifical legates, considering them to be usurpers of their rights, and therefore tried to restrict their activities, ironically, to merely ceremonial or diplomatic functions.

Lastly, with regard to the sending and recalling of legates appointed to states, the canon refers to the norms of international law, which are contained in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations.[7]

Types of Legates

Canon 363 — §1. To the legates of the Roman Pontiff is entrusted the office of representing the Roman Pontiff in a stable manner to particular churches or also to the states and public authorities to which they are sent.

§2. Those who are designated as delegates or observers in a pontifical mission at international councils or at conferences and meetings also represent the Apostolic See.

[5] The annual address of the Holy Father to the diplomatic corps accredited to the Holy See, published in AAS, can be a useful resource regarding the concerns of the Church vis-à-vis the current world situation.

[6] For a thorough exposition of this topic, see R. J. Graham, Vatican Diplomacy: A Study of Church and State on the International Plane (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University, 1959).

[7] The Vienna Convention was organized by the United Nations, and the final document was signed on April 18, 1961 by representatives of the nations of the world and of the Holy See. For the full text, see United Nations, Treaty Series (1964) 96–126.

The canon, which synthesizes the contents of Sollicitudo I and II, distinguishes between those pontifical legates who represent the Roman Pontiff on a stable basis and those who are appointed as observers or delegates for a particular occasion.

The majority of the pontifical legates referred to in the first paragraph of the canon exercise the dual function of representatives to particular churches and to states and public authorities.

Heretofore a distinction was made between the nuncio, who enjoys the prerogative of the deanship of the diplomatic corps from the moment that he presents his credential letters, in conformity with the multi-century tradition codified in article 16 of the Vienna Convention,[8] and the pro-nuncio, whose place in the order of precedence is determined by seniority, that is, by the date of his accreditation. However, there has been a recent change, according to which the latter type of pontifical legate is to be given the designation of nuncio, whether or not he is the dean, and the title pro-nuncio is no longer to be used.[9]

At present, the Holy See maintains diplomatic relations with more than 165 countries, while the total number of nuncios and pro-nuncios is just over one hundred, since several have concurrent accreditation to more than one country.[10] The prerogative of the deanship is enjoyed in most countries of Central and South America, in many countries in Europe, and in some countries in Asia and Africa.

The pontifical legates who represent the Roman Pontiff only to the particular churches are given the title apostolic delegate.[11] Since more and more countries have established diplomatic relations with the Holy See, the number of delegations has decreased in recent years, such that there are now fewer than a dozen.[12]

The pontifical legates who represent the Roman Pontiff in a stable manner as nuncio, pro-nuncio, or apostolic delegate have the rank of titular archbishop, and are usually, but not exclusively, selected from among those ecclesiastics who already serve in pontifical representations.

The second paragraph of the canon refers to those persons who represent the Apostolic See in a sphere of increasing importance in today's world, the growing number of regional, continental, and world-wide international organizations, both governmental and non-governmental.

A number of these institutions, such as the United Nations Organization, are of such importance that permanent missions have been established;[13] for others, representatives are designated ad hoc.

[8] The article reads as follows:

"1. Heads of mission shall take precedence in their respective classes in the order of the date and time of taking up their functions in accordance with Article 13.

"2. Alterations in the credentials of a head of mission not involving any change of class shall not affect his precedence.

"3. This article is without prejudice to any practice accepted by the receiving State regarding the precedence of the representative of the Holy See."

[9] There remain very few pontifical legates with the title of pro-nuncio.

[10] A concrete example, taken from the author's experience, is the apostolic nunciature in Acera, accredited concurrently to Ghana, Togo, and Benin.

[11] From 1893 until 1984, the pontifical legate resident in Washington was an apostolic delegate.

[12] Other titles mentioned in SoE are either no longer used (internuncio), or are exceedingly rare (apostolic visitor, regent, chargé d'affaires with instructions). The title chargé d'affaires ad interim is used commonly in the temporary absence of the head of any diplomatic mission.

[13] At present the Roman Pontiff sends permanent representatives, either as members with the right to vote, or as observers without said right (See SoE II, §1), to the following international governmental organizations: the U.N. (New York); the Office of the U.N. and its Specialized Agencies (Geneva); the International Atomic Energy Commission, the Office of the U.N. and the U.N. Organization for Industrial Development, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (Vienna); the U.N. Organizations and Organisms for Food and Agriculture, and the World Tourist Organization (Rome); UNESCO (Paris); the European Union (Brussels); the Council of Europe (Strasbourg); the Organization of the American States (Washington); and the International Committee of Military Medicine. Furthermore, the Holy See is a member of other international governmental organizations, such as INTELSAT, under the title of the Concrete examples of recent major international meetings that have drawn world-wide attention particularly to the role played by the Holy See delegations were the United Nations Conferences on Population, in Cairo (1994), and on Women, in Beijing (1995). The aforesaid delegations included not only permanent pontifical legates but also members chosen from among the clergy, religious, and the laity, both men and women.[14]

These institutions and conferences have become a key forum for the Holy See. Through pontifical legates, the Holy See gives voice to the Church's concern for the principal moral and social issues of the day which affect the lives not only of the Christian faithful but also of all the people of the world. In recent years, the Roman Pontiffs have increasingly addressed themselves to these organizations and to events organized by them, in order to draw the world's attention to many serious problems affecting the dignity of the human person.[15]

Ecclesial Responsibilities

Canon 364 — The principal function of a pontifical legate is daily to make stronger and more effective the bonds of unity which exist between the Apostolic See and particular churches. Therefore, it pertains to the pontifical legate for his own jurisdiction:

1° to send information to the Apostolic See concerning the conditions of particular churches and everything that touches the life of the Church and the good of souls;

2° to assist bishops by action and counsel while leaving intact the exercise of their legitimate power;

3° to foster close relations with the conference of bishops by offering it assistance in every way;

4° regarding the nomination of bishops, to transmit or propose to the Apostolic See the names of candidates and to instruct the informational process concerning those to be promoted, according to the norms given by the Apostolic See;

5° to strive to promote matters which pertain to the peace, progress, and cooperative effort of peoples;

6° to collaborate with bishops so that suitable relations are fostered between the Catholic Church and other Churches or ecclesial communities, and even non-Christian religions;

7° in associated action with bishops, to protect those things which pertain to the mission of the Church and the Apostolic See before the leaders of the state;

8° in addition, to exercise the faculties and to fulfill other mandates which the Apostolic See entrusts to him.

The principal obligations of the pontifical legate are directly related to and draw their raison d'être from the pope's ministry as a visible sign of unity for the whole Church, such that the legate acts as a liaison between the Apostolic See and the particular churches.

The canon, drawn from Sollicitudo IV–VIII, lists various functions of the legate, the first of which is to keep the Apostolic See informed regarding the conditions of the Church and of the Christian faithful in the territory to which the legate is sent (1°). Assisted by an understanding of the local language, culture, history, and traditions, the legate carries out his mission most effectively by means of personal visits to dioceses, seminaries, religious houses, parishes, and other institutions and communities.

Vatican City State. The Holy See sends representatives as well to about ten non-governmental organizations.

[14] The delegation sent to Beijing was headed by Dr. Mary Ann Glendon, Professor of Law at Harvard University.

[15] The degree of the Holy See's involvement in the international arena can be seen in the annual publication Le Saint-Siège et les Organisations internationales. A quick survey reveals that the Roman Pontiff is represented by personnel from the Secretariat of State, by permanent observers and/or members of their staffs, and by persons appointed specifically for a particular meeting.

This enables him to acquire first-hand knowledge regarding the life and activity of the Church, including customs, pastoral initiatives, and developments, at all levels, as well as the material and civil circumstances which affect the life of the people.[16]

The informational role of the pontifical legate in this regard is certainly not exclusive, since the Apostolic See is also informed about the conditions of the particular churches in other ways, e.g., papal visits around the world.

The pontifical legate plays an important role also regarding the local bishops. He neither replaces the local bishops nor exercises a supervisory function over them (2°). The bishops retain their right to deal directly with the Apostolic See, even if at times, in specific matters, the opinion of the pontifical legate is also sought. The relationship between the pontifical legate and the local bishops is intended to be mutually cooperative since the particular church may, at times, face difficult problems and can benefit from the legate's expertise and fraternal counsel. The pontifical legate makes present to the local bishops the unifying and strengthening presence of the Roman Pontiff, especially in political situations in which the particular church may be isolated, and communicates to them documents, directives, and initiatives which emanate from the Apostolic See. The pontifical legates also transmit to the Apostolic See publications, initiatives, and concerns which originate in the particular churches.

Similarly, the pontifical legate is to maintain a good relationship with the episcopal conference, respecting and safeguarding its rightful role (3°). While not a member (c. 450, §2), the pontifical legate is to take part in at least a part of its plenary meeting, and he can participate in other sessions at the invitation of the bishops or in virtue of a particular mandate. In conjunction with the episcopal conference, the pontifical legate can assist in coordinating the promotion of the mission of the Church and in dealing with specific problems, to whose resolution he can contribute his own point of view, as well as papal and curial insights. He also cooperates with the episcopal conference regarding the creation, division, and suppression of ecclesiastical circumscriptions. By his counsel and activity, he can provide valuable assistance, when needed, in helping to maintain the inner unity and cohesion of the episcopal conference. In conformity with the law (c. 456), the proceedings of the conference assemblies and decrees are sent to the Apostolic See, normally by the pontifical legate, who may add observations or an evaluation.

Furthermore, given the renewed emphasis on the importance of the ad limina visit, the pontifical legate is requested to assist in setting up and organizing the visit.[17]
